VIEW FROM THE UPPER TERRACE, CAPITOL GROUNDS.

WASHINGTON IN 1859.

BY referring to the number of Harper's Magazine published in December, 1852, our readers will find an accurate portrayal of the Federal Capital as it then appeared. We know of no fact which can supply so much reason for the patriotic pride of every citizen as the immense changes which, even in the short period that has since elapsed, our political metropolis has undergone. Seven years of American progress might furnish material for an epic. We count our cycles not by centuries but by months. It is a wonderful thing, and instructive, to be permitted to witness the process of that new creation which records the work of its days in the completion of stately marble palaces and lofty domes; it is also a very inspiring thing to feel that every grand building, every noble avenue, and the constantly repeated demands for a broader area of beauty, are but faint symbols of the working of that mighty providential fiat which, from the chaos of a continent overbrooded by the still darkness of barbarism, has in two short centuries called forth villages, towns, cities, states—a whole nation—full of restless enterprise, and led continually forward by the prompting of some yet unrecognized purpose. During the last five years Washington has made amazing strides toward permanent grandeur; and already the "City of Magnificent Distances" has become more remarkable for its magnificence than for its distances. No longer are our legislators compelled to wade through a morass in order to pass from the Capitol to the White House, and the sportsman must find his quarry in regions more remote than the Centre Market, although malice asserts that some incipient Nimrods still find that the surest place to obtain their game.

Before entering upon a description of the beautiful public buildings which have recently lent such a marked improvement to the capital, perhaps it may be well to rescue from dusty archives, and to place on record where they will be forever accessible to the people, some of the facts which attended the selection of Washington for the seat of the Federal Government.

During the Revolution the Continental Congress sat for the most part at Philadelphia, although it was compelled by the movements of the British army to vacate that city, and to pass through a migratory career at Baltimore, Lancaster, York, Princeton, Annapolis, Trenton, and New York. The Federal Government, under the present Constitution, was inaugurated at New York in 1789. At the first session, which commenced immediately, petitions came in from various town and state governments in regard to the permanent location of the seat of Government. The Eastern States and New York were opposed to the premature agitation of the question when there were other measures which their representatives considered of greater national importance demanding immediate attention. Among these important matters was the proposition to assume the debts of the States by the Federal Government—a measure in which the New England States were doubly interested: first, because, as they alleged, they had made the greatest pecuniary sacrifices in support of the war; and, secondly, because their citizens were in possession of an undue share of state securities. They were also averse to the removal of the capital to any point south of New York; and the latter State, as a matter of course, concurred with them in this policy. Pennsylvania was divided between Philadelphia and a point on the Susquehanna called Wright's Ferry, not far from Havre de Grace. New Jersey was for Philadelphia; Delaware would perhaps have preferred a point lower down the river; Maryland was divided in its preferences between Baltimore and some point on the Potomac. The Southern States, including Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, were unanimous for the Potomac.

In the first session the House passed a resolution for the permanent establishment of the seat of Government at Wright's Ferry, on the Susquehanna, as soon as suitable buildings could be erected; and in the mean time the Government was to remain at New York. This resolution was matured into a bill and was sent to the Senate, where it was amended by the substitution of Germantown for Wright's Ferry. Going back to the House, this important amendment was agreed to. But an amendment being added, that the laws of Pennsylvania were to remain in force until repealed by Congress, by preventing the immediate consummation of the plan, spoiled Germantown of its destiny. The Senate, availing itself of this trifling amendment, postponed the whole subject until the next session of Congress.

In the mean time, before the meeting of the next Congress, the Legislature of Virginia adopted a resolution offering ten miles square of its territory on the Potomac to the Federal Government for the location of the capital. It also offered one hundred and twenty thousand dollars for the erection of public buildings on condition that the offer of territory, or a portion of it, should be accepted. At the suggestion of the Virginia authorities, Maryland made a similar offer of territory with seventy-two thousand dollars. The Southern people were deeply aroused and agitated about the subject; and Mr. Madison said that Virginia would not have ratified the Constitution except with the understanding that the seat of Government was to be located south of Pennsylvania.

A compromise was at length agreed upon. The capital was to be permanently located at some point on the Potomac "between the East Branch and some point on the Conecogague;" and until suitable buildings could be erected, the Government was to reside at Philadelphia. By an amendment, the ten miles square might extend below the mouth of the East Branch, so as to include Alexandria on the Virginia side of the main Western Branch, but the public buildings were to be on the Maryland side. The unpronounceable Conecogague, which is "named in the bill," was forgotten in the execution of its provisions, and is practically as far from the seat of government as the jilted Germantown; and, we believe, it has never ceased to murmur its discordant complaints to the hills and gorges of Washington County, Maryland, beyond the Blue Ridge.

Immediately after the settlement of this question the Funding Act, with an amendment providing for the assumption of the State debts to the amount of twenty-one millions, was taken up in the House and passed, "two members representing Potomac districts" changing their votes and coming to its support. "Others," says Judge Marshall, "would have done likewise if necessary to carry the bill." He subjoins, by way of apology, that the gentlemen who changed their votes were understood to have been all the while favorable to the policy of assumption; but if the capital was to be located north of Maryland, they were opposed to any measure calculated to strengthen the Federal Government.

Mr. Jefferson, whose writings were not published until long after Judge Marshall wrote, gives a full explanation of the transaction in his "Anas," substantially agreeing with the above, except as to the feelings which governed the "Potomac members" in changing their votes.

He states that never, in his day, was the Union so near its dissolution as at the date of the above transactions. The most serious grounds of sectional discord were the questions of assuming the State debts and the location of the capital. The North laid great stress upon the former, the South upon the latter. The President and Cabinet were at their wit's ends for some plan of adjustment. He (Mr. Jefferson), then Secretary of State, met Mr. Hamilton, the Secretary of the Treasury, opposite the President's mansion. The latter, with an air of grave solicitude, took Mr. J.'s arm, and walked him back and forth for half an hour in earnest conversation upon the perplexing state of affairs. Hamilton thought that an accommodation or compromise might be effected by connecting the two vexed questions with each other. Jefferson, who had just returned home after a long residence in Europe, was wholly unacquainted with the financial affairs of the country, and complains that General Hamilton tricked him into the support of his plans. At any rate he invited General Hamilton to dine with him the next day, and promised to have other parties present who could join in the friendly conference. He only listened, or exhorted to moderation. Hamilton thought if the South would concede the assumption of the State debts, the North would consent to the location of the capital on the banks of the Potomac. "So," says Mr. Jefferson, "two of the Potomac members (White and Lee; but White with a revulsion of stomach almost convulsive) agreed to change their votes, and Hamilton undertook to carry the other point."

Hildreth connects the name of Robert Morris with that of Hamilton in the negotiation of this compromise, and concedes to the former the merit of its suggestion. We may observe, in passing, that, according to Mr. Jefferson's own statement of the case, it is difficult to understand how he was cheated by Hamilton into the office of "candle-holder" to his plans of stock-jobbing. The matters seem to have been arranged in the most business-like manner, with no other disagreeable incident than the "convulsive revulsion of stomach" of one of the "Potomac members;" whose travail, considering that he was giving birth to a great capital, will excite but little wonder.

Washington is situated at the head of tide-water and of navigation—or, more accurately, these points are included within the District of Columbia, but extend a short distance above the city. The ebb of the tide is arrested at the Little Falls, about three miles above the corporate limits, and navigation ceases at Georgetown, which is separated from Washington by Rock Creek, the streets of the two places being connected by the bridges which cross the stream. On the east the city is bounded by the East Branch, a small tributary from the northeast, which, penetrated by the tides, was formerly navigable for sloops as far as Bladensburg, six miles from the Capitol. Seventy-five years ago this town shipped tobacco to London; but for many years past all navigation, except by canal boats, propelled by poles, has ceased, in consequence of the filling of the channel with the accumulated washings of the neighboring fields. The town, however, notwithstanding its traditional glories as a sea-port engaged in the foreign trade, probably never had more population than at the present moment—viz., about five hundred.

Georgetown was, and still is, a place of much higher pretensions. Like Bladensburg, its commercial glories have departed. It no longer boasts of its commerce with London and Liverpool; although the harbor is good, and it still carries on a languid West India and coasting trade in coal and flour; with return cargoes of groceries, furniture, etc. The population increases slowly, and is now two or three times greater than when the town had a brisk and prosperous foreign trade. As a suburb of Washington it is destined to become famed for its princely private residences, the abodes of foreign ministers and wealthy citizens.

Alexandria, town and county, which were included within the original limits of the District, were, in 1846, retroceded to Virginia. It is difficult to understand why they were made a part of it, in the first instance, coupled with the condition that no public buildings were to be erected on that side of the river. Since its re-annexation to Virginia its prospects have greatly improved. The State has granted charters to railroads terminating at this point, which were refused so long as it remained a foreign territory; and these works have been prosecuted with vigor. The improvement in trade has been marked; and the town has now a population of about fifteen thousand. It has a high and healthy location, with a fine grain-growing region back of it, which is rapidly improving under the spur of railroad facilities as well as of Northern immigration.

The situation of Washington itself is one of great beauty. From the top of the Capitol, or of the unfinished Washington Monument, the city is seen to be situated in an amphitheatre surrounded by graceful hills on the east, north, and west; while on the south the broad and beautiful Potomac opens out a magnificent vista, where placid waters mirror the hills and tree-tops of Virginia and Maryland for many miles. The view down the river, of a fine summer morning or afternoon, from any elevated point in Washington or Georgetown, is one of surpassing loveliness.

But the most essential advantage of position possessed by Washington is the salubrity of its climate. No city in America of equal age and population, perhaps, has suffered so little from pestilence. The cholera, that terrible plague, which has repeatedly scourged other cities, North as well as South, has paid only one visit to the National Capital; yellow fever, we believe, has never made its appearance. Small-pox has never produced a panic; and notwithstanding the many swamps, marshes, and standing pools by which the sparsely-peopled city is surrounded, the whole family of febrile diseases barely gives wholesome exercise to the physicians.

It was argued by those who favored the location of the capital on the Potomac that it was important for the Legislature and Government to be beyond the control of large commercial cities. It was insisted that at Philadelphia or New York the ruling powers would be liable to intimidation by mobs, and to be biased in their acts by the proximity of wealthy merchants and bankers. How keen must have been the strife for the settlement of this question we may learn from the contemporary newspapers and correspondence, as well as from the various magnificent plans for laying out the city and for building the public edifices; showing that the prize must have been regarded by all interested in the location as of incalculable pecuniary value. It may serve to allay any alarm that may have been created in rural districts by the large sums recently expended on the improvement of the capital to remind the reader that, even to this hour, great as have been the expenditures of the last five or six years, many of the plans submitted by General Washington have not yet been attempted; although perhaps the size of the buildings, which the unparalleled and unexpected growth of the country has forced the nation to construct for the public service, far exceeds the wildest speculations of the projectors of the city.

Our engraving is a faithful representation of the new Capitol. The corner-stone of the old Capitol was laid on the 18th of September, 1793, by George Washington, in the presence of a large concourse of citizens, public officers, the Masonic fraternity, and many military companies. The building was designed by Dr. William Thornton, who, although not a professional architect, was well versed in architectural matters. His plan had been submitted to the President the previous year, and was approved, but referred to Mr. S. Hallet, who, after some slight changes in the design, commenced the construction of the edifice. He was soon removed, and his place supplied by Mr. Hadfield; who, in turn, was superseded by Mr. James Hobson, the architect by whom the President's mansion had been erected. Under Mr. Hobson's direction the north end of the building was completed. Again the designs were modified, but this time to a much greater extent, by Mr. Latrobe, who, in 1803, was appointed by President Jefferson architect of the Capitol.

In 1811 the south wing was completed; but the breaking out of hostilities between England and the United States caused a suspension of the work. It was in this unfinished condition when those ever-to-be-deplored acts of spoliation took place which were more disgraceful to the British arms than injurious to this country.

When peace was restored, Mr. Latrobe having resigned his position, President Monroe appointed Mr. Bulfinch to fill the vacancy, and under his faithful oversight the work was at last completed in 1825. The length of the old Capitol, which now forms the centre of the new edifice, is 352 feet 4 inches; in width, the wings are each 121 feet; and the centre, including the portico and steps, is 290 feet deep. The west front has a receding loggia 100 feet in length, and containing ten columns. This recessed portico is approached through the library, and affords a magnificent view of the city and its environs; southward, the vision is carried to Alexandria, Fort Washington, old Arlington (the seat of the late Mr. Custis), and along miles of the beautiful sloping banks of the Potomac. In the city, right under the spectator's gaze, are the Smithsonian Institution, the Washington Monument, the Patent-Office, the Observatory, the Treasury Department, and various beautiful edifices, while in Pennsylvania Avenue, from the Capitol to the White House, he sees the panorama of life reduced to a mimic scale. The rotunda is 96 feet in diameter, and was surmounted by a dome, shown in the engraving of the Capitol, in Harper's Monthly for December, 1852, but now demolished to make way for the noble construction which is to replace it. The new dome will rise 241 feet above the building, which is itself 69 feet in height, making 310 feet above the level of the ground, to which must be added the terracing, which increases the height above the ordinary level 86 feet, making a total elevation of 396 feet, being 4 feet less than the height of St. Paul's Cathedral in London, and 36 feet less than St. Peter's at Rome.

The original building was constructed of a very poor yellow sandstone, obtained in the neighborhood, and it was found necessary to paint it, both to preserve it and, if possible, to beautify it. The extensions are of white marble, which is procured from the State of Connecticut, and it is a matter of great importance that as soon as possible the sandstone in the old walls may be replaced by the same stone that the new portion of the building is constructed of, and that here and at the Patent-Office the really grand design may not be marred by a want of uniformity in the materials. The extensions are connected with the old building by very fine corridors, each 44 feet in length, and 26 feet wide, with outside colonnades, consisting of four columns, making a total width of 56 feet. The new wings, which constitute the extension, are each 324 feet in length from east to west, and 152 feet wide from north to south, making the total length of the new building, comprising the old edifice, the corridors, and the width of the extension, 745 feet 8 inches. The corner stone of the south wing was laid with very imposing ceremonies by President Fillmore, on the 4th of July, 1851, and the occasion was made memorable by the delivery of an eloquent oration by Daniel Webster.

The whole building has a rustic basement, supporting an ordonnance of Corinthian pilasters. A noble portico, 160 feet in length, supported by a double row of columns, each 30 feet high, adorns the centre on the east front, and furnishes a fitting Forum for the inauguration of the Presidents of the Republic. This is really the main entrance to the Capitol, although from its relation toward the city it is generally supposed by strangers to form the rear of the building. A grand flight of steps leads us up to the porch, which contains two singularly inappropriate representations of Peace and War (by Persico); War being represented by an individual in ancient armor who, despite his Roman garb, seems to have violated the military law by falling asleep at his post; while Peace, though clad like a lady, has a more masculine and forbidding countenance than we usually assign to the gentle goddess. The Discovery of America is fitly symbolized by the figure of Columbus with a miniature globe in his hand, while an Indian maiden crouches at his feet; the latter work is by the same artist, and does more justice to his fame. On the other side, the early struggles of our Pioneers are symbolized by a group representing the rescue of a mother and an infant from the scalping-knife of an Indian; executed by Greenough. Overhead is a pediment 80 feet in length, ornamented with a group of statuary, representing Liberty, attended by Hope and Justice, while in the beautiful garden which lies before the portico is Greenough's colossal statue of Washington.

THE CAPITOL.

On the eastern or main side of the new wings are porticoes in the centre of the façade, supported by twenty-two Corinthian columns; the pediment of the north wing (which contains the Senate chamber) is one of the triumphs of American art; it contains twelve exquisite figures, designed by the lamented Crawford, and executed in American marble by Italian artists resident in Washington. In the centre of this beautiful work of art is the genius of America, behind whom the rising sun typifies youth and prosperity, and on either side are figures emblematic of the mechanic, the pioneer, the soldier, youth, education, commerce, the hunter, the Indian chief and his family (whose posture near a grave, with the abandoned tomahawk by his side, sadly pictures the passing away of the aborigines).

On the western front of both wings are porticoes, 105 feet in width, with Corinthian columns. On the south side of the south wing, and also on the north side of the north wing, there are porticoes 121 feet in width, and having ten Corinthian columns. The exterior of the edifice is one of the finest achievements of architectural science in modern times. Without the pretension of the British Houses of Parliament, it stands grand, solitary, overlooking the city, while on the highest point, a landmark visible far down the river, is to be, unmoved by storm and sunshine, the last and best work of Crawford, the colossal figure of "America," crowned with stars, bearing the arms of the warrior and the wreath of victory, and forming a fitting apex for the majestic fabric!

The present inclosure around the Capitol contains only thirty-five acres, a space quite too contracted to permit the construction of the ornamental grounds necessary to do justice to a building which itself covers 62,000 square feet. The necessity for purchasing several squares of land adjoining the present grounds is so manifest, and has been so frequently admitted by the successive administrations, that persons owning the property necessary for the enlargement have from year to year delayed the erection of buildings, so that at this time the houses immediately surrounding the Capitol are of the commonest sort, with a few exceptions. During the thirty-fifth Congress an attempt was made to bring the negotiations to a close, but although well advanced when the adjournment occurred, the all-absorbing Kansas discussion occupied so much time that this important matter was again deferred. It is to be hoped that the new Congress about to assemble may determine to purchase the required land; for as the matter lies, it commits a double injustice. The demand for land for the erection of first-class dwellings has been forced to seek the west end of the city, from the prospect that Congress will condemn the larger part of "Capitol Hill;" while, on the other hand, the value of the property is annually increasing, and public policy would seem to dictate an early purchase, because the public necessity should be supplied with the least expense.

The interior decorations would require more space for their description than we can afford in a single article; the corridors and committee rooms are richly ornamented, the visitor walks upon the finest encaustic tiles, carved marble columns are on either side of him, and beautifully frescoed and gilded ceilings are over his head. The Representatives' Hall, in the south wing, is 139 feet long, and 93 feet wide, and although at first regarded as too ornate, in a few years, when time shall have toned the colors, it will be found as nearly faultless in its ornamentation as can be expected from so vast an undertaking. The criticisms upon its acoustic properties we believe to be exceedingly unjust; standing in the clerk's desk we have found no difficulty in being distinctly heard, with a very moderate exercise of our vocal powers, in any part of the vast chamber. The true reason of the imaginary acoustic defects will be found, we fancy, in the absurd arrangement for giving each member a desk. On the opening of the next Congress a very salutary and long-desired reform is to be inaugurated by the removal of all reading and writing facilities from the floor of the House. Formerly, instead of watching the debates, each member was engaged in franking, writing, or reading his correspondence. The business of the country will be expedited, and the comfort of the members vastly enhanced, by the adoption of the English system. Moreover, being brought into near contact, less space will be required; and having no unnecessary noises to distract their attention, members will find the new hall a very easy place to speak and hear in. A new plan of lighting the hall from above has been introduced, and is found to work admirably, except that the heat generated by the burning gas is sometimes very oppressive. The arrangements for heating and ventilating are excellent, and reflect great credit upon the architects. The new Senate Chamber is even richer in its appearance than the Hall of Representatives. It was occupied last winter, and gave entire satisfaction; the Senators, however, vacated their cheerful hall in the old building with great reluctance, and still regret the loss of their old-fashioned fire-places and the pleasant outlook from the windows. The approaches to these two halls are worthy of the great nation whose strength the Capitol so well symbolizes. The display of marbles, all from American quarries, could hardly be surpassed by any of the older countries. But, delightful as we find the theme, we must leave the description of the interior, with a single word of thanks to the architect, Mr. Walter, and the superintendent, Captain Meigs, for the excellent service they have done the State.

The Congressional Library, which was destroyed in 1851, has been replaced by a perfectly fire-proof building of great beauty, in which a superb collection of books is already classified and arranged. Immediately after the destruction of the former Library, Congress made an appropriation of $75,000 for the purchase of books; the judicious expenditure of this sum, and the annual appropriation of $7500, places at the disposal of Congress a very large and excellent library, to which access is, by courtesy, granted to literary men and others. The necessity for such an arrangement was foreseen by Mr. Jefferson, who succeeded in obtaining about 2500 volumes, which were all consumed in the British raid upon Washington in 1814. Under the management of the very efficient Joint Committee of Congress the present Library bids fair to become all that could be desired in a national collection of books.

In the article to which we have twice referred the hope is expressed that in five or six years what is known as the Mall would be improved so as to furnish a park worthy of the capital of the great republic; but, alas! even while the anticipation was being penned the master-spirit of that noble enterprise was passing through a painful exit from the beautiful, which always surrounded him below, to the beautiful above. In the melancholy death of Downing, America lost a man who had the wide vision to perceive, and the genius to execute, a work such as would have done honor to the nation. Since his decease but little has been done toward beautifying the space between the Capitol and the Potomac which is set apart for the people's park. It is only justice, however, to except the Congressional green-house, which has been vigorously and untriflingly advocated and fostered by the Hon. James A. Pearce, Senator from Maryland, whose refined taste and true gentlemanly instincts make him the unwavering friend of all that appertains to literature, art, or beauty. Under his judicious management the Congressional green-house, instead of being a mere flower-shop, has become, in floriculture, a central influence felt to the remotest verge of the country, wherever people love flowers, and wish to increase the number or virtue of these gentle ministers of the good and loving in nature.

Midway of the Mall stands the Smithsonian Institution, which has undergone little change, except that the various objects of curiosity, including articles brought home by the Japan and other exploring expeditions, have been removed from the Patent-Office, and placed here. In front of the building is the monument erected to the memory of the lamented Downing.

Just beyond the Smithsonian Institution, going toward the President's mansion, is the unfinished shaft which was originally intended to be a monument to Washington; but the spacious gallery which was to furnish us an American Walhalla exists only on paper, and the shaft seems to grow no higher. However, as the direction of this commendable enterprise has been recently returned to its original managers, we hope for more active measures. It would be a relief to those who have seen this unfortunate affair day after day, for seven years, to witness some energy expended upon it, even if it were only to pull down what has been erected.

In point of magnitude the extension of the Treasury Department, so as to form a suitable building for the Department of State, is, perhaps, the greatest undertaking at present in progress. The following engraving shows the south and west fronts of the new edifice. The work has been going on about three years, and is rapidly approaching completion. The original building is 342 feet long, fronting on Fifteenth Street, immediately east of the President's mansion. It presented an unbroken colonnade, the ends having been purposely left unfinished with the expectation that the present extension would ultimately be built. It produced a very unsatisfactory impression on the mind of the spectator, the imposing nature of the attempt not being fulfilled in the execution. The style of architecture is that known as Grecian Ionic—a perilous selection, for the attempts made in this country and in Europe to apply the Grecian style of architecture, either to public or private edifices of the present day, have generally been failures, so far as harmony, appropriateness, simplicity, and gracefulness are involved. Neither the taste nor the invention of the architects have usually been able to retain the spirit of the original when applied to buildings constructed for modern use.

Perhaps in no case is this more strikingly exemplified than in the old part of the Treasury building, as it stood when the extension commenced. The east front was a portico or colonnade, consisting of a long, uninterrupted line of Grecian Ionic columns, adopted for this work from the most elaborately ornamented examples of that order, but deprived of their entases, and mostly denuded of their proper ornamentation; both of which are essential to give to the columns their true dignity, grace, and character. Those columns are placed upon a perfectly plain base, or podium, forming the basement story of the building, to light the rooms in which its face is pierced between the columns with plain rectangular openings for windows. This podium has neither base, die, nor cornice, but rises smooth from the foundation, and is terminated at the top by the square arris or edge of the portico floors; nor have the windows in it any casings whatever. To add to its uncouthness, when an entrance to the building through the colonnade was required, it was found necessary to bring forward the podium some seven feet, as a screen to the stairs and platform required for the use of the public; thus making an unfortunate adjunct to the architecture of its façade. The wall under the portico (in Grecian architecture known as the wall of the cell) has a series of antæ, or pilasters, which correspond with, and are immediately in rear of, the columns. These antæ should have had a close correspondence, in style and character, with the columns; but by depriving their capitals, in a great measure, of their ornamentation, they detract from the beauty and harmony of other parts, to which they ought to add relief and support. In each of the spaces between the antæ are three openings, one above the other, for windows and doors, the upper tier being but one half the size of the two below. The three openings for doors are characterized by a very meagre architecture, not at all in keeping with the style of the building.

The entablature of the columns exhibits the fewest faults of any part of the arrangement, and the balustrade is tasteful and appropriate. The ordonnance of the rear of the old building consists of a Grecian Ionic anta or pilaster of the same intercolumnation, derived from the same example of the order as the east front. But the capitals, though composed of the same moulding, lack the necessary embellishment to give them distinctive character, and to harmonize them with other architectural parts of the building. The design for the extension, as prepared by T. U. Walter, Esq., upon the plan suggested by the Hon. R. M. T. Hunter, Senator from Virginia, and approved by committees of both branches of Congress, gave the general outline, in most respects corresponding with the old part; but the details varied so much that it was not possible to harmonize them, or intelligently carry them out. This led to the decision not to confine the details of the extension strictly to the details of the old building, but to make them such as would give the best effect to the style of architecture. It then became a question how far deviations could safely be made from the original work without departing from the principles of good taste. By reference to various buildings, ancient and modern, it was found that great latitude has always been used in architectural details. And if authority is wanted, sufficient is found in the single example of the Erechtheum (the temple of Minerva Polias, and the Pandrosium being but parts of it), to warrant far greater deviations than it has been found necessary to make in this case. The general design of the exterior was to flank the eastern front of the old building by pavilion terminations of the south and north wings, projecting some seven feet in front of the face of its columns. By this means it was to a great extent isolated from the extension, and all necessity for following its details avoided. Thus being left at liberty to make any judicious changes, the first point was to arrange the basement story so that it would not be liable to the objections of dampness, want of light and ventilation, incident to the old part. To effect this the floor was lowered two feet, which the gradual slope of the ground renders appropriate, and thereby the story is increased to 13 feet in height, and the windows, instead of being square and unsightly holes, are enlarged to proportions suggestive of comfort and elegance. Beneath this basement there is a cellar 12 feet in height. By this arrangement there is an extra wall of hammered gneiss extending from one foot above the cellar bottom to the grade of the surrounding ground. The walls of the extension, from the bottom of the cellar to the top of the building, viz.: cellar, basement, second and third stories, with the attic above, are of hammered granite. For the cellar wall the coarse granite, or gneiss, from the quarry at Port Deposit, Maryland, was originally selected, on account of its strong and durable character; but, after innumerable delays, it was found that sufficient quantities from that quarry could not be delivered with a rapidity consistent with economy in the prosecution of the work. Attempts were then made to obtain it from other points in the vicinity, and also from Richmond, Virginia, but without success; and the superintendents were compelled to procure much of the large stone for this purpose from the same quarries from which the material for the superstructure is delivered. The entire granite for the superstructure, and most of that for the foundations, is obtained from a quarry at Dix Island, near Rockland, off the coast of Maine. This is a barren island of granite, cresting out of the ocean, about five miles from the main land. The large blocks of granite taken from that quarry have a beauty, compactness, and uniformity nowhere else equaled in the world. So steep and sheer are the sides of the island that vessels drawing thirty feet of water come in direct contact with it, and the large masses of rock are quarried out and swung aboard without intermediate hauling. Vessels of peculiar construction and of great strength are made for the special purpose of shipping the immense pilasters, columns, and other large stones to Washington. The absence of all necessity for land-carriage renders this stone cheaper than that from Quincy and other places, much nearer the seat of Government than Dix Island.

the cellar, are: a basement story forming a stylobate, and, resting on it, an ordonnance of antæ of the Grecian Ionic order, 45 feet in height. The stylobate is intended to be decidedly of a Grecian character, its base, die, and cornice, are beautiful in themselves, but as here brought together they have an effect peculiarly appropriate and pleasing. The window openings in the die are managed so as to give them all the character needed, without loading them with ornament; and the whole arrangement of sills and piers, and the continued cornice, which serves as a window cap, is entirely novel. The antæ, and the filling of the spaces between them, are so arranged as to accomplish the very difficult combination of the adaptation of Grecian architecture to modern uses, without spoiling its inherent beauties. The style of architecture is more fully preserved, and its design carried out by the use of single blocks for the columns and antæ. These enormous masses are raised by means of machinery, designed by the superintending architect of this work, and used in raising the pillars of the Boston Custom-house, which was also built under his superintendency. The arrangement of the interior of the new building varies essentially from that of the old, and from public offices generally, in being divided into larger and more commodious rooms. Instead of the narrow, cell-like apartments, with one or at most two windows, into which the public departments in Washington are subdivided, the Treasury Extension will present the health-promoting novelty of spacious and airy saloons, capable of accommodating the clerical force of a bureau. The superintending architect has made a laudable and successful attempt to nationalize the interior embellishments, without in any degree impairing the general architectural effect. Indeed, in many cases, the elegance and symmetry of the details are improved by his national adaptations; for instance, the moulding, known as the "egg and dart," is substituted by an acorn and Indian's arrow-head; and while the transformation is too slight to alter the general effect, the symbols to the close observer are more satisfactory because more significant. This attempt to characterize by some well-known American emblem the leading points of the ornamentation, has also been successfully applied to the elaborate capitals of the interior columns. In these, while the general character of Grecian architecture is followed, in the composition the national eagle is made to perch proudly under each of the graceful volutes, surrounded by other characteristic emblems, adroitly blended, so as to produce an effect similar to other composite capitals adapted to this style.

In this way, through the whole interior, the common error has been avoided of adopting for the ornamentation the stereotyped scroll work, which, though graceful in itself, has no special significance, and has, besides, been degraded by its uniform application to the decoration of eating saloons and barbers' shops. In its place elegant designs of fruits, flowers, and other products of the American soil have been substituted. These details were designed by A. B. Young, Esq., the supervising architect. The old unfinished edifice was 342 feet in length, from north to south, the building as enlarged is 465 feet long, exclusive of the porticoes, by 266 in width; when completed it will present four fronts upon as many streets; and the long rectangular space between these four fronts is subdivided by a centre building, extending from east to west, into two courts, each about 130 feet square. These large interior courts, which are essential to the occupants of the range of interior apartments for purposes of light and air, will be adorned by grass, flowers, and the play of fountains of pure water.

The material of the old building is a very inferior, as well as unsightly sandstone, similar to that of which the old portions of the Capitol and Patent-Office and the President's House are constructed. Paint and putty, or mortar, have been resorted to for the double purpose of preventing disintegration, and of disguising the deformities of the walls; and in all the cases, except that of the Treasury, with decided success. Numerous, or, more properly, innumerable holes, from the size of a pea to that of an apple, have been plugged, and the sickly yellow of the stone in the other buildings has been covered by pure white. But less taste has been displayed on the Treasury. The columns and the pilasters are a pale or whitish yellow, and the walls between the pilasters are a dark yellow, or brown color. The gray granite basement has also been desecrated with paint, whether for the sake of uniformity or variety it is difficult to say—the result a very pale blue, being near enough to that of the colonnade above to leave the matter in doubt.

The General Post-Office has been enlarged by extending the building around the entire square, leaving a court-yard in the centre of 95 feet by 194 feet for light and air. The architectural style is palatial, and the order a modified Corinthian. The columns of the new portico each consist of a single block of Italian marble very beautifully chiseled, the capitals are of the same material, the design and the execution of these columns affording the most cheering evidence of the advance of American Art. On the Seventh Street front there is an open vestibule, the ceiling of which is composed of richly ornamented marbles, supported by four marble columns in the Doric order; the walls, niches, and floors, are also of marble, all being finely polished except the floor, which is richly tessellated in white and black. This is the grand entrance for the General Post-Office department, and harmonizes with the entrance to the Patent-Office which is on the next block north in the same street. The entrance for the mail wagons on Eighth Street consists of a grand archway, the spandrels of which are ornamented with sculpture representing Steam on one side, and on the other Electricity, while a mask representing Fidelity forms the key-stone. The F Street front is arranged for the accommodation of the City Post-Office; it has a deeply-recessed portico in the centre, consisting of eight columns grouped in pairs, and flanked by coupled pilasters, supporting an entablature which girts the entire work. The portico is supported by an arcade, which furnishes the most ample convenience for the delivery of letters to the public. Mr. T. U. Walter, the architect of the Capitol, who designed this extension of the Post-Office, has given the best evidence of his ability to discharge fitly his important obligations to the people, in the excellent arrangements he has here devised to combine simplicity, convenience, and beauty. We doubt if there is a building in the world more chaste and architecturally perfect than the General Post-Office as now completed. Without the imposing grandeur of its neighbor the Patent-Office, it is so symmetrical, and the details so faithfully executed, that it carries us back to the palmy days of Italian Art.

The immense building which is devoted to the Department of the Interior, including the Bureau of Patents, Indian Affairs, and General Land Office, has been enlarged, and its capacity more than doubled, the extension being demanded by the incredible amount of business transacted in the Department. We have not at hand the statistics of the patents issued in America since the establishment of the Government; but we venture to say that, startling as is the following statement, which we extract from a work published under the authority of the British Government, of the increase of the mechanical development in that country, the same period in American history would exhibit a more remarkable evidence of the wonderful impetus which the last century has given to material progress. In Great Britain,

From 1610 to 1700	there were patented	267 inventions.
" 1700 to 1800	"	2,067 "
" 1851 to 1855 (only four years)	"	10,000 "

Admitting only a similar increase in the patent business of our country, bearing in mind the constant and rapid opening of the Western wilderness to civilization, and the majestic Patent-Office, as now completed, will not seem unduly magnificent. It stands indeed as a very hopeful and significant sign of the growth, enterprise, and keen intellect of the nation. On a clear moonlight night there is nothing more beautiful than this immense edifice of pure marble, glistening with the moonbeams, and almost speaking to the beholder of the vastness of his country's power and the worth of its Union. The order of architecture in which this grand edifice is built is Grecian Doric; there are porticoes on the south, east, and west sides—the south portico being copied from the Pantheon. The total height is 74 feet 11 inches; it is 275 wide by 406 feet 6 inches long. In the third story are saloons for the exhibition and preservation of models, although until recently the space was occupied by an immense collection of curiosities which is now more properly deposited in the Smithsonian Institution.

We have been thus particular in describing these new buildings, because the architecture and taste of the nation ought to be represented by its public edifices. If it is true that the architecture of a people records their mental and moral condition, then certainly the contrast between the new and the old public buildings in Washington must be gratifying to every patriot. And we say this, not only as regards the greater size, but the marked regard for truthfulness in the designs, and the employment of material. We regret that at the Capitol, Treasury, and Patent-Office, the granite and marble should still be obliged to endure the company of the wretched sandstone used in the older portions of those buildings, and we are not without hope that the day is not far distant when this decaying stuff will be removed to make room for stone that needs neither paint nor putty to make it endurable. Unfortunately the General Post-Office, though built of marble, exhibits two very distinct kinds in the old and in the new portions of the edifice.

There is one other public work, which has just been completed, to which we beg briefly to call the reader's attention. The idea of supplying the City of Washington with water by an aqueduct extending to the Great Falls of the Potomac, is an enterprise which dates back to the beginning of the Federal Capital. It was a part of the original plan, approved and submitted to Congress by President Washington, and was then considered necessary as a safe-guard against fires, as well as for the purposes of health, convenience, and ornament. In that plan large and beautiful parks were to be laid off around the public buildings, to be ornamented with trees and shrubbery, and to be refreshed with fountains. It was probably Mr. Jefferson who proposed the Great Falls as the most proper source of the supply. His residence in France had given him large and liberal ideas as to the scale upon which such works should be planned, and satisfied him, economist and strict constructionist as he was, that any thing small or contracted in the display of national taste would be ten-fold worse than actual barbarism. Those who object to the expenditure of public money upon works of art and ornament about the national capital do so generally for want of reflection. They ask, "Why should the citizens of Washington be favored above those of all other cities in the Union? Why should the Government build streets, and parks, and aqueducts for Washington, and give not a cent for such purposes to Philadelphia, New York, New Orleans, or St. Louis?" The answer is easy. Nothing is given for the people of Washington. They may reap incidental advantages greater than the citizens of other places, because they have chosen Washington for their abode; but all such expenditures are made in order to render the seat of Government worthy of the nation.

Washington was founded in the wilderness. The President and Cabinet and members of Congress found it difficult to traverse the "magnificent distances," either in carriages or on foot, for many years after the Government resided here. The population was small and poor, and utterly incapable of paving any one of the immense streets, which the accommodation of the public officers demanded. What was to be done? Whose duty was it to provide for the public accommodation? Was it not, and is it not, as clearly the duty of the Federal Government to incur these expenses as to build a Capitol? To this day there is but one street in Washington paved by the Government for more than a few squares. Pennsylvania Avenue, from the Capitol to Georgetown, a distance of about two miles and a half, is the exception. The other paving, save that around the public buildings, has been done by the citizens, and that without the privilege of taxing public property.

It is due to the national dignity that Washington should be, if not a great city, a great centre of whatever is noble and beautiful in architecture and the fine arts. The President could live in a log cabin, and Congress might meet under a tent, in good weather, or perhaps your rigid economist would grant a large square brick building, such as is used for cotton factories. But the public intelligence and taste demand that the halls of legislation and the departments of Government shall be noble in construction and of the best materials; combining the greatest degree of comfort with the highest style of beauty. Any thing short of this would be derogatory to the national character, and for that reason we might almost say unconstitutional! Hence the Capitol, the President's House, and the Departments must be marble palaces, adorned with statuary and painting, and surrounded by parks, and trees, and flowers, and fountains. There should be libraries, and picture-galleries, and museums; and whatever illustrates civilization in its highest walks. This is what people expect to find when they visit Washington, and they never fail to complain when they are in any respect disappointed.

The aqueduct now being constructed was projected during the latter part of Mr. Fillmore's administration. The President, in a letter dated September 13, 1852, committed to the Engineer Department the duty of making a survey and estimates of the best manner of introducing into Washington and Georgetown "an unfailing and abundant supply of good and wholesome water." Captain Frederick A. Smith, of the corps, was assigned by Colonel Totten, its chief, to the performance of this duty, from which he was removed within a few weeks thereafter by sudden death. He was succeeded on the 3d November of the same year by the present Superintendent of the work, Captain, then Lieutenant, Montgomery C. Meigs, of the same corps. The Report of this officer, dated February 12, 1853, presents an elaborate statement of the advantages of three available sources of supply: Rock Creek, a small tributary of the Potomac, which divides Washington from Georgetown; the Little Falls of the Potomac, at a distance of four miles above the city; and the Great Falls, sixteen miles above. The latter was adopted. To bring the water from this place it was necessary to construct a conduit fourteen miles in length. But the elevation is such as to render pumping unnecessary. The height of the water above the dam which turns it into the aqueduct is 150 feet above high tide at the city wharves; and the inclination of the conduit is only about nine inches to the mile; so that the head of water in the distributing reservoir is nearly 140 feet above tide-water, and 14 feet above the upper floors of the Capitol. The dam across the Potomac is 2100 feet in length and 8 feet in height. The water thus diverted from the river passes by a tunnel or culvert under the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal into a receptacle known as the Gate-House. It is excavated out of the solid rock, and will be surmounted by a structure of beautiful sandstone from the Seneca Quarry, a few miles above. This Gate-House will exclude drift-wood and other foreign substances from the conduit.

The river, from the falls to Georgetown, passes between high ranges of hills, often rugged and precipitous in outline, but always picturesque. "The traveler," says Captain Meigs, "ascending the banks of the Potomac from Georgetown to the Great Falls, would conclude that a more unpromising region for the construction of an aqueduct could not be found. Supported by high walls against the face of jagged and vertical precipices, in continual danger of being undermined by the foaming torrent which boils below, the Canal (the Chesapeake and Ohio) is a monument of the energy and daring of our engineers. The route appears to be occupied, and no mode of bringing in the water, except by iron pipes secured to the rocks, or laid in the bed of the canal, seems practicable. Such were my own impressions; and though I knew that in this age, with money, any achievement of engineering was possible, I thought the survey would be needed only to demonstrate by figures and measures the extravagance of such a work. But," he continues, "when the levels were applied to the ground, I found, to my surprise and gratification, that the rocky precipices and difficult passages were nearly all below the line which, allowing a uniform grade, would naturally be selected for our conduit; and that, instead of demonstrating the extravagance of the proposal, it became my duty to devise a work presenting no considerable difficulties, and affording no opportunities for the exhibition of any triumphs of science or skill."

The obstacles encountered in the construction of the aqueduct may have been less serious than an engineer would have anticipated upon a casual inspection of the ground; but they can not fail to astonish the unscientific spectator; and it is not impossible that Captain Meigs's decided preference for the Great Falls as a source of supply may have caused him, in his report of surveys, from which we quote, to underrate obstacles of which he had in the first instance formed an exaggerated estimate. The original plan was to make the conduit, which was to be tubular in form, seven feet in diameter; but at the same time one of nine feet in diameter was suggested as preferable, and was adopted. The difference of only two feet in the width of the conduit makes the immense difference of nearly two to one in its capacity. One of seven feet will discharge but thirty-six millions of gallons in twenty-four hours, while a nine-foot conduit will supply above sixty-seven and a half millions. The larger dimensions adopted of course adds something to the expense of the work, but not in any proportion to the additional supply of water. There are in all eleven tunnels, some of them several hundred feet in length, and six bridges. The largest of the bridges is one of the most stupendous achievements of the kind in this country. It spans a small tributary of the Potomac, called the Cabin John Creek, by a single arch 220 feet in span, and 100 feet high. The receiving reservoir is formed by throwing a dam across a small stream known as the Powder-Mill, or Little Falls Branch. The dam is of pounded earth and floods above fifty acres, making a reservoir of irregular shape, containing, at a level of 140 feet above high tide, 82,521,500 gallons. The water leaves it at a distance of 3000 feet from the point where it enters, and, in slowly passing across this pool, which deepens to 30 or 40 feet near the exit, it will deposit most of its sediment. The Powder-Mill itself supplies two to three millions of gallons of pure water daily to the reservoir. The estimated cost of the Washington Aqueduct is $2,500,000, and the daily supply 67,596,400 gallons; the Croton Aqueduct cost $10,375,000, and furnishes New York with a minimum supply of 27,000,000; Philadelphia is provided with a daily supply of 15,000,000; and Boston with 10,176,570 gallons. These comparisons give the best illustration of the magnitude of the work undertaken and nearly brought to a successful completion at Washington.

In the midst of all the magnificence of the public buildings, it is a little surprising that, with a population of sixty-five or seventy thousand, there should not be a single church whose architecture justifies ever so brief a notice; without exception, the church edifices present an appearance that would be considered a disgrace to a Western city of twenty thousand inhabitants.

Among the ancients the capital city, or seat of empire, was the State. The denizens of the country, even in the republics, had no political rights except such as the city to which they owed allegiance chose to concede to them. We read of the republic of Athens, not of Attica, of Sparta, not of Laconia, of Carthage, of Rome, and so on, not of the subject provinces. The Roman empire, in the first centuries of the Christian era, embraced nearly the whole of the then civilized world, with a large portion of that which was recognized as barbarous, and all the immense countries from the Pillars of Hercules, or Straits of Gibraltar, on the west, and the frontiers of Caledonia on the north, to the confines of Persia, acknowledged the sway, and bore the name of the imperial city of Rome. Under the more ancient despotisms we discover the same pre-eminence of the cities over the country, in the histories of Babylon, Nineveh, Tyre, and the Egyptian capitals. In the modern nations of Europe, which have risen upon the ruins of the Roman empire, new elements of power have come into play—new elements of race, of language, of religion, and of political principles—society, in fact, resting upon a stronger foundation of ideas. The most powerful and extensive of modern empires is not the “London empire,” but the British; the power and importance of a whole people are thus recognized in the style of the empire, and London, though perhaps more wealthy and populous than Rome in her palmiest days, has less political power than any half-dozen representative boroughs. The city has not made the kingdom, but has grown up with it, and been fostered by its trade. It has been the seat of government immemorably, though not uninterruptedly, simply as a matter of public convenience, and by the choice of the rulers of England. The same may be said of Paris; the proverbial saying that “Paris is France,” is a scarcely warrantable exaggeration. Whatever liberties are enjoyed in France, are enjoyed equally by the whole population without regard to locality. The representation is apportioned with reference to population, and we believe that Paris, like London, is not particularly favored in this respect. The American capital, although voted into being by a free people, occupies the anomalous position of being the only one in history which is denied the privileges that are accorded to the meanest hamlet in the remotest department of the empire. For even our Territories may each send a delegate to the National Legislature; and being incipient States, sovereignties in embryo, may look forward to the time when they are to participate in all the privileges of the proudest of the Old Thirteen. Not so the capital. She may rival Rome in populousness, wealth, and magnificence; her citizens may live under the shadow of marble palaces, or promenade on avenues paved with mosaic work, or stroll through gardens shaded with evergreens and exotics, perfumed with flowers, and cooled with fountains and sparkling waterfalls—but they can not vote! They can have no Senators, no Representatives—no voice in the election of President. This anomalous condition of the national capital, so different from the capitals of the ancient republics, illustrates the complete revolution which has taken place in the affairs of mankind and the policy of nations in the course of two thousand years.

We have endeavored to confine our article to a review of existing things, and yet, in examining it, we perceive that we have slightly drawn upon our anticipations; but we are comforted with the reflection that America is entitled to a large use of the future tense. Foreign criticism properly wonders at our constant employment of the phrases, “going to be” and “going to do,” but it is also true that abroad—except in Russia—they can only use the past tense; for their noblest monuments and most beautiful surroundings are only the heir-looms and old clothes of departed generations. Their noblest mission is preservation, ours is creation. For a long period Washington expectancy was a laughing-stock for every wandering Englishman, who chose to dish up our national peculiarities in a hash of guide-books, private journals, Munchausen stories collected in cars and stage-coaches, and confused recollections of three months devoted to diligent examination into the properties of sherry-cobblers, large oysters, and Catawba wine. And yet, at this hour, London is paying a fearful penalty for its neglect of that planning for the future which foreigners thought so ridiculous in the wide avenues and green spaces of Washington. Spacious pleasure-grounds are the best friends of law and order; it is well for the people to play, and the instinct of childhood points to the open air as the best place for recreation. A grass-plot has a magical virtue for “clearing the breast of perilous stuff.” During the fierce heat of summer, it is pleasant to see the large concourse of people which pours into the Capitol grounds, or those around the President’s mansion, sitting under the shade of the trees, while the Marine Band furnishes the choicest music; and it requires no poetic enthusiasm to picture the coming day when the Mall, stretching from the Capitol to the margin of the noble Potomac, shall be one continuous shade, covered with glorious foliage, and vocal with the rippling of fountains and the song of birds. Then hard-handed toil and weary brains shall find in every sight and sound of beauty not only rest, but hope—hope for the perpetuity of that strong Union which, having created this costly capital, may find it a centre of attraction sufficiently strong to marshal around it the orderly States, and to control even the wildest comets that seek to fly off into new orbits. Then the seat of Government, adorned as becomes the representative city of America—not claiming to be the fountain of power—shall be a beautiful lake, formed by the rills that flow into it from north and south, from east and west, and shall forever mirror, on its placid bosom, the great forms of the mountains from whose sides it is fed.

HOLIDAYS IN COSTA RICA.

BY THOMAS FRANCIS MEAGHER.

FOREST, WITH COFFEE-CARTS.

I.—PUNTA ARENAS TO SAN JOSÉ.

THE principal entrance at present into Costa Rica is from the Pacific, at Punta Arenas, in the Gulf of Nicoya. The Columbus, a deliberate old barque through which a screw has been thrust, brought us, early in March, 1858, from Panama to Punta Arenas in less than three days.

The trip was delightful. The coast-range of Veragua, the northernmost province of New Granada, was within sight—often within stone's-throw—the whole of the way. There were the mountains of the promontory of Azuero, glowing through the blue haze all day long. There were the rocks of Los Frailes—gray rocks belted with sparkling breakers, in and out, and wide over the spray of which thousands of sea-birds sported—flashing in the sunset. There were the stars when the sun was gone—the white beach gleaming beyond the line of purpled waters—and here and there the fire of some lone hut in the forest high above the coast. At all times the sea was smooth—smooth as a lake in summer in the midst of warm wooded hills—and at noon it was wondrously beautiful and luminous; so luminous that, looking down into its depths, one might have been wooed to fancy it had a floor of diamonds, and that the pink and yellow sea-flowers, loosened and floating upward from it, bubbling as they rose, were made of the finest gold.

As for the company on board, ever so many nationalities, professions, phases of life and destinies, were comprehended in it. St. George had his champion in Mr. Perry—an affable, intelligent, high-spirited young Englishman, who had just been gazetted to the British Vice-Consulate at Realejo, Nicaragua, and was on his way to Guatemala to receive his instructions from Mr. Wyke, the Consul-General. The Eagles of Napoleon were sentinelled by a vehement Frenchman—a short, hardy, wiry, flexible, swarthy fellow, in nankeen trousers, glazed pumps and Panama hat—who kept perpetually gliding up and down the deck, emphasizing his opinions on music, politics, and commerce to a lanky German with a pale mustache, who, as though he were condemned to it, limped the planks beside him.

This Frenchman was singularly active, adventurous, daring. He began life as a fisherman. From his cradle on one of the terraces of Brest, he was cast adrift into the fogs of Newfoundland, and there blossomed into manhood on grog and cod-fish. Slipping away from the Banks, he took to the world at large. He had been every where—been to the Antipodes—been to the Poles. With frogs and crocodiles, snake-charmers and ballet-girls, icebergs and palm-groves, he was equally familiar. Five years ago he found himself in the town of David, in the province of Veragua, two hundred miles above Panama; and there, falling in love with a radiant Indian girl, whom he married at sight, concluded to settle. Since then it has fared well with him.

His was, in truth, a golden wedding. It brought him herds, plantations, ships, vast plains and forests. Some will have it that he is in secret possession of certain gold mines—a veritable El Dorado—in the mountains of the Isthmus. The day previous to our leaving it he arrived in Panama, fresh and lithe, after a ride from David of eighteen days through the wildest region. Raging rivers, too deep to ford, oftentimes broke his path. Into these, his clothes bundled up in a turban on his head, he had to plunge, and, battling across them, take his mule in tow. He was bound for San José, the capital of Costa Rica, as we ourselves were.

Venezuela was somewhat disparagingly represented by a tough and squalid merchant doing business in Panama. Importing silk-stuffs and wines, sardines and prunes, he is largely concerned in the pearl-fisheries of the Isla del Rey, and the other islands off the coast. His heart is as close as an oyster, and his face as expressionless and coarse as the shell. Guatemala was more fortunate. Señor Larraonda appeared for her. His figure and complexion do injustice to his liberality and graciousness. He is a tall, parched, sallow-faced gentleman, with a patch of gray whisker under each ear, and the fingers of a skeleton; but those fingers have clutched many a broad doubloon. A sugar planter on the princeliest scale, his estate has yielded him $200,000 every season for the last four years.

Close to the wheel-house, immediately after breakfast every morning, two priests invariably took their seats. Both were from Spain. The one was a Catalanian, the other an Arragonese. The Catalanian was a Capuchin. The Arragonese was a Jesuit. The Jesuit was the more remarkable of the two.

He had a freckled face, a blood-shot eye, red beard and whiskers, a faded velvet skull cap, thread-bare soutaine, and plain steel buckles in his sprawling shoes. But underneath that threadbare gown we were told there throbbed a zealous heart. Underneath that faded velvet skull-cap there glowed a fertile brain. The Jesuit was learned, eloquent, and pious. A profound Divine, a commanding Orator, an adventurous Soldier of the Cross, he, too, had seen most of the world. He had been to China, the Philippine Islands, Paraguay, Brazil. There was more than one on board whom his history had reached. His labors, his sacred rhetoric, his heroism in all those lands, had made him famous.

The morning of the third day out from Panama, the Gulf of Nicoya opened to admit us. Away to the left, Cape Blanco, the eastern pier of this great gate-way glimmered through the mist. Away to the right, the volcano of Herradura, with the brown island of Cano sleeping in its shadow, stood as a watch-tower at the entrance. Farther up the Gulf, as the mist thinned off, the loftier mountains came forth and shone above the waters. There was the dome of San Pablo, with masses of white cloud resting on it. There was the peak of the Aguacate quivering in the sun. Beyond, and high above them all, were the mountains of Dota, blending—as though they were vapors only—with the deepening glory of the sky. All along the opposite shore, clusters of little islands—the Nigrites, San Lucas, and Pan Sucre—scrubby, barren islands, the roots of which are rich in pearls—one by one peeped out and twinkled. In the mean while the breeze freshened and grew warm; and the sea, broken into little hillocks, lisped and throbbed around us. At noon it was thronged and bustling. We were at our destination.

Straggling up and down a long low bank of sand which gleamed across the Gulf, there was Punta Arenas, with its red-tiled roofs, whitewashed frame-houses, church-towers, flag-staffs, and dusky huts thatched with plantain leaves. Dotting the glaring picture at different points, and shading it a little, there was the indigo-tree, the poisonous manzanilla, and the palm. Right before us on the beach was a wooden light-house, built and daubed in the fashion of a pagoda. Off there, in the roadstead, was the French flag drooping at the mizen-peak of a brig, from the quarter-deck of which a shining telescope had been leveled at us. Nearer to us a Dutch barque, with an awning stretched from stem to stern, and her broadside hung with matting to keep the timbers from the sun, lay dead upon the tide. All about us were swarms of smaller craft—boats, piraguas, scows, bongos—taking freight to the ships, or taking it away. All round us were the mountains and the forest, girdling the eager and glowing scene with solid grandeur and overlooking it in silence; while the church bells suddenly rang out, announcing that the good Jesuit had arrived and was hastening to the pulpit of San Rafael.

Beautiful as Punta Arenas looks from the glowing Gulf of Nicoya, it is somewhat behind the age. It has no pier, no wharf, no new or old slip—nothing of the kind. You go ashore in a boat, a bongo or a scow, just as the fancy strikes you or your purse permits. A boat will cost a dollar. Should the tide be out, the last fifty yards or so of the journey to town, being through the slimiest mud, have to be got over on the back of a native, whose knees, as I can vouch, are none of the steadiest when put to the test of 200 pounds of Irish flesh and blood, a double-barreled fowling-piece and riding-boots included.

There is an inner and an outer harbor. The latter—admitting vessels of considerable draught—is safe, capacious, and easy of access. Vessels, however, drawing more than seven feet of water, have to anchor a league from the landing-place, where their cargoes are broken, and thence are brought ashore in scows or lighters. This, of course, is a tedious and wasteful operation, entails expense, and incurs no inconsiderable risk. The inner harbor—formed by the main land and the sandy promontory or spit over which the town is scattered—is accessible to coasting-sloops, piraguas, and small schooners only.

Half an hour ashore familiarizes the stranger with all that is to be seen in Punta Arenas. Close by the landing, ten to one, he comes upon a team of unyoked oxen, munching the green tops of the sugar-cane and cooling themselves in the shade of the guanacaste, the roots of which lie deep in the blistering sand. Trudging with aching ankles through this sand he reaches the Plaza, in the centre of which stands a wooden obelisk—a sentry-box of raw workmanship and gaunt proportions—commemorative of the services of General José María Cañas, who fought so bravely, and with such magnanimity demeaned himself in the war against the Filibusters. General Cañas is a native of Punta Arenas, and to his generous encouragement and public spirit the prosperity it enjoys is chiefly owing. There is nothing—nothing whatever—of the militaire about the General. His features, manner, walk and style of conversation, are those of a very ordinary civilian. This, however, is owing to his extreme modesty and reserve. These verge on an awkward timidity. But after a little—when one has been a few minutes in conversation with him—his countenance lights up, and you see through his clear calm eye, his firm thin lip, and the opinions he concisely enunciates, that he is a man of inflexible purpose, judgment, and bravery. He is most courteous too, kind, chivalrous, and gentle.

TESTIMONIAL TO GENERAL CAÑAS.

The market-place lies a little off the main street, a short distance from the Plaza. It was a bustling place the evening we visited it. The coffee was coming down from the interior—several carts laden with it had already reached the Port—and all the booths and stores were crowded. So were the cob-webbed verandas and arcades, shading three sides of the buzzing scene. Pyramids of cocoa-nuts and oranges, rags and garters of dried beef, snowy skirts and rainbow-colored shawls, straw hats and sandals of raw leather, machetes and clanking spurs, the greenest vegetables, parrots, prepared fruits, musical instruments, cheese and pickles, salt-fish and gaudily-printed cotton-goods, black pigs, stewed beans and monkeys, the choicest and the strangest novelties were piled up, spread out, and jumbled there.

Here, in the coolest corner of the square, was a galaxy of mules, radiating from a post to which they had been brought up short and tethered by the nose. All about—lying down or patiently bearing their ponderous yokes erect—were the ox-teams that had supplied the market with its choicest goods. At every point—wherever it seemed a stake could be driven home—a fighting-cock was held to bail, and, spite of it, kept the public peace disturbed. The bells of San Rafael, where the good Jesuit was to preach at sundown, rattled their shrill tongues all the while. Every now and then the trumpet at the gate of the cuartel flourished in and swelled the riot, while, at steady intervals, the thunders of the Dutch barque in the roadstead opened, for the Consul-General of the Hanseatic Towns was paying her an official visit, and in his honor fire-works and bunting were the order of the day.

In the midst of all this dust, glare and uproar, in the back-room of a posada, close to the market-place, a blind man sat, and, with his dark eyes vaguely following his busy hands, played on the marimba, to the delight of a breathless circle that had deepened round him.

Shrouded in the mantilla, there was in that quiet circle more than one bright face bent on Miguel Cruz, of Nicaragua, as he touched the keys of his rude instrument, and made them vocal with his memories of Indian and Spanish song. He was accompanied on the guitar by a speckled native of Massaya.

The performance over, the sun gone down, the market-place deserted, we retired to the American Hotel—a dismal dusty barn kept by a Galician dwarf with a broken nose—where we lay awake on leather-bottomed stretchers in the supper-room, sweltering and writhing in the midst of the sauciest cock-crowing all night long, and in the morning washed ourselves out of a yellow pie-dish in a back piazza, on the steps of the kitchen.

Punta Arenas is the principal port of Costa Rica. For the present, indeed, it may be said to be the only one. It is the only one, at all events, of any commercial consequence. The Bay of Salinas is unfrequented—so is the Gulf of MARKETING IN PUNTA ARENAS.

Dolce. Both of them await in their solitary grandeur the invasion of the wilderness which for miles and miles surround them. On the Atlantic, the port of Matina affords anchorage for craft of the lightest draught only, and is too shallow and exposed to admit of an improvement. Between the Boca del Toro and the interior there is no road whatever. A noble harbor—one of the noblest in the world—Costa Rica concedes the Boca in a treaty, bearing date the 11th of June, 1856, to New Granada, who, by virtue of a chart, published at Madrid in 1805, demands it as a portion of her ancient jurisdiction. It is useless to both of them. For any practical advantage it promises to either, it might as well be a mirage of Sahara. The new road, contemplated to the Serapiquí, will render the port of San Juan del Norte supremely serviceable to Costa Rica. But as it is, Punta Arenas monopolizes the commerce of the country.

It is a free port, moreover, having been privileged as such in 1847 by an Act of the Costa Rican Congress, seven years after the deadly port of Caldera, three miles lower down the coast, had been abandoned. All articles of merchandise, with the exception of brandy and other distilled liquors, tobacco and gunpowder, are exempt from every kind of restriction. The excepted articles, being Government monopolies, are deposited in the Public Stores, and can not be sent into nor out of the country without a special permít. Munitions of war and fire-arms are subject to a like restraint. Otherwise the fullest liberty is guaranteed to commerce. Ships too may pass in and out, and remain as long as they like, without the slightest annoyance. There is neither tonnage nor pilotage, nor souvenirs to Custom-house Inspectors, nor anchorage, nor perquisites to Health Officers, nor any other leeching incurred. Lighterage is the only expense. A wharf or causeway to the anchorage in the outer harbor, would do away with this.

The Custom-house stands sixty miles off in the interior, at the Garita del Río Grande, low down on the slope of a black ravine. It is there the duties on foreign goods are levied, as it is from that point alone such goods find their way to the towns and villages and the other inhabited portions of the country. Between that point and Punta Arenas a vast wilderness intervenes. The villages of Esparza, San Mateo, and Atenas do not disturb the solitude. They are lost in it. At all events, it is not until the Custom-house at the Garita disappears behind him, in the gorge of the Río Grande, that the importer finds any market worth talking of. There is Alajuela for him then, and Heredia further on, and San José beyond that again, and Cartago, with her aristocracy and ruins, the inveterate rival of San José, away behind the Cordilleras.

In addition to its being a free port, Punta Arenas is a bathing-place of fashionable resort. It is the Newport of Costa Rica. The season opens in January and closes in March. The first families of the country have their bathing-boxes, oyster stews, private cottages, picnics and fundangos there. The Gulf of Nicoya abounds in oysters of a delicious flavor, abounds in shrimps and lobsters, abounds in fish of several varieties, all of the best description. The pearl oyster of the Gulf is famous for its size and beauty. It was strikingly referred to by General Morazan in the splendid defiance he launched in 1839 against the serviles of Guatemala—*Ni las perlas del Golfo de Nicoya, ni el oro del Río Guayape, volverán á adornar la corona del Marques de Aice-nina, este simbolo horroroso de la Aristocracia.**

Punta Arenas is also noted for its excellent water, which bubbles up from the bottom of wells a few feet deep. The climate too is wholesome notwithstanding the heat, the prevailing intensity of which may be inferred from the fact, that the day we arrived the thermometer stood 90° in the shade. Mr. Squier, in his sketch of Costa Rica, quoting the opinion of Captain Lapelin, of the French navy, seems unwilling to concede to Punta Arenas any higher degree of salubrity than that which prevents its being positively fatal to human life. Señor Felipe Molina, however, maintains that Punta Arenas is distinguished for its healthfulness, the purity of its atmosphere and its perfect exemption from miasmatic influences, circumstances arising, as he justly insists, from its peninsular position and the nature of its soil. The general opinion of the country confirms the more favorable impression, and in this opinion the foreign residents of Costa Rica unhesitatingly concur.

But this is not all. Punta Arenas boasts of something else. There is a railroad running through it to the left bank of the Barranca. It is a railroad nine miles long. Built by a party of English speculators, at an expense of $80,000, under the delusion that it would take, to and from the Barranca, all the merchandise passing to and from the interior and capital, they awoke, the day it was finished, to the fact that, for the speculation to pay, a quintal of coffee would have to be charged for the nine miles by railroad, about as much as it cost, or would cost, the whole of the journey, seventy-five miles and upward, by ox-cart or mule-back. Hence it is a losing, if it be not by this time an irretrievably lost, concern. No one uses it save the lame, the lazy, the sick and the blind. The locomotive is an abject mule; and it is mournful indeed to behold the meek creature hauling a bleak house, with two dozen windows in it, after his hoofs, for nine miles through the sand, at the rate of two miles an hour.

* Neither the pearls of the Gulf of Nicoya, nor the gold of the River Guayape, shall ever again adorn that hated symbol of Aristocracy, the coronet of the Marquis of Aice-nina.

The evening of the day following our arrival from Panama we set out for the mountains. An hour of brisk galloping, along the beach which connects the town of Punta Arenas with the main land, brought us to Chacarita, an outpost of the Custom-house at the Garita. It is here that all foreign goods, destined for any point between the port and the Garita, are subjected to inspection, are weighed, and paid for. The outpost consists of a spacious hut, built of bamboo and wild sugar-cane, a banana-patch, and a poultry-yard. In the smoky interior of the hut, as we rode up to it, an Inspector of Customs, with the stump of a yuro between his placid lips, serenely oscillated in his shirt-sleeves in his hammock of agave straw. Having satisfied him that the blue California blankets strapped to our saddles contained a change of linen only, the calm Inspector, without rising from his hammock, with a gentle wave of his discolored hand, signified that we were at liberty to proceed. A moment after we were in the heart of the forest.

Here, in all its varieties, we had, the palm—the prince of the vegetable kingdom as Linnæus has called it—ever waving those plume-like branches which recall so many scenes of Scriptural beauty, festivity and triumph—so many scenes of hopefulness and succor in the desert, and of life in the midst of death—and which, as many a carving and vivid painting on sacred walls attest, grew to be, in the red epochs of Christianity, the emblem of Martyrdom for the Faith. Here was the ceiba, or the silk-cotton tree, the shaft of which swells to such a girth that the largest canoes are hewn out of it, while Sir Amyas Leigh, the romantic buccaneer, likens it to a light-house, so smooth and round and towering is it. Myriads of singing-birds build their nests in it, while from the topmost branches, to which they have climbed in search of light and air, the rose and yellow and red bigonias in luxuriant tresses and festoons uncoil themselves. Here was the matapalo, or wild fig-tree, spreading out its long, tender, flexible stems over the surrounding trees in quest of some temporary support, and having found it, and grown strong enough to sustain itself, turning upon and killing its protector in its serpent-like embraces. Here, too, were several species of the acacia, such as the guanacaste and saman, the delicate feathery foliage of which was interwoven and blended with the orange blossoms and the large lanceolated leaves of the cincona. And then we had the parasitical cactuses in endless varieties, with their pink and violet and cream-colored flowers, clustering the moss-covered columns of the forest, and flooding the golden air with the richest fragrance. A deep, solemn, beauteous, yet majestic, forest—one of the vast cathedrals of Nature—one fashioned of materials, living, efflorescent, fruitful, imperishable—imperishable since they perpetually renew themselves—to which the gold of the Sacramento is but as the dust of the road, and the marbles of Carrara are but the types of death—one down through the complex aisles of which, as through no stained window however wonderful its magic, the light of Heaven, colored with a thousand intermediate hues, by day and by night, and for all time, with an ever-varying infinitude of splendor, plays—one studded with pillars, spanned with arches, such as neither Zwirner of Cologne nor Angelo of Rome, with all their genius, with all their power, with all the resources of which, with the patronage of kings and pontiffs, they were the masters, could rear, elaborate, nor so much as in their divinest dreams devise!

In the midst of all this—winding through the mazes of this superb labyrinth—hundreds of carts, in the months of February and March, move down. The noble oxen have their foreheads shaded with the broad shining leaves of the pavel. They come from Cartago, from San José, from the great plantation of Pacifica, in the valley of the Tiribi, in the shadow of the mountains of San Miguel—from the plateaux beyond the ruins of Ujarras, and overlooking the cataracts of the wild Berbis—descend four thousand feet into this forest, and so wend their way to Punta Arenas, at which port—with the exception of a few bags which find their way to the Serapiquí, and thence to the Atlantic—the entire coffee-crop of Costa Rica is shipped to Europe and the United States.

The carts are clumsy structures. A pole projects from an oblong frame, to which an axle is bolted underneath. The ends of the axle protrude through discs or solid wheels of cedar, the latter being four inches across the tire, and from four to five feet in diameter. Within the wheels we have some open cane-work, and this supports an awning of untanned ox-hide. A cart got up in this style costs from $25 to $30. The team itself generally costs from $75 to $80. The coffee lies upon the platform or bottom of the cart, sown up in bags of coarse white cotton. One of these carts will carry from 800 to 1000 pounds of coffee. The freight is a trifle less than 75 cents for every 100 pounds. Over the bags another hide is fastened with leather thongs, while an iron pot, a calabash for holding water, and other utensils of use along the road, dangle on the outside. Peering out from underneath the ox-hide covering, one may oftentimes surprise the black lustrous eyes and ruby lips of some bronzed daughter of the mountains.

For the wives and children of the carreteros, in most instances, attend the coffee to the port. In the long journey—it is a journey of six days at least—they are companionable and most useful. They grind the corn for the tortillas, boil the frijoles, slice and fry the plantains, ply the thread and needle, tend the oxen with water and sacate, and in various other ways prove themselves the kindest handmaids and ministers of comfort to the honest fellows who trudge along on foot, and with the chuzo—their slender steel-spiked wand—direct the docile teams.

These carreteros, with a wonderful endurance, flexibility of limb and spirit, go through the hardest work. From the start to the close of their journey—barefooted, in their draggled linen, at the mercy of the shifting weather—at one time sweltering and bending in the full blaze of the sun, at another soaking in the rain, or shuddering with the dense dampness which, be it night, or be it noontide, or be it sunset, the lowlands and deep forests gather round them—light-limbed, patient, sinewy, active, fearless, gracious in manner, faithful to their trust—in every vicissitude of the Heavens, against all odds, they resolutely pursue their way. Behold the industry of freedom! Of honest industry behold the in-offensive heroism! No trumpets to proclaim it—no triumphal arches to mark its progress, save those with which the hand of God has spanned the pathways of the forest—the consciousness of doing what is right, of rendering to the homestead and the nation the service that is due to them, vivifies and suffuses it with lustre, and the Angels, who watched over the shepherds tending their flocks in the green solitudes of Bethlehem, are the invisible witnesses and the chroniclers of its glory!

Night closed upon this scene. The rain fell heavily. Through the deep murmuring of the Barranca, as we forded it, following in the wake of three carts on their way up the mountains—through the pattering and splashing of the rain, and the doleful music of the branches, swaying to and fro, and the quivering of their leaves—there came the chorus of the howling monkeys, the araguatos, whose deep guttural tones, echoing for miles through the forest, predict the inevitable storm, and, when it comes, swell the vocal tribulations of the hour.

The extraordinary development of the larynx in this monkey imparts to its voice a depth and volume equal to that of the largest quadruped, that of the lion, perhaps, alone excepted. Every morning and evening, and whenever it threatens rain, crowds of these araguatos assemble in the tops of the highest trees, in the loneliest and wildest forests, and, enthroned there, rend the air with their dismal utterances. One of them invariably assumes the leadership of the choir, chanting out in an undertone the first notes of the chorus as it were, after which all the rest follow in a crescendo movement, and with voices of a higher pitch, until the monstrous music seems to subside from sheer exhaustion. On a clear bright morning the howling of the araguatos can be heard very distinctly two miles off, and Humboldt is of opinion it can be heard fully a third of this distance further during the night, especially when the weather is cloudy, hot, and humid.

Nor night, however, nor wild rivers which we had to ford in the wake of returning carts, nor splashing rain, nor monkeys with unearthly howlings, nor mules, economically fed by their shrewd owners, giving out, breaking down, and forcing us finally to lead them, knee-deep in mud—nothing of the sort—and there was enough to vex the tamest saint—prevented us reaching, at a reasonable hour, the city or village of Esparza.

The yelping of dogs—the crowing of cocks—small panes of glass glimmering through the blackness of the night—the tinkling of a guitar at an open door-way, and a row of greenish bottles shining along a shelf against the whitewashed wall opposite the door-way—the coarse round pavement, full of holes and hillocks, all dry and hard, over which, smartly striking it as though they felt their footing sure, the mules went nimbly, though with an occasional jerk and slide—women, with bare heads, bare necks and arms, seated on door-steps, mildly fumigating the narrow street with their cigarillos, and ejaculating their surprise and surmises as we rode by them—a belfry, for all the world like a water-tank on a double pair of gawky stilts, flanking a capacious church, the face of which, whitewashed as all the houses were, looked corpse-like in the sickly smiling of the moon—and then a shelterless broad space, fringed with orange-trees, which our guide, Anselmo, told us was the Plaza—these were the sounds and sights which pleasantly assured us we had reached our encampment for the night.

Riding across the Plaza, we dismounted at the gate-way of a yard in which there was a crowd of mules, coffee-carts, oxen, curs and carreteros. All the sweet voices with which our approach to Esparza had been greeted, and which accompanied us through the town, seemed to have concentrated in this yard. It was the caballeriza of the best tavern in the place. Anselmo knocked with a stone against the gate, and called out, lustily—Abra la puerta, somos amigos, Señor! The proprietor of the establishment appeared. A tranquil gentleman, noiseless and leisurely in his movements, he welcomed us with a drawl, and invited us to enter.

Following him in the dark—leaving Anselmo to take care of the mules—we found ourselves in a lofty room without a ceiling, in which, in the middle of a cedar table, in the socket of a tin candlestick, in a morsel of fat, a wick smothered in snuff was burning. The yellow light seemed to be wandering dismally over the room in search of something it could play upon. The walls were whitewashed—in Costa Rica every wall has this attention paid it—and the light might have amused itself with them, but it was too feeble to reach so far. There was a slim book-case, painted red, with glass doors, standing in one corner. A ray from the tin candlestick would have improved its appearance. As it was, it stood there as though it were a coffin paneled with crystal, and the light appeared to shrink from it, lest, by touching it, extinction might ensue. In the opposite corner there was a prickly sofa, the stuffing of which protruded at the elbows, and the crimson moreen covering of which, blotched and torn, was peeling off. The lofty room, thus lighted and embellished, was the reception-room, ladies' parlor, gambling-saloon, supper and dining hall of the principal posada of Esparza. A glass of excellent aguardiente, the assurance of a warm supper, and the cheerful advent of another candle, reconciled us in a few seconds to it. In less than twenty minutes we felt perfectly at home. Within an hour, under the brightening influences of the feast, the blank walls grew florid, the book-case glittered as though it were full of jewels, the sofa became plump and clothed with velvet, and from the caballeriza, instead of a racking discord, there flowed in the most soothing harmonies, with the sweetest perfumes.

The host joined us at the supper-table. He was a native of Rivas, Nicaragua, and held the commission of a Lieutenant-Colonel in the army of that Republic during the Filibuster war. Demure as he at first appeared to be, Lieutenant-Colonel José Guerrero grew communicative enough before long. His information and views respecting Esparza were freely though quietly given. There was no garrison; all the military and civil functions of the pueblo were vested in one man, and that one man was the Alcalde; the Alcalde was active, progressive, honest; the people of Esparza, however, were sinfully lazy; they were peaceable and harmless, to be sure, but that was owing to their being so dull; there was hardly life enough in them to go to Mass, mix a cup of tisté, or smoke a puro.

"There was but one citizen from Esparza," he added, "who volunteered to the war in Nicaragua—one only—and he came back without having had a fight, or seen one even."

Midnight came before we moved to bed. Midnight waned before the golden tapestry of the supper-room, the velvet-mantled sofa, the crystal case of jewelry, and all the enchantment vanished. Midnight was a full hour buried when we found ourselves in the dormitory of José Guerrero's inn, in the middle of the room, laid out on stretchers made of ox-hide, our eyes fixed intently on the bare black rafters, the tiles, the holes, and cobwebs of the roof. From the time we laid down, until we got up, four hours of aches and agonies elapsed. A double chastisement befell us. Underneath us was the gridiron of St. Lawrence—all about us were the vexations, without the temptations, of St. Anthony.

It seemed as though all the plagues of the Tropics had been summoned, by some witch as viperous as Alecto, to Esparza on that night. Clouds of mosquitoes, fleas by the million, mange-smitten curs galled with hunger, fighting-cocks on tiptoe every where, and for miles round challenging the world to put them down, carreteros with their uncouth carts rumbling into town, or rumbling out, shouting as though there was a fire on hand, or the Filibusters had broken in—these were some few of the tortures which, stretched on the ox-hide, we had with the keenest sensibility to endure.

But Esparza, after all, deserves to be more reverently mentioned. It is one of the oldest cities of Spanish America. Christopher Columbus entered the Boca del Toro in the month of October, 1502. Twelve years after, the foundations of this city, dedicated to the Holy Spirit of Hope, were laid in the midst of the orange-groves and the wine-yielding palms shadowing the first plateau we come to in our ascent to the valley of San José. In 1670 it was seized and sacked by a band of French marauders. In 1685 it was dealt a deadlier blow by a gang of English robbers, who, under the command of a cut-throat named Sharpe, pounced upon the beautiful little city, set fire to it, plundered it right and left, and then decamped, taking with them several prisoners, men and women, whom they subsequently released on a ransom of a thousand pesos. From this it appears never to have recovered. Many of its inhabitants fled to the plains of Bagaces, in the province of Guanacaste, while others, it is conjectured, crossed the mountains to the North, and descended into the mysterious valley of the Frio.

It has, indeed, the look of a deserted village. Not, however, of a village that had been violently depopulated, but of one that had quietly died out. No ruins tell the story of its misfortune. No footprint is discovered, stamped in blood, upon its pavement. Nature, in these climes, soon heals the wounds which the sword and torch inflict. The scarred waste to-day will be the blooming garden of the morrow. Thus it has been with Esparza, and thus it is. She is beautiful at this moment, despite of all that she has suffered, and of all that she has lost. She has her fragrant orange-groves; her potreros stocked with cattle; her rows of neat white houses; within her walls, huertas full of various fruits and flowers and shrubs; beyond them, the richest lands conceivable, open as well as wooded, all capable of yielding cacao, sugar, indigo, and cotton in lavish quantities. These lands, however, are far from being cultivated as they should be. The sugar-cane raised upon them, in a few patches here and there, is used for sacâte or fodder only, while the other productions named are neglected altogether. On the whole, appearances justify the statement which José Guerrero, the Nicaraguan soldier, made us at the supper-table concerning the inertness of the people of Esparza. If this be true, they differ widely from the rest of the Costa Rican population. Industry, activity, prompt intelligence, the desire to be in independent circumstances, and the honest arts through which the consummation of this desire is reached—these, at every point, struck us as the grand characteristics of the country.

An hour after dawn we were in our saddles, on the high road to San José once more.

Having passed the Puente de las Damas—a bridge of massive masonry, spanning with a single arch, at an aching height, the black waters of the Jesus Maria, which here reel on through a chasm, from the crevices in the mighty walls of which the glossiest laurels and other shrubs spring forth in sparkling clusters—and having ambled or galloped all the morning through the forest, we came at last to the venta, or road-side inn, of San Mateo. Anselmo, our guide, was there before us, for we had loitered at the farm of Las Ramadas to have a chat with a gipsy group at breakfast under a magnificent guapano, the thickly-leaved limbs of which on every side extended full forty feet above the camping-ground.

Anselmo was a silent boy of Indian blood. His broad face, deeply punctuated with the small-pox, was the color of a ripe walnut, while the expression of it was meditative and morose. He wore white check trowsers, a brown scapular, and a pink check shirt. His bare heels displayed a pair of spurs, the rowels of which were the size and shape of star-fish. Sauntering along—equally insensible to the dust, the beauty, the red mud, or the straining steepness of the road—with one of our fowling-pieces slung behind him, and some few necessary articles of toilet tied up in a coffee-bag before him—Anselmo, dispensing with stockings, held on with his toes to the stirrups. The most of the way he kept in the rear. The pilot of the party, he sat in the stern and steered from behind. It is the custom of the country. The guide is seldom in advance—often out of sight—never within hail.

Under the dome-like mangos—under the coolest and darkest of them—Anselmo relieved the mules of their girths and cruppers, and gave them water, corn, and sacate. The room in which we breakfasted, floored with baked clay—clay done to a brittle crust—was wainscoted with cedar. This sounds fine. But cedar is cheap in Costa Rica, and in such houses as the venta of San Mateo displays no polish. The breakfast consisted of fresh eggs, fresh bullock's tongue, a cup of sour coffee, a saucerful of jacotes or hog-plums, and the usual amount of tortillas, the ubiquitous slap-jacks of South and Central America. We were joined at table by an officer of the Costa Rican army. He was on his way from Nicaragua to San José with dispatches to his Government, the San Carlos—one of the steamboats taken from the Filibusters, and flying the Costa Rican flag on Lake Nicaragua—having thumped ashore and there stuck fast. He had come by the Guanacaste road, and to this point had been eight days in the saddle. He was a modest, intelligent, delicately-whiskered, mild, fair-faced gentleman. Eminently gallant, too, for he had fought at Rivas, at Masaya, at San Jorge—all through the war in Nicaragua—and at its close had been honored with the command of the troops on board the steamboat which had just been wrecked. Over his right shoulder was slung a broad green worsted belt. To this a tin canteen was hooked. Underneath the belt was his blue frock-coat. The coat stood in need of a good scouring. His sword, jingling in a steel scabbard at his heels, would have been all the brighter for a little sweet oil and brick-dust. Having hastened with his breakfast and lit his puro, he mounted his white mule with the gay grandeur of a cavalier, gracefully lifted his drab sombrero, dashed through the gate-way, and disappeared up the mountain. Up the mountain! For the shadow of the Aguacate was upon us. High as we were amidst the mangos on the ridge of San Mateo, this noble mountain stood, four thousand feet erect, between us and the sun.

Haughty, opulent, superb—ravines and valleys, two thousand feet in depth, are, to its glowing, but dim crevices at its foot, while the forest we have spoken of—that between Chacarita and the Barranca—seems no more than a quiet shrubbery, blossoming and sleeping in a silvered mist! Haughty, opulent, superb—it is an enormous mass of gold and silver—"the very dust which our horses spurned with their hoofs," so John L. Stephens writes, "contains that treasure for which man forsakes kindred, home, and country." It has made the fortune of more than one bold speculator; has made millionaires of such men as Espinac of Cartago, and Montealegre of San José; still, still invites the capitalists of this and other countries; and to the invincible hand of science knocking at its portals, and with the infallible torch, that has already divulged so many of the mysteries of nature, penetrating its recesses, promises an exhaustless issue of incalculable worth! Haughty, opulent, superb—from base to summit it is an aggregation of most of the riches, the wonders, the terrors, the sweetness and the glory of the earth!

The tropical summer and the spring of the temperate zone equally divide the imperial mountain, and reign there perpetually—the one below, the other above. Each has its attendant flowers, trees, birds, reptiles; each its own wild offspring; each its appropriate harmonies and treasures. The white eagle makes it his home; the wild coffee fills it with its soft exquisite perfume; the cedars crowning it vibrate with the merry peal of the bell-bird; monkeys in legions swing themselves down upon the wild cacao to which its warmer slopes give birth; serpents, such as the sabanera twenty and thirty feet in length, glisten through the gloom of its thickets; the sleek tiger enjoys the dumb security its vine-woven fastnesses afford; humming-birds in millions—"those fragments of the rainbow" as Audubon has called them—flash and whirr through the foliage; while the King of the Vultures, with his gorgeous black and orange-colored crest—an acknowledged chief among the greediest pirates of the dead—owns his oaken palace there, and soars above them all!

Midway up this mountain, at a point called Desmonte, looking suddenly back over the road we had come, there broke upon us a vision of indescribable peacefulness and grandeur. The Gulf of Nicoya—a silver cord stretched along the horizon—seemed to pulsate with an unheard melody; while the ships we had left at Punta Arenas looked as though they were sea-birds clinging to it. Between the Gulf and the promontory of Nicoya, a white unbroken range of clouds extended. Beyond this range were the dark purple mountains of the promontory. It was the funeral procession overlooking the bridal train. To the left, the mountains, which up to this had walled-in the road, suddenly gave way, and a vast ravine abruptly opened. Across the head of this ravine rose a wall of yellowish-brown barren hills; and beyond and far above them again, flinging off the white clouds which floated between it and the sun—the crown of glory it aspired to—at a height of 11,500 feet above the sea, towered the volcano of San Pablo!

This noble feature was never absent from the scene. As we entered the Gulf of Nicoya at the dawn of day, there it was, hailing us in tones of thunder, a Cyclopean warder at the gate. All day long, ankle-deep in blistering sand, or gasping in some rude veranda, we looked up to it from Punta Arenas—that stifled city of a burning plain—and we sighed for the winds and the rain that have long since cooled its fiery head, for it is an extinct volcano. Hardly had we left the red-tiled roofs, the little orange-groves, the palm-trees and sweet huertas of Esparza a mile behind, when, out of the mist of the morning, there came forth that ever-wakeful sentinel of the night, beautiful and mighty as when the darkness closed around him. All along the road to San Mateo, and far beyond it, we turned from the fences of erithryna, interlaced with cactus and wild pine-apple, and the sugar-fields and pasture grounds they inclose, and from the several incidents and varying features of the road; from ox-teams burdened with coffee, as we had seen them in the forest the evening previous; from spacious farm-houses with whitewashed walls and broad piazzas; from loving couples snugly seated on the one tough saddle, the caballero holding the señorita before him on the pommel, a far pleasanter arrangement than that prevailing in older countries when the pillion was in fashion; from droves of drowsy mules, laden with cacao in ox-hide bags, coming up from Nicaragua, whisking their tails and jingling their bells as they plodded before their masters, whose salute, as we rode past them, was gracious and most winning; from black-eyed groups at breakfast under some lofty carob, the black iron pot sending up its fragrant steam of boiling beans, the unyoked oxen munching the tops of sugar-canes outside the domestic circle, and scurvy dogs, at detached posts beyond the camp, showing their teeth, and snarling at the foreigners as they rode by; from the tall rustic cross, planted on the spot where some deed of blood had been done, some criminal had been shot, or some one had suddenly dropped dead; from these, the several incidents, and these, the varying features of the road, many and many a time, all along to San Mateo and far beyond it, we turned to gaze upon San Pablo. And here at this point called Desmonte—from this commanding height—with this vast ravine below us, in which the Catskill might be buried, and with the intermediate range of lowlier mountains opening wide, so as to disclose it in its magnitude and the absolutism of its glory, San Pablo—the eternal sentinel of the Republic—overwhelmed all rivalry, and with a supreme sublimity usurped the conquered scene!

We had left Desmonte little more than two leagues behind, when a black, heavy shower broke full upon us. Luckily there was a house close at hand—one of those erected by the Government, at different points between Punta Arenas and San José, for the accommodation of the men employed in keeping the road in order—and in this we took shelter, if one can be said to take shelter under an umbrella which has nothing but the stick and a few bare ribs left it to keep off the rain. An old, wan, grizzly man, his naked feet sinking in the soft clay with which the house was floored, was shaping a tortilla as we entered; while a sprightly, handsome little boy—the Iulus of this woe-begone Æneas—stood defiantly between the corn and the predatory fowl with which the staff of life was menaced. All along the road we were greatly struck with the quick intelligence, activity, hardihood, bright looks, and gracefulness of the Costa Rican boys. Many of them were guiding the coffee-carts, tripping gayly beside the burly oxen, it mattered not how rough or slippery the road might be, and with the dexterity of practiced carreteros working the team through the ugliest straits, down the steepest pinches, round the sharpest elbows, conquering with an expert and brave sagacity all the difficulties of the journey. They gallantly relieved the old men at times, the latter leisurely following the carts on foot or mule-back, or lying asleep upon the coffee-bags inside, while the little fellows held the chuzo—the sceptre of the road! Nor was it along this road, nor at this exacting work alone, they shone out so brightly. Every where throughout the country, in the field, at market, in the forest, in the busiest crowd, in the bleakest solitude, every where they were still the same bright boys, prompt, fearless, indefatigable. They are a fountain of health-giving waters and a crown of priceless jewels to the land.

Still toiling up the Aguacate—every turn of the winding road deceiving us into the belief, as we approached it, that it would be the last, and then, as we gained it, showing us a new one further on, and this tantalizing game lasting an hour and more, and at every turn becoming more and more vexatious, until at last we grew almost giddy with the torture—still toiling up the Aguacate, having oftentimes to draw in close to the impending rock to let a train of coffee-carts roll by, the night came on. From that out we traveled through the clouds.

Emerging from the clouds, we found ourselves in the city of Athens, or Atenas, away beyond the Aguacate. It is a city of the strictest republican simplicity—a thin sprinkling of modest huts—wherein, if the diviner attributes of Minerva be not perceptible, it is evident that the grave tranquillity of her favorite bird prevails.

In Athens we stopped at a posada, to which, with a due appreciation of its resources and refinement, we gave the name of Pericles. The House of Pericles had an amazingly high-peaked roof thatched with plantain-leaves and corn-husks, the interior being furnished with three canvas-back stretchers to sleep on, a flame-colored wood-cut of St. Francis of Assisium, a spendthrift candle stuck in the neck of a bottle, three naked children, and fleas by the million.

Pericles himself, the proprietor of the posada, was the smoothest of rogues. Not in appearance, indeed, for his face was dappled all over with something like mustard, his head was shaped like a cocoa-nut, and his teeth, deficient in number, had lost their enamel. But in voice, in walk, in sentiment, in every thing that distinguishes the scholar, the hotel-keeper, the citizen and the gentleman, no one could have been smoother. He was the Pericles of Plutarch. Nay, by the golden grasshoppers of sweet Attica, he was more than this! For, at the very outset, he urged so considerate an argument against giving his guests a bottle of brandy, alleging it was altogether too dear, an objection seldom, if ever, advanced by one of his trade in New York or any where else—he was so frank in acknowledging we might be troubled with fleas during the night, and that the pigs, who had the run of the bedroom as well as the kitchen, encouraged jiggers and bugs to the house—and then, when we had stretched ourselves the full length of the stretchers, and had pulled the green and red blankets about us, he let down the skimpy dimity curtains so tenderly, and so sweetly wished us good-night, that he seemed to unite—and Don Ramon said so next morning—the gracefulness of Alcibiades, and the goodness of Socrates, with the princely resources of Pericles.

But it was a night of ineffable torture. It was worse, infinitely worse, than the one we spent in Esparza. The fleas carried the house with a stinging majority. The minority of two, Don Ramon and Don Francisco, had to give in, give up, and go out. Stretchers, chairs, the family hammock of blue-and-white striped cotton swinging across the room, the supper-table to which we retreated with our blankets for a time, the house itself had to be abandoned. An overwhelming siege, it was an unconditional surrender. Nisus and Euryalus, smoking cigars, spent the rest of the night in their ponchos and boots in the yard.

There, in the silver light of the stars, with his rugged face sparkling like granite, lay Anselmo, our guide, with his toes sticking out and straight up, as stiff and compressed as a mummy. Over there, against a cart-wheel, two stumpy black pigs lay all-of-a-heap, and snored as though the world were at an end, or no one was in it but themselves. Behind a pile of musty ox-hides, three raw-boned swarthy arrieros, fast asleep, with a profound emphasis responded to this resounding couple; while an uneasy dog with a sneaking tail, very tawny, very scrofulous and very thin, kept prowling about the yard, darting out at times under the creaking gate, as a cart rumbled past, or some traveler astride of a mule, keeping late hours, went dismally by.

This night's entertainment at Athens cost us five dollars. Pericles was the sharpest, as well as the smoothest, of rogues. We were off before he had time to afflict us with breakfast.

A league beyond Athens we came to the brink of the quebrada, which at this point strikes the Río Grande. Three hundred feet below—filling the chasm with its wild and broken voice, fiercely striking and leaping the black rocks which rose against it—the river rushed, tumbled, and with a swollen tide swept on. The opposite wall of the chasm stood several feet higher than that down which, along a zigzag road, solidly constructed, though utterly unprotected on the side which overlooked the precipice, we leisurely walked our mules. Clusters of beautiful pink bignonias, clinging to the face of this stupendous wall, gave it the appearance of a cliff of granite colored with a rosy sunset. Masses of guajini-quil and wild grape-vine, also, darkening the upper line of the walls, and entangled here and there with the bignonias, overhung the waters. On a broad ledge, further down the chasm, stood a gorgeous grove of cacao-trees, upward of a hundred years old, so one of the guardas of the Garita told us; and in the shadow of this grove, the waters, and the steep black channel through which they rushed, seemed to deepen before our very eyes and grow darker still. In a straight line, right under us, a stone bridge of one bold arch, with a gate and covered causeway, linked the roads descending to it on both sides of the ravine. It was the bridge of the Garita—the bridge of the Custom-house—and across that bridge all wayfarers bound for the interior are compelled to pass. Any attempt to cross the river, above or below that bridge, is punishable with ten years' imprisonment. This has been already mentioned. But where so grievous a penalty is attached to so venial an offense, it is no harm to renew the warning which the information conveys. Beyond the bridge there is a wooden building, very long and low, and roughly put together, with a roof of red tiles projecting five or six feet beyond the front wall to a row of half a dozen discolored square posts of cedar; and this is the Custom-house.

It is here that barrels are tapped, and boxes have their nails drawn, and bales are ripped open, and trunks are turned inside out, and the revenue of the Republic is for the most part collected.

The letters of introduction we brought to the President, the Bishop of San José, the Minister of State, and other notable citizens of Costa Rica, obtained an unmolested passage for our luggage. It was on the road, miles behind us, jolting and smashing along in the rear of two ponderous bullocks; but whenever it arrived, the Commandant at the Garita in the pleasantest accents assured us the formality of an inspection would be dispensed with. It was due to literature and science, he said, that the luggage of gentlemen devoted to the pursuit of knowledge should be exempt from the formalities to which Westphalian hams and such gross articles were subject. Moreover it was due to the son of the illustrious General Paez. This he added with the most gallant courtesy, lifting his hat and bowing, his cavalry sword sliding away in the dust behind him as he did so. He did more. He was hospitable as he was gallant. Stepping into the Custom-house he brought out a bottle of cogniac, a tumbler, and a cork-screw. Without dismounting, we drank his health and prosperity to Costa Rica. Then it was his turn, and he drank ours, ejaculating a sentiment in honor of Venezuela. Two or three minutes more of pleasant gossip with him; about the game in the neighborhood of the Garita, for he was a sporting character; about the Filibusters, for he fought in Rivas, the 11th of April, 1856, and thought it glorious fun; about his fighting-cocks, for he had an army of them; two or three minutes more of this tête-à-tête, a warm shake-hands and the final adios, and up the road we started, leaving the Rio Grande hoarsely roaring in its jagged bed. The deep chasm—the sunset-colored walls overtopping the black waters, the long procession of carts, and mules, and oxen, descending and winding up the opposing cliffs, the groups of soldiers and carreteros at the bridge, the bridge itself, the masses of foliage and blossoms relieving the cold hard face of rock, and softening with their shadows the staring wildness of the abyss—all this was forgotten, when, striking the level ground above the river, a vast amphitheatre opened suddenly, boldly, magnificently before us.

Before us were the Plains of Carmen. To the right were the Cordilleras and the volcanic heights of Barba and Irazu. To the left were the mountains of Santa Anna and San Miguel. Breadth, loftiness, infinitude; no paltry sign of human life to blot the scene; the sun in its fullness; the pulsation through the warm earth of distant waters; the rumblings of the thunder in a sky where not an angry speck was visible; wonder, homage, ecstasies; it seemed, indeed, as if we had been disenthralled from the Old World by some glorious magic, and were on the threshold, within sight, in the enjoyment of a new existence!

But what of that vast amphitheatre, overshadowed, and with these immutable sublimities environed? It was once the bed of an immense lake. Suddenly set free by some violent volcanic shock, the waters of the lake exhausted themselves through a rent which now forms the channel and outlet of the Rio Grande. Enormous rocks of calcined porphyry, protruding through the soil and blackening it far and wide, are the testimonies of this convulsion. The Plains of Carmen, the lower portion of the amphitheatre, exhibit a loose dark loam intermixed with quantities of volcanic detritus. To this day they have been used as grazing grounds only. With a proper system of irrigation—and such a system, fed by the plenteous rains which fall during the months of June, July, August, September and October, could be easily, cheaply, and extensively carried out—and with, of course, the necessary cultivation, they would yield the sugar-cane, Indian corn, tapioca, and other tropical productions in extraordinary abundance. Thus where we have, for the most part, an idle and inanimate wilderness at present, a population of 100,000—in addition to the actual population of the country, computed at something over 180,000—might, in this one section alone, be prosperously sustained. Elsewhere—all over the country, from Lake Nicaragua to the frontier of New Granada—whole nations, such as Portugal and Holland, would find the amplest room and the best of living. The public unappropriated lands, in the northern part of the Republic alone, according to Señor Astaburiaga, amount to millions of acres.

The inducements, held out to emigrants by the Government of Costa Rica, are liberal enough.

The public lands are sold at public auction. These vary in price according to their distance from the principal centres of population. Two acres, for instance, in the neighborhood of San José, the capital, will realize from $100 to $150; while in the forest to the North or South, beyond the mountains, 120 acres may be had for $64. The cost for clearing and preparing an acre of forest-land is estimated by the natives at $10; but, as Mr. Squier observes, an American backwoodsman would doubtless do it for one half the sum. The buyer of public land becomes the debtor of the National Treasury. Having paid a certain amount of the purchase-money—in most instances a mere trifle—he takes possession of the land and retains it, paying a yearly interest of 4 per cent. on the balance. In a conversation we had with him, President Mora cordially expressed himself in favor of the largest possible immigration. As an evidence of the sincere good wishes of the Government in this respect, he stated that, three years ago, a loan of $3,000,000 had been negotiated with a mercantile house in Hamburg. The monetary crisis of 1857, however, in which so many lofty houses toppled throughout the United States and Europe, had its evil effect on Costa Rica. The house, with which this loan had been negotiated, broke down just as the negotiation successfully closed. Had the loan been forthcoming, $300,000 would have been devoted to the introduction of skilled labor, mechanic as well as agricultural.

Besides the inducements offered by the Government, the climate as well as the soil of Costa Rica is most inviting and favorable to the emigrant. Of all tropical countries, Costa Rica is the best adapted for the North American and European emigrant. It is the only country, perhaps, in which tropical productions can be raised with perfect impunity and profit by free white labor. Down along the coast, the Pacific as well as the Atlantic, the climate, of course, is grievously injurious, and in some places—Matina for example, situated between the Boca del Toro and San Juan del Norte—it is absolutely fatal. But here—up here in the great valley of San José, four thousand feet above the sea—no climate could be more healthful, genial, and delightful. A worthy friend of mine—a native of Ohio, who has resided the last ten years in San José, and whose scientific proclivities may be inferred from the fact that he is a daguerreotypist as well as an importer of boots—gave me a copy of the tables of the weather and temperature he had constructed during that decade. From these it appears, that, in and about San José, the thermometer ranges between 65° and 75° the year round, seldom below, seldom above either. Stephens, Molina, and Astaburiaga verify this statement.

Nor is the soil of this and the neighboring valleys capable of producing only the tropical fruits, grains, and vegetables. English wheat and clover, the Irish potato, the American pumpkin, peaches, apples, plums, quinces and strawberries, find in these valleys, and up the slopes of the surrounding mountains, the most encouraging nurture. The valley of Orosi alone, Mr. Young Anderson informed me, had ample room for 200,000 farmers, and was capable of yielding two full crops of wheat in the year. At present, owing to imperfect cultivation, it yields only one.

But the staple crop of Costa Rica—that which constitutes the principal source of its wealth—that which has been the means of evoking it from indigence and obscurity, and rendering it, in a commercial point of view, one of the most solid, as in the social it is one of the happiest, while in the political it is, perhaps, the most influential of the Central American Republics—is unquestionably the coffee-crop.

From 1819, when the Padre Valverde planted the first tree, the cultivation of the plant has steadily increased. Having passed the plains of Carmen, eleven miles from San José, we come upon the first of the plantations. From that out they occupy the entire of the valley—the entire upper portion of the bed of the ancient lake. They extend, too, right and left all along the road from San José to Cartago—a distance of twelve miles—and are to be met with at the base of the Candelaria, and in the valleys of the mountains, and on the plateaux, twenty, thirty, forty miles beyond them again. In 1850 the yield was 14,000,000 pounds. The average crop is 12,000,000 pounds. The crop this year—they gather it in January—exceeded the average by 5,000,000 pounds.

But to me the most gratifying fact deduced from the agricultural statistics of the country, is this paramount one—two-thirds of the population constitute a landed-proprietory. Almost every man has his farm, his mules, his oxen, his poultry, his pigs, his sugar or his coffee plantation. The very men we had seen, barefooted and in dragged linen, descending the Aguacate, winding through the forest beyond the Barranca, carting the coffee to the port, were landlords as well as carreteros. This—more than the purity of their Spanish blood, an advantage which, speaking of ninety cases out of every hundred, has not been impaired by any intermixture with the Negro or the Indian—this is the secret of their industry. This the secret of their manhood. This the secret of their promptitude, their pluck, their success in war. This the secret of the perfect tranquillity, the absence of crime, the substantial progress, the political unity, the national spirit, and, to sum up all, the dauntless independence of the country. Every man is at home, and feels at home. Every man has a fireside to fight for, and well he knows that the inviolability of that fireside depends upon the inviolability of the laws, and the liberty of the country. In a Republic there is nothing like having every inhabitant a citizen, every citizen a magistrate, every magistrate a soldier. Where the inhabitant has a vital and indestructible stake in the country—in other words, where he is a landlord, be his fee-simple estate large or small—he will be a citizen, though you give him no suffrage; he will be a magistrate, though you give him no commission; he will be a soldier, though you give him no pay. Political privileges, without such property, are little more than flattering illusions; or, growing to be more, may be instruments of disorder, subjection for the multitude, and tyranny with the few. Accompanied by property that is subject neither to invasion nor dispute, the political privileges of the individual are sure to be the inflexible instruments of good order, unpurchasable safeguards against corruption, and the gratuitous defenses of the nation.

Two leagues and a half from San José we stopped to breakfast at the posada of La Asuncion. With its broad white face shining through the clouds of yellow dust which the coffee-carts still continued to roll up, we found this posada a sweet retreat. The windows, the walls, the floor were clean and bright as those of a Yorkshire dairy. The atmosphere was fresh and richly scented. The furniture—quaintly shaped, curiously and lavishly carved, all of black mahogany—looked as though it were assiduously polished. And so it was. The three plump black-diamond-eyed, sprightly girls—daughters of the healthy widowed lady of the house whose likeness we have here—were living assurances of that, as they glided round the table with overflowing cups of delicious chocolate, the milkiest eggs conceivable, and oranges from the trees which shaded and perfumed the house. In every respect the breakfast at La Asuncion had the advantage of the breakfast at San Mateo, though the garlic, with which the stewed beef was stuffed to suffocation, might have been dispensed with. The Chili peppers more than sufficed to heighten the flavor of the feast. They drew tears even from the eyes of Don Ramon, who, from infancy, had been accustomed to them. One of the Superintendents of the road entered before we had quite got through, took a cup of chocolate from the most luxuriant of the attendant Graces, and delicately intimating that he did so with our permission, rolled up a cigarillo, and lit it with his mecha. The mecha is a long round skein of prepared cotton, ignited by a flint and steel, whenever it's required, and being drawn through an extinguisher attached to it by a hook and chain, is just as easily put out. Almost every one in Costa Rica carries a mecha, and the extinguisher, hook and chain, in many instances, are made of silver, and sometimes of gold.

From La Asuncion into San José the road was in the best condition. It was broad, compact, and level. There was a deep trench on either side, an embankment, and a bristling fence. The fence was shady too, for the green stakes of yuca with which it is constructed take root, throwing out limbs and leaves in such profusion that the machetes have at times to be brought against them, so as to keep them within bounds, and preserve that prim civilized appearance which the circumstance of their being on the high-road to San José, and close up to it, requires. Gangs of laborers, moreover, were busy at different points, filling up ruts, breaking stones, clearing out the trenches, strewing gravel, or over some fresh patch of rubbish, grit and mortar, hauling a monstrous roller after them.

Then came the coffee-plantations, laid out in squares and avenues with the strictest regularity, the delicate dark-green foliage glistening with the sunshine—glistening as though it were suffused with gold—and the fragrance of the blossoms, white and soft as snow-flakes, exhaling in the hazy heat—blending the mildest sweetness of the earth with the fiercest glory of the sky. Then came the Bridge of Ibirilla—El Puente de Arco de Ibirilla, as it is set forth on tables of stone inserted in the battlements—with the Rio Grande sweeping over a sunken bed of lava-rock—sweeping over it with the thoughtless brilliancy of youth, with musical whisperings and laughter as it were, ignorant of its prescribed career, for it has yet a desperate race to run—has yet the chasm of the Garita to battle through—has yet three thousand feet to fall. Over a sunken bed of lava-rock it sweeps. Crossing the bridge a huge mass of this same rock overhung the road on our left. Below the bridge—breaking through the thick clusterings of rexia and convolvulus which cling to it—ten thousand tons of it, smelted into one steep cliff, overhung the rushing waters. Of the tremendous shock which tore asunder the walls of the sea once occupying this vast plateau, and which gave liberty to the imprisoned waves, the evidences, as we have already said, multiply themselves on every side.

In gentle contrast with them were the long lines of neat white cottages which extend both sides of the road, from the Bridge of Ibirilla to the municipal limits of San José. These lines are broken by farm-yards, huertas and plantations only, all of which exhibit signs of the most careful industry, confirming the favorable impression of Costa Rica which the more striking incidents and features of the road, the grand procession of the coffee-carts, the quietude and propriety of the little towns, the comfortable look of the haciendas, the aspect and bearing of the people themselves, produced.

Sun-burned, coated with dust, sweltering a little and somewhat chafed, in our red flannel shirts and overall boots, both the one and the other rumpled and wrinkled, decidedly the worse for the wear, but nevertheless in the brightest good humor—returning with smiles, and sometimes with winks, the inquisitive glances which from door-ways and iron-barred windows signaled our coming—between two and three o'clock in the afternoon, we rode into San José, the capital of the Republic of Costa Rica.

Jogging past the Artillery Barracks—at the rickety gate of which there stood a sentinel in soiled linen, with sandals of untanned ox-hide strapped to his heels and toes—then past the Palace of the Government, concerning which, and the other notable buildings and institutions of San José, we shall say a word or two in another chapter of our Holidays—we dismounted at the door of the Hotel de Costa Rica. Ascending the staircase as leisurely and gracefully as our big boots and spurs would permit, we leaned over the banister at the first landing, and wished good-by to Anselmo. At sundown that mysterious creature set out for Punta Arenas, back the road which Nisus and Euryalus had come, with the three mules straggling behind him, the last being tied by the nose to the tail of the next one, and that one again being made fast in the same way to the other before him.

Viewing it from the pretty balcony of the room into which we were shown by an amiable fat boy from Heidelberg, whose name was Charlemagne, the capital of Costa Rica appeared to be a compact little city, cross-barred with narrow streets, roofed with red tiles. There were flag-staffs and belfries too, and tufts of shining green foliage breaking through those red tiles—breaking through them here and there, and every where—and beyond and above them, but quite close to us it seemed, were the mountains of San Miguel—brown steeps cloven into valleys, and throwing out other heights, abrupt and black, in the deep shadow of which the smoke of the burning forest rolled up slowly and with a fleecy whiteness, and all over the slopes of which the fields of sugar-cane fairly glittered, their verdure was so vivid.

May Heaven be with it—the bright, young, brave city of the Central Andes—the silent but industrious, the modest but prosperous, the inoffensive but undismayed metropolis of the Switzerland of the Tropics!

Radiantly reposing there, with the palm-trees fanning it—the mangos shadowing its little court-yards—the snow-white and snow-like blossoms of the coffee-tree, the glossy, smooth, rich foliage of the guayaba and sweet lemon, the orange and banana breaking through the waste of red tiles, and filling the serene air with perfume—herds of cattle, the finest in the world, grazing in the paddocks or potreros without the suburbs, or with a grand docility toiling through its streets, carrying to the market-place the produce of the peasant, or to his home conveying back such accessories to his comfort as the ships from England, Hamburg, Guatemala, and France import, or such as the Panama railroad from more ingenious work-shops, for some time past, has hurried up—each one at his business, none idle, none too conceited to trade or work—an independent spirit, aiming at an independent livelihood, animating all—the machinery of the Government working steadily, and for its ordained ends, with a commensurate success, though not, perhaps, with the high pressure and expansion which Democrats of infinite views, as some of us are, might with an impetuous rhetoric advise—a growing desire for a closer intercourse with the world, dissipating its fears and prejudices, quickening its intelligence, ennobling its counsels, and opening out, as the proposed new road to the Serapiquí will do, even through the wilderness where no white foot until this day has been, new channels for the enterprise, the resources, and the credit of the country—the National Flag, which through the vanishing ranks of no despicable adversaries has been victoriously borne, flying from the Barracks and the Palace of the Government, kindling in every native heart a just pride and a fearless patriotism—with all this before us, how could we do otherwise than invoke for that brave little city of the Central Andes—as I do now and ever shall—the sympathies of the American people and the shield of Providence?

Oh! may that Providence—typified by the vast mountain of Irazu which overshadows it, and which has long since quenched its fires and become a glory instead of a terror to the scene—protect it to the end of time, and safe amidst the everlasting hills—prosperous and inviolable—through many an improving epoch may it teach the lesson, that nations may be great—great in honest industry, great in the goodness of domestic life, great in the less ostentatious arts of peace, great in patriotism, great in heroism, great in being the living illustration of this inspiring lesson—though no navy rides the sea for them, and their territory be small!

INSECTS DESTRUCTIVE TO WHEAT.

civilized and progressive man all over the world, making their home wherever nature welcomed him, their master, but all experience and history tells that the more highly cultivated any nation has become, the more attention has it given to the culture of these grains. Thus, we conclude that that people whose chief food is wheaten flour, and whose chief stimulant is the juice of stall-fed beef, is in the high-road of progress. It seems hard; but not only the body but the soul grows on that wheat-bread and juicy beef which has made the Anglo-Saxon race the foremost of the world. If such is the importance of a single grain to the civilized world, any thing conducing to the improving of this food, increasing it in quality and quantity, becomes a paramount question with those who govern and those who are governed. Every hint, every suggestion will be snatched at eagerly by those who have studied the momentous question of raising up a nation to the highest standard of manhood by good feeding and good schooling. These are inseparable; train-oil, clay-balls, man's flesh, and shell-fish are the antipodes of the schoolmaster and his ferule.

Wheat is said to grow wild upon the steppes of Tartary. Ehrenberg and Humboldt found it growing on the banks of the Samara as they journeyed toward the Caspian. Rye, barley, and oats are to be found throughout all these regions growing spontaneously, although the first seldom, if ever, thus propagates itself. Michaux found wheat in its uncultivated state at Hamadan, in Persia. Diodorus Siculus mentions that it grew wild in the Leontine fields and other parts of Sicily. In the Bible it is alluded to very often. It was embalmed—a living companion—with the ancient mummies of Egypt, and some of us moderns are perchance eating bread from seed garnered in Joseph's granaries or in the mightier pyramids. Homer, Virgil, all the old poets, sing its praises. Ceres, the wheat-crowned goddess, is metaphorically only a loaf of bread, as Bacchus signifies a flask of wine. Sprengel, the best authority on this subject, asserts that the greater part of these European grains were found wild in the northern parts of Persia and India, summer wheat particularly in the country of the Musicanes, a province in Northern India. Now the question arises how it reached us; who can tell us? There are several legends—one is, that the honor must be divided between the Virgin Mary and the wife of a Spanish nobleman who followed her husband to the country of the Incas; but we can not designate where she planted her first crop. Another is, that a negro slave, belonging to Cortez, found three grains among rice brought from Spain as provision for his army, planted them, and from these it spread far and near. At Quito, in the Franciscan convent, is preserved with holy awe, as a relic, the earthen jug from which a monk, a native of Flanders, Fra Jodoco Rixi (write his name in letters of gold), sowed the first wheat known on this continent, cutting down the forest for this purpose where now stands the famous Plazuela de San Francisco. Humboldt mentions that the monks of this convent solicited him to explain the motto encircling this valuable vessel; they supposed it had some mystic relation to the wheat it once contained. It is in the old German dialect, and reads: "Whoso drinks from me let him not forget his God."

Notice how the results of the wheat crops are watched, chronicled, summed up from year to year, to tell of increase or decrease. This shows the value man places on a grass once wild as the harebell, on which now depends the stability of governments, the very existence of thrones. How these magic words, "the fly," "the bug," "the worm," "the weevil," carry terror with them as they are softly whispered from farm-door to farm-door, until they reach official places, making hearts hot and lips tremble at even their names. The great importance of this grass to us is most distinctly exhibited by the astonishing number of insects besetting it. If all years were alike in crops man would become positively idle. He does not naturally like work; and if not made to plow the earth for positive sustenance, he would bask in noontide joys and ask the ravens to feed him. Besides, it adds stimulant to his exertions to plant, and watch who shall reap—he or the insects—the little winged atoms always busy fulfilling their duties and whispering in his ear, "It is in vain you rise early and eat the bread of carefulness, unless you ask Him who giveth all things to stay our progress." It is said thirty thousand are known to exist on this plant alone. Does this not proclaim an Omniscient eye and an Omnipotent hand protecting and feeding us? There is not a fibre, a nerve of a leaf, a hair of the beard, a rootlet, a fleck of the pollen, an atom of stalk, straw, grain, or stubble but has its thousand consumers; and yet what crops are made! And a man must be poor indeed in this country who has not his daily wheaten loaf, such as, a few centuries ago, would have been paid for by great monarchs in its weight of gold.

For your amusement and, I hope, instruction let us examine some of these wheat destroyers. The most important of them at this time is the wheat midge (Cecidomyia tritici—Figure 1). "It is," says Harris, "a small orange-colored gnat, with long slender legs, and two transparent wings, which reflect the tints of the rainbow." In Figure 3 is given the germination of a grain of wheat. You can there perceive the habitat of her larvæ. With a retractile ovipositor, four times the length of her body, and as fine as a hair, she deposits her eggs in the glumes of the florets of the grain. They hatch, if the weather is favorable, in six or eight days, and hasten down to the heart or core of the grain—the only part they destroy. As they grow they proceed to inhabit the entire flower (Figure 4), the grain of course becoming shriveled and useless. Hundreds may be found on a stalk at a time, and after a shower of rain the field, covered with these little yellow wrigglers, looks as if tipped with gold. As the milk ceases they reach maturity. After the first moulting the worm is torpid for a while, and appears to have elongated itself by one more segment than could be perceived at first, having now twelve, including the line around the head. It likewise obtains a very minute spine on each line of the body, and two or three coarse ones, marking where the feet should be. It is much yellower than at first. A day or two more and it becomes less active.

August has now arrived, and it rests for a while, for the grain has hardened, and it can feed no more. It now hastens to the end of the leaf, and, dropping to the ground, burrows down about two inches deep, closes up the rings of the body in the manner this family of Tipula adopts, and in the pupa case remains securely until the following June or July, when you may perceive them soaring up from the ground in clouds to commence the same routine of destruction.

You can scarcely examine an ear of wheat any where throughout this country without coming across three or more varieties of the insect shown in Figure 5. Thrips belongs to the Hemiptera order. This family, Thripidae, is beyond computation. A few days ago I saw in a rose, by the aid of a glass, more than four varieties. This one before you I have always found solely on the wheat. It may, after the plant is too old to afford it food, take to another; but I have met it nowhere but on this plant during the summer months. It is very small, and of a darker reddish hue than its confrères; its wings are clearer than others of this family, and deeply fringed. The legs are lighter than the body. I have named it Thrips tritici ambulatum, for it does sometimes walk, while the rest of this family literally “pitch into” every thing, leaping, tumbling, skipping, with all the activity of fleas. I met this insect many years ago in Canada, and have found her yearly on hand, some years more numerous than others. They are exceedingly destructive in every stage of their growth. The eggs (Figure 19) are deposited by the mother on the outside of the flower leaves, and are not perceptible without a glass. They are of a dark rusty color, hung to a foot-stalk, twisted and crinkled up like a cork-screw. As soon as the larvæ are hatched they run about puncturing all around them with their small beaks, and the "pungled" and shrunken grains mark their progress. The larva illustrated in Figure 7 resembles the perfect insect, and its habits are similar; but it can not fly—its wings are scarcely now perceptible. As they grow older they change their skins and come forth with wings. They are literally the Aphidii of the wheat plant. Linnæus classed them in this family; but Mr. Halliday has withdrawn them in his able memoir, raising them to a distinct order, under the name of Thysanoptera. But, under whatever name, they are very troublesome, and commit great havoc, small and insignificant as they are. The short line between the long lines (Figure 7) will give you the dimensions of a giant of this family of torments.

Next comes a very pretty little Mow fly—the Agromyza tritici capetis (Figure 6) I call it—because its head is so much out of proportion to the rest of its body. It bears a strong resemblance to the Agromyza tritici of Dr. Fitch, but is more of a black and buff color, smooth and glossy, and has abundance of hair on its brow. There is a decided difference in the nervures of the wings. In Figure 21 you see first the wing of the Doctor's fly; the second is the wing of the celebrated Marwich fly, which created so much alarm in England, having been mistaken for the Hessian fly; the third is the wing of a larger specimen I have met in the Eastern States. You might easily mistake this insect for the young of a house fly. You will find her oftenest depositing her eggs near the joints, but she does not seem to have any particular place. The worm resembles that of the wheat midge so closely you would easily mistake one for the other; but as they grow older they have a black line down their backs. They feed in the same manner as the midge's larvæ; for let them be placed where they may, they will find their way to the grain; and long after the larva of the midge has disappeared, you will find these finishing the débris of the former's repast. It undergoes its transformation (Figure 14) in the same manner as the house fly, descending into the earth and contracting itself into a pupa, and remaining snugly within until its food is prepared in the next season. They are more numerous than people are aware of; and when their habits and numbers have been ascertained, great will be the astonishment to perceive what mischief these pretty little things can accomplish. Fortunately for us, they are closely pursued by a large family of parasites quite capable of subduing them, so as to preserve Nature's great law—a balance of power.

Now let me introduce you to a member of l'ancienne régime (Figure 19). She has a number of titles, first of which is Anacamptis cerealella—the former the genus she belongs to—"Anacamptis" meaning, in Greek, "recurved;" their long slender feelers being, in this family of Yponomeutians, always curved backward over their heads. In 1789 she was called by Olivier Alucita cerealella; Latrielle writes her down Ecophora granella; then again she is hailed as Ypsolophus granellus; and another cognomen is Tineæ hordei, from hordium barley. An American writer has converted her into a fly-weevil. She is in reality, although performing under so many masks, the celebrated and ancient Angoumois grain-moth—the Tineæ hordei of later days, though her substitute in this country is wheat. Now you will ask, Where is Angoumois? Alas! if it was not for this little moth even the name would be forgotten of this once rich, gay, wheat-growing department of la belle

France. It wants now only a few months of completing the century when her depredations were so very overwhelming in the wheat-fields of this province that learned men were sent from Paris, Reaumur at their head, to study her habits and stay her proceedings. Reaumur has given us, in his "Memoires," particulars which assure us of her identity. She has forgotten nothing of her antecedents, and is as bustling and busy in our Yankee granaries as ever she was at home in her own sunny province. She looks a very modest, retiring dame in her Quaker dress. She is small—about three-eighths of an inch in length. Her upper wings are of a very delicate brown, as smooth as satin, and without a dark dot dimming their lustre; the under pair and her body are marbled ash color and white, softly penciled and slightly fringed. Her antennæ are bristles, with a few fine hairs on them; and her feelers or palpi, as I have already remarked, are curved back. She deposits her eggs on grain sometimes while in the field, but oftener after it has been housed. They are placed in clusters of thirty, fifty, and a hundred sometimes. The worm is white with a brown head, quite small but active, with six jointed legs and ten pro-legs, like very minute warts. As soon as they are hatched each makes choice of a grain, and in its interior domiciles itself, the mealy substance being its food. Here it luxuriates until ready to go into a cocoon. It is a singular fact that all grains of wheat in which these insects have lived have a piece of the husk bitten off (as shown at d, Fig. 10)—as a mark, I presume, of property claimed. One grain suffices for all its demands. When entirely sacked it spins a partition down the interior of the grain; the smallest division receives all the debris of the establishment, the other is converted into a silken chamber, where the little worm remains until ready to come forth a moth. There are two broods a year. The eggs laid on the grain while in the granary lie over all winter as well as the chrysalis in the grain, and when your spring wheat is sown they are as securely planted as the cereal, and come forth in time as healthy and active as if "born in marble halls." You can easily observe this by soaking your seed in water a few days; the lightened grain will float while the sound grains sink. Chaucer asks the question,

"Why should I sowen chaf out of my fist
When I may sowen wheat, if that me list?"

It is your own fault if you do. This insect is pertinaciously pursued by several parasite flies, both of the egg and worm.

Figure 22 represents a very decided celebrity—the Hessian fly, called by Mr. Say the Lecidomyia destructor. No animal, bird, reptile, or insect has ever had so much said, written, surmised, and suggested concerning it as this little fly. The Privy Council of England sat in consternation, day after day, with the same fear and trembling of its invading her fields as they did of the great Napoleon invading her shores. It will be difficult for history to decide which was to her the greatest bugbear. Messages were sent to the different ports for the examination of cargoes of wheat reaching their docks. Fancy the science exhibited in such orders! Official letters to all the British ambassadors at foreign courts solicited information concerning this little fly. The documents and minutes thus collected would compose many hundred pages. Then consider what has been said and written about it in this country. This fly, like all things else, has had its day, and if it did not now and then exhibit itself we would place it with the things that have been. But the fear of a fresh invasion keeps us on the alert.

It has its name from the fact that the Hessian soldiers and this insect made their début simultaneously in America. It is doubtful whether the Hessians conferred immortality on the fly, or the fly on the Hessians. Both were equally distasteful to the country. Mr. Dana sent Mr. Herrick (who, with Dr. Asa Fitch, have treated this subject most scientifically*), from Mahon, Toulon, and Naples, both eggs and pupa as far back as 1834. It is therefore not a native, but an unwillingly adopted citizen. In fact, it has been ascertained that it is found in Germany, France, Switzerland, and Italy. Please to understand it is really a fly, and not a "bug" or "weevil," "midge" or "bee." It is a small two-winged fly, resembling a mosquito, but flying differently; the mosquito takes a long sweep with its wings, while the fly jerks and stops frequently before alighting; and you may see them often in numbers lying on the air as if asleep, or in a dreamy ecstasy, with not a movement of their wings. Its head and thorax are blacker than the common mosquito; its body is tawny in hue and covered with gray hairs. Its antennæ are strangely constructed, and give a positive proof of its anomalous position.

At Figure 22 you will perceive a wing of a Tipula, which I have named, for want of a better, the Lebanon wheat-fly. I met it at the Shakers' establishment of Lebanon many years ago, doing terrible mischief with the grain. This fly has often been sent abroad monographed and classed for the true Hessian fly, and is considered as such in many a cabinet in Europe at this day. But she deposits her eggs on the stalk; her larvæ are worms resembling those of the wheat midge, only white, and there can be little doubt her larvæ form the very small cocoons often found in straw. The Hessian fly, on the contrary, deposits her eggs longitudinally on the leaf; they are reddish at first and become darker with age. The larva is a maggot, and as soon as hatched aims for the joints, where it buries itself and sucks the sap of the plant. It has been a discussed point whether it gnaws or sucks; but if you choose to examine for yourself, you can easily see that it has a short firm beak. It is impossible to get the parts of this mouth. Dr. Fitch says "he has tried it in vain." If you place the maggot upon water in a good light, with a piece of broken mirror at the bottom of the glass, you will perceive in its struggles that it has a beak or tube, but of how many pieces composed it is useless to attempt to ascertain. The larva absolutely dissolves under your dissecting needle. The part of the plant they destroy is the Parenchymaren, the soft silky substance wrapping the stalk and covering the nervures of the leaves. Take a hair, and split up a leaf of wheat where they have been, and you will see it as shown at d, Figure 12. Dry it carefully between porous paper, and place it under the glass, and you will find it perforated as if with very, very small pin points. This decides the manner in which the maggot lives, namely, sucking or imbibing the juices of the plant—neither gnawing nor obtaining its nourishment by the pores of the skin, as some persons have imagined. They undergo their transformations in pupariums buried in the stalk at the root, where they remain until ready to come forth in fly-form in the latter part of August, remaining until October. They have been seen as late as November, if the weather is mild and dry, hovering over the old stubble in fields. Mr. Say discovered a parasite fly, the Ceraphron destructor. Mr. Herrick mentions two more parasites of the fly, and an egg parasite, a species of Platygaster; and there are several others. Thus we may perceive why it is that the Hessian fly no longer holds its position as the greatest scourge of man, more to be dreaded than any other calamity. Let us thank God, among all His mercies, for these little parasites who oppose the progress and keep down the numbers of the dreaded Hessian fly. Without their aid, man's labors would be vain.

Now we will turn to a very active little busy-body, the Emplocamus granella, or Tinea granella (Figure 8), another grain moth. She is very small; her wings are long and tapering, soft and glossy, and are dappled with white, gray, light and dark brown, and several dark spots, one black, near the exterior edge. The under wings and body are black and white. She has a stately tuft of white hairs on her brow, which she is not ashamed to exhibit waving between her bristly antennæ. There are two broods a year. She places her eggs on the grain. The worms are soft and naked; a buff color, with a reddish head and sixteen feet, the first six small and jointed, the others the usual wart-like protuberances. They do not burrow into the grain but gnaw off the husk, with which they construct their first habitations, using only so much of the kernel of the grain as satisfies their appetite, but sufficient to destroy its future fecundity. The small cocoon is placed in the midst of them; you perceive at b (Fig. 8) a worm commencing operations. She gnaws the end of the grain, passing the thread over it to give it a purchase, and then commences tying up the others. The little cocoon at c had thirty-three grains tied around it. Soon these quarters are too confining; they start off on a grand tour, leaving their trails as they go in strings of fine silk, selecting at last cracks in floors, window-sills, and holes in the walls, where they suspend their pretty snowy cocoons, and take their rest until spring arrives and they rush forth to see the world and examine the farmer's crop. Can a granary be found in the length and breadth of this beautiful land where her presence can not be detected? If so, let that bin be photographed and exhibited at the next Universal Fair, for the owner has discovered what seems yet a great secret—that a broom is the most potent and effectual instrument in a barn, and should be kept moving.

At Figure 9 is shown the true Tipula destructor, or Wheat crane fly, commonly called "Daddy-long-legs" of the meadow, but it is not this ancient personage. Very few people can conceive how much injury is done the grain, grass, and herbage by these long-legged gentry. If you perceive a spot of grass or grain dying away, loosen the roots, and you will find that the maggots of these flies have devoured all the tender rootlets and fibres which, running through the earth, carry nourishment to the plant. It is difficult to obtain the larvæ; for when the grain exhibits by its hue of death that they are there, you will find them in a pupa state. The larvæ of all this family, with one or two exceptions, are furnished with very destructible mandibles, claw-shaped and transverse—not acting as is usual with other insects, but working against two other pieces which do not move, and are convexed and toothed. This insect is always found in wheat-fields early in the morning, when the ground is moist. She prefers rich loamy soil. She will stand on her fore legs, stretching out her very long hindmost pair, and with her ovipositor—shaped (d, Figure 15) like the bill of a crane—makes a hole in the ground, and deposits two or three coal-black eggs, like small grains; then she draws it up, proceeds a short distance, and repeats the operation. In a very short time out come the maggots, and to work they go. When satisfied, they attach themselves to a root, and commence rolling and working round their bodies until a cell for each is made, as smooth as glass within and a simple pellet of mud without. Here they undergo their transformations, and early in June they come forth. Take up a stalk of wheat when it is in a withered state, and nine times out of ten you will find it hung with little dirt balls (Figure 16); from these, in time, will issue these long-legged, ungraceful creatures. How they can double up their long legs and long body in such a space is indeed a mystery. They have most extraordinary faces; eyes whose facets are almost as numerous as those of a bee, but reflect no light, and appear as if carved in ebony; palpi and antennæ eccentric in the extreme; and a cushion between the claws of the foot. The haltiere (Figure 15) is an illustration for all others; and I have given it here expressly as a proof of my view of their use. In plucking one out, after removing the outside scales, I drew with it the whole apparatus. The horny line around it is hollow; you perceive the white part—it resembles the parchment of a battledore doubled. A net-work communicates to this parchment, which, when the haltieres move, which they do unceasingly, fills the stem with air, which passes on to the air-sacs, and is conveyed into the nervures of the wings. Can any thing be more complete, more wonderful in construction? There are numerous varieties of this insect, not easily distinguished. They are more numerous in the Middle States and out West than toward Northeast. It was members of this same family that devastated the fields of grain near Edinburgh, and other parts of Scotland, in the beginning of this century, and that almost ruined the crops in England in 1813. They are rapidly on the increase in this country; and if the stubble of the fields is not plowed up and consumed with fire they will leave their impress of this age as distinctly as other insects have done on theirs. They are more to be dreaded than many others, because the evil is so insidiously accomplished. They work under ground, and when first perceived it is too late to try remedies. Strange that farmers can not be taught that fire is their greatest auxiliary in the field! If they would only burn up all that is now plowed under or placed in the compost bed, they would be wiser men, and find their pockets heavier. This is the only remedy for more than a half of these depredators.

The last insect I shall figure for you in this paper is in appearance a charming little moth (Figure 11). I can not find mention made of her in any authority I have at hand; and until I can find that she has already been christened,

I shall call her Tinea Aristati, or Awn moth; both words signifying “beard,” awn being the old Saxon word for this appendage. She is very small; her fore wings are of a brilliant glossy brown dotted with black; her under wings and body of a soft gray penciled with black; both pair of wings being deeply fringed. Her antennæ have sixty-two very minute joints, each with a long hair and two smaller attached on each side. Her palpi are broad, and have heavy feathers lying like scales on top of each other. She has a number of these around her head and sucker. She deposits her eggs at the root of the beard of the grain, and as this thread-like appendage performs important functions in the economy of the plant, you may conceive of course that the grain will suffer if it is injured. The worm is very similar to many others, but has two spines on the tail and some strong ones about the head. When they have finished feeding they crawl up the thread or beard and spin their pretty little cocoons, attaching them as I have (Figure 20) represented. But out of five of these cocoons three will yield each a pretty little ichneumon belonging to the subgenera Ophion—a destructive parasite, which thus keeps them in strict subjection, and protects the crops from their ravages. There is a variety of this same Tinea much lighter and more silvery in appearance. She is very common West; but I have seen both often in the Eastern States and Canada. How marvelous it is that crops are made at all with such a host of enemies to contend with! and when men, from indifference or sheer idleness, assist their enemies, the insects, by planting diseased seed, as shown in Figure 18. Can you expect healthy progeny from diseased parents? How then can you expect full clean grain from diseased seed? If one sheaf of wheat—nay, even if one leaf in a whole field shows rust, it should all be discarded as seed, for the disease is there although not exhibited. He who digests a hint realizes in time a fact.

“They say it is an ill mason that refuseth any stone, and there is no knowledge but in a skillful hand serves either positively as it is, or else to illustrate some other knowledge.”*

I have a letter before me now asking a few questions which I suppose have been suggesting themselves to the reader's mind as he has followed me through this article. First: “Whether and how such insects are imported from abroad?” No insect belonging to a plant will be found where that plant does not exist, or some one of the same family which can serve as a substitute. But how the insect follows the plant is one of those mysteries which He who directs all things keeps as yet from us. Those who watch Nature most closely know only that the plant and its enemy always appear together. Not long ago a friend, possessing a large garden and hot houses, wished me to see a new flower just blooming. He had received it in November from very far West, some thousand of miles away. He had planted it, and now in March it was in flower. It was the very beautiful, chaste, but fragile Prairie crocus. Well, there it was, a charming sight; and hovering over it in the mild evening air was a very minute dark moth of the Agrotididae family—a species very numerous, and some varieties of which belong alone to the flowers of the prairie. It was in vain I tried to catch this daughter of the winds and flowers. Said I, in sorrow, “Look out for an addition to your usual supply of cut-worms.” He has told me since that the bed where this flower grows is useless so far this season; every thing is cut down. Now where did the insect come from? Who can tell! There was no soil sent with the plant, for it had been hung up, as bulbs are, from the past season, and was so dry my friend despaired of its living at all. Yet here is a new insect for the East, and many varieties of the plant for it to propagate upon. Such grain-moths and insects as the Tinea which I have illustrated must be brought from abroad. It can not be avoided, and no greater disseminator of foreign insects exists among us than the Patent-office. But where you obtain the good you must likewise accept the evil, if any there is. Providence, however, protects the plant, for when the insect comes its ichneumon or parasite is not far away, and the balance will be kept even.

Now “some hints for prevention as well as cure of the evils.” More than twenty years ago a scientific man, in his very valuable essay on the Hessian fly (Mr. E. C. Herrick), pointed out that the remedy for this fly was to plow up all the stubble and burn the field out. Show me the man from Maine to Florida who has followed this advice, and I will go a thousand miles to take him by the hand! But had it been to spend the day like a school-boy syringing his fields with soap-suds, he would have hastened to try the experiment.

It is enough to make one laugh and cry both, to go through the country and see the poor forlorn whitewashed, swathed and bandaged, lime-trodden, ashes-heaped, soap-sudded, train-oiled, bottle-hung trees and fields. When moths and beetles are flying it is too late to remedy the evil. You must overtake them before they fly. In autumn, before winter sets in, is the time to remedy these evils in field and orchard. Plow the former, and burn every thing like stubble upon them; remove the earth from the roots of trees, let it be sifted and mixed with lime, rock-salt, or ashes, leaving all lumps and large grains to be thrown on a heap of blazing brush. Thus the evil will be stayed, if not removed. There will be great benefits resulting to the crops, fruits, and vegetables from this process. Thousands of insects are quite indifferent where they deposit their eggs if a plenty of analogous food is near at hand. Fire is the only sure cure for all such. I trust this advice will not be lost upon our intelligent farmers in all parts of the country, and that there will be some to credit my words and faithfully try the experiment for their own sakes.

THE ENCHANTED TITAN.

CURSE you! O, a hundred thousand curses
 Weigh upon your soul, you black enchanter!
 Could I pour them like the coins from purses,
 I would utter such a pile instant
 As would crush you to a bloody pulp.
 But my rage I fain am forced to gulp;
 Anathemas are vain against cold iron,
 Nor can I swear this magic box asunder,
 Where I've been stifling since the days of Chiron,
 Fretting on tempered bolts, and hurling muffled thunder!

Through the chinks I see the dim green waters
 Filled with sunshine, or with moonlight hazy;
 Through them swim the oceanic daughters,
 Beautiful enough to drive me crazy.
 The fishes gaze at me with sphery eyes,
 And seem to say, with cold-blooded surprise,
 What Titan is it, that's so barred and bolted,
 Caged like a rat in some infernal cellar?
 Why even Enceladus, when the dog revolted,
 Was not so hardly treated by the Cloud Compeller!

And all, forsooth, because I loved his daughter!
 Loved that child of spells and incantation—
 Love her now beneath this dreary water—
 Love her through eternal tribulation!
 I wonder if her lips lament me still,
 In her enchanted castle on the hill?
 Or has she yielded to that damned magician,
 And with my pigmy rival weakly wedded?
 O Jove! the torment of this bare suspicion
 Preying forever on my heart, and like the Hydra headed!

O bitter day, when spells, like snakes uprearing,
 Enwrapped my limbs, and muscular as pliant,
 Pinioned my struggling arms, until despairing
 I lay upon the earth a captive giant!
 Then came the horror of this iron box—
 The closing of its huge enchanted locks—
 Then the cursed wizard to the windy summit
 Of the tall cape a coffered prisoner bore me,
 And flung me off, until, like seaman's plummet,
 I sank, and the drear ocean closed forever o'er me!

AN ARMISTICE.

"It is safest to begin with a little aversion."

MRS. MALABOR.

"QUEER now, isn't it? Somehow I never think of marrying any body."

"Very queer. Why, it's always in my mind, more or less. Whenever you see me rather still, and puffing away at the wall, or when I don't talk much going down Broadway of a morning, that's what it is."

The two friends walked on a little way in silence; the one who had spoken last looking about him, late as it was, for the face that he always expected to encounter in a crowd, but never had seen thus far. It must be full and round, with blue eyes, and a gentle mouth. That was Willard Goodman's beau-ideal; and when one knew his home and his mother, there was no longer a doubt as to what had foreshadowed it.

His friend was much taller than himself, much more quiet, with a far less sympathetic nature. He came as naturally by his reserve as Willard did by his loving and affectionate heart. He was English born, and had known no home but a boarding-house since he had been old enough to comprehend the tender watchfulness of a mother's love, or the hearty friendship of a sister. Poor fellow! No wonder that he never thought of marrying; he had no lost Eden to regain.

"There's a great deal in a name," said Willard, slowly taking his eyes from a tantalizing vail that half hid just such a face as he had been thinking of.

"Oh, you don't agree with Miss Julia Capulet, ha?"

"In a wife, I mean—a wife's name. I wasn't thinking about the play last night, though that little witch of a woman was worth looking at. I'm tired of the theatre, though. I don't believe, if I was married, I'd ever go again."

"Yes, you would—dancing after madam. Women always want to be showing themselves off in public. That's all they live for."

"How do you like 'Marian,' now?"

"Maid Marian? English, and so I like it, of course. Where are you going to-night, Will?"

"To see that cousin of mine. Do come—won't you? I've told her about you."

"No, I thank you." And Edward Chauncey shrugged his broad shoulders. "I'm going—let me see; I don't exactly know where I am going—down to the Astor House a while, I guess. Come along."

"Not to-night. I promised Helen to look 'round. I wish you would go! I know so few fellows; and it's mighty dull for her here—she's been accustomed to such stacks of 'em at home."

"Pity she hadn't staid there! What keeps her North in the winter, any way? Hanged if I'd stay in this climate a day if I could help it!"

"Business," said Will, abstractedly; "lawyers, and all that kind of thing. Hasn't got her husband's affairs settled up yet; so this year—it's been hanging on three or four now—she's going to have things wound up."

"Indeed! There it is again!" And the shoulders were shrugged evidently in contempt this time. "If there is any thing I do hate, it's a widow. Women of all kinds are had enough—don't amount to any thing—but a widow!—Well, she goes a little beyond any thing. No, I thank you." And Mr. Chauncy walked on, as his friend ascended the steps of a fashionable boarding-house and rung the bell.

"Mrs. Balsell? Oh, certainly, Mrs. Balsell was in her own parlor. Would the gentleman walk up?"

She was not only in the parlor, but "in the dumps," as she assured her cousin, when she had kissed him, as she always did. Whatever faults Helen Balsell might have had prudery was not one of them.

"Such a horrid cold as she had—it was enough to give any one the blues; such a horrid wind, and so cold. Ugh!" And she shivered for all the sea-coal fire, and wound a crimson scarf about her neck. "Find her North another year!"

"I'm glad Ned didn't come in, then," said the sympathizing cousin, wishing he knew what it was "mother" always prescribed for such colds.

"Ned—Ned who? No, a visitor was the last thing she wanted to see."

"He's a good fellow though, let me tell you, Nell; but queer—very queer. I think all Englishmen are, somehow."

"Englishmen!" retorted the lady, from behind the little embroidered handkerchief held between the fire and her flushed face. "If there's any thing I do hate, it's an Englishman!"

"Now that's odd!"—and Will Goodman's face lighted up with the singular coincidence—"that's just exactly what he said when I asked him to come and see you!"

"Did he? Cool, certainly. What does he know about me?"

"Why, I told him you were a widow, you see, not a day over two-and-twenty; and most men would have jumped at the chance of an introduction. I know plenty; but, you see, that's the kind I wouldn't bring here. Ned hates widows as he does—well, a landlady, say."

"Does he? Well, he's welcome to keep his distance." And it was plain, from the proud way the lady's head rose up, that her wrath was genuine. "What if she was a widow! Dear knows she couldn't help it. Hadn't she cried her eyes out on black-bordered pocket-handkerchiefs for two years—which was a great deal to do, considering the difference in age between herself and the late lamented, and that he had left her quite comfortable, and independent of all mankind, English or otherwise? There were plenty of men that did not hate widows, but admired them and adored them." And then she looked at the card-basket and letter-rack, and felt consoled at the slight this stranger had put upon her when she saw how full both were.

"About this Thanksgiving business, Will?" she said, presently. "Your mother insists upon my coming, and I've got this horrid cold. How in the world can I go!"

"It's bone-set!" cried out this kind young fellow just at that moment. "Bone-set, Coz; it would cure you right up. If we were only out home now, mother always has it on hand;" and he paused in perplexity, forgetting that most apothecaries followed his mother's example in that respect.

"Oh, I hate herb-tea! Maum Cressy has dosed me ever since I was so high. I don't think I can go at all, for my eyes are all swollen out of my head, and my voice is as thick—well, I don't know it when I hear it. I'm sorry to disappoint Aunt Grace, or to lose her Thanksgiving dinner, tell her; but you'd better write that I can't come. I don't feel like stirring away from the fire."

"But you must, Helen! That's just what I came to see about. I'm going up Wednesday, and they all expect you. Mother's set her heart upon it, and you know she's just as fond of you as if you were her own child. Why, there's nothing she wouldn't do for you."

What was there that she had not done already for her brother's only child! Helen thought of the long journey undertaken past middle-age—and Aunt Grace had ever been a "home body"—to comfort her in her heavy trouble three years before—the trouble that had left her orphaned and widowed within one year. No wonder that when she thought of the independence which many envied she only sighed.

"Well, Willie, if Auntie has set her heart on it, I must go—that's all; but you don't know how I dread it. This cold goes through and through me, and how I am to live when snow comes I don't see."

"I don't think you'll mind it so much then. It never seems half as cold when there's snow on the ground. I hope we shall have snow while we're up at Edgehill; we do sometimes when Thanksgiving comes so late."

"Do you think we will? Oh, that would be famous! Think I never have had a sleigh-ride! What train on Wednesday?" And there was far more animation in the inquiry than the languid invalid had shown before. But then we all know what a cold is.

"A cold in the head;

What need be said

Uglier, stupider, more ill-bred?"

Mr. Chauncy had not found the Astor House quite as pleasant as usual, apparently. He had reached home before his room-mate, and was luxuriating in a tumbler of something—the covered pitcher and lemon skins said what—and a fresh London Times. It was a bachelor's apartment, large enough to accommodate a book-case, a music-stand—the flute lay on the rack at that moment. He had indulged his next-door neighbor with "Nannie, wilt thou gang wi' me?" on his return home. There was a large engraving of the gracious Queen over his bed, holding the place occupied by a pencil drawing of a pleasant matronly face—Aunt Grace, you may be sure—over her son's pillow, at the other end of the room. Edward Chauncy had "tastes," and his books and easel and flute had saved him from a little wickedness in his day.

"Saw Jones down at the Astor, and he can't take that run on Long Island with me, old boy! What d'ye say? Suppose I go home with you, and try a Connecticut Thanksgiving after all?"

Was ever good-will so taxed! Will Goodman's ingenuity never had been before. He had given his friend a general invitation to his father's house for the last two years; he had urged him to spend this very holiday there, before he knew of the previous engagement with young Jones. But now Helen had concluded to go, and they would never get along at all. They could both say such cutting things, and it would keep the house in hot water.

As it happened, his room-mate did not notice his rueful visage at the moment, or the hesitating voice in which the "Oh yes, certainly," was uttered. He was too busily occupied in replenishing the slender pitcher before mentioned; otherwise his ever-ready pride would have taken fire. As it was, he flung the lemon skins into the grate and considered it a settled thing.

Having evaded an explanation on the start, Will Goodman deferred it from time to time; and finally concluded to "take the chances." It was a little cowardly, of course; but he delighted in his friend, and he loved his cousin. He did not want to offend either. You would have done just the same. I should, at all events.

"What takes you down town, though?" inquired Mr. Chauncy the morning of their departure. He was in a great state of preparation, having overlooked his guns and fishing-tackle, and selected a choice assortment, late as the season was, in the hope of some sport. There was also a tin can for botanizing—fine opportunity, the last of November, in Connecticut woods!—and the flute (but that was Will's idea) slipped into its morocco traveling-case, and was deposited in one of the innumerable pockets of a rough overcoat, showing great originality of construction, and an evident collusion of the owner and his tailor.

"Down town?—oh, a little business engagement!" and his companion's face, all unused to diplomacy, flushed guiltily. "I'll meet you at the upper dépôt in good time."

"Off with you, then!" said the bluff, hearty tones of the unsuspecting woman-hater, who "polished his stocks and oiled his locks" with great enthusiasm and a few musical interludes, in high good-humor with himself and all the world. For he did not often take holiday; the warehouse of Trenholm, Robertson, and Co., in which he was junior partner, seldom closed its great gates, and his desk was never empty.

Will Goodman looked about for his compagnon de voyage as the cars came slowly toward the upper dépôt. By his side was a muffled, and in consequence a rather ungraceful figure, consisting, as far as could be seen, of a cloak, blanket-shawl, fur tippet, and a huge muff, crowned by a close velvet traveling hat and an expansive green barege vail, really intended for use, and not in the least picturesque, like the brown and blue semicircles that leave the tips of pretty little noses to freeze in the cold wind.

"What in the world makes you so uneasy, Will? You'll have your foot right into my basket. There, I told you so, and all those meranges from Malliard's will be in a pretty condition! There you go again, bobbing up and down; I declare you'll have my vail off, and I wouldn't have any body but you see me such a figure for the world!"

Poor Will! A guilty conscience is proverbially a goad; and just then he had caught sight of a tall figure laden with sportsman's equipments, and beckoning to him to come forward and take half of an appropriated seat.

"One minute, Nell. I want to speak to a friend of mine;" and the wondering lady watched her escort as he joined the new arrival and went through an interesting little pantomime.

Evidently she was pointed out—both gentlemen looked toward her, and Will certainly pointed that way. The tall stranger shook his head, clear enough to decline the introduction her cousin had evidently proffered; and if he had not been a gentleman she would have said that the lowering look that came over his face as he stretched himself out over the seat was ill-temper.

It was very decided annoyance at finding himself "sold"—that was his expression—and if the cars had not been in motion he would have beat a precipitate retreat. But much as he disliked the idea of being shut up in a country house with a woman that would be expecting all sorts of attentions, confound it! and a widow into the bargain; he loved his precious limbs too well to attempt a flying leap, so he sat still and sulked, Englishman as he was.

"Who's that, pray?" asked the lady, pettishly, as her rather crest-fallen cavalier returned.

"Only my English friend you've often heard me speak of."

"Declines the pleasure of my acquaintance, does he? Oh you needn't say a word, I saw it all for myself! He needn't have distressed himself! No one's going to carry him off! How far is he going?" she added, abruptly.

"As far—well, about forty miles you know. It's forty miles to Edge Hill, isn't it?"

"Will!"

"Helen!"

"That man isn't going to your father's!"

"I believe he is."

"Well I shall not, that's all. You may just stop at the next station. Yes you may, and I'll go back to New York by myself. I'm not going to have my Thanksgiving and my Aunt Grace spoiled by that sulky, wretched-looking Englishman. I declare, Will, if it wasn't in the cars, I could box your ears."

And she looked at the moment as if the exercise would have relieved her; but when she found that they were on an express train, which did not stop for more than two-thirds of the way, she gradually quieted down, as her cousin knew she would, and made other arrangements; not the less hostile to the intruder, however.

Three o'clock of a dark, gloomy November afternoon when they neared the station. Will Goodman began to recognize landmarks, and dreaded the first collision between his forces. There was a long ride before them still, seven miles to Ryefield, and very likely only a covered wagon sent for them. How in the world was he to stow Helen's two trunks, those awkward looking fowling-pieces, their respective carpet bags, and the two belligerents?

"Rather coldish," he said, in an indifferent kind of way, as he came forward and stood clinking the brass checks on the back of the seat his friend still continued to occupy.

"I say, Will, all that her baggage! How are we going to the farm? I don't relish being jammed into close quarters."

"Oh, there'll be a wagon or something; they don't know you're coming, you see, or they would have sent the big one. As it is we shall have to be amiable, and you must put your feet in your pocket."

"How far from the farm is the next station?"

"Just about as far as this. We sometimes go that way. Ryefield lies at the point of an angle—so, between the two—but this is the best road."

"Well, I'll try the other anyhow. It's likely I can get a vehicle of some kind, and I want to see the country."

Obstinate to the last, even Will Goodman felt provoked at his pertinacity, and suffered him to go his own way with very faint remonstrance. Besides, it helped him out of the present difficulty, though he said nothing to Helen as he assisted her to the platform, and went to hunt up his father's man Jacob.

"They've sent plenty of buffalo robes, you see, Helen, and I'll get a hot brick for you before we start. Here, let me tuck this down a little. I'll sit on the front seat with Jacob."

"Where is your friend?" inquired Helen, as the preparations for their drive were made without reference to him. With feminine daring she was eager now for the encounter; and it needed none of Will's explanations or apologies to help her to understand that she was most openly and ungallantly avoided. She had thought before to wound the self-love of the individual in question—the exposure of the ride was scarcely noticed in planning a complete subjugation. Her benumbed faculties were wonderfully quickened. She had not felt so like herself since the cold began.

The hospitable doors of the wide brown farmhouse were thrown open to receive them, and Aunt Grace herself almost lifted Helen from the vehicle, shawls and all.

"You poor child you, out in such a day! Ain't you most frozen? Do come right in. Here, let me take your basket for you: you run right in by the fire; and down sick with a cold to start with. Father, here's Helen after all. Your uncle should have come for you himself, but he strained his wrist somehow last week, and ain't been fit to drive since. Never mind, we'll nurse you up and make you all right again. I've got plenty of bone-set in the garret chamber."

"You never saw any such weather as this I reckon, Helen. Beats Georgia, don't it?" and Uncle Goodman kissed her on both cheeks. "Fresh as a rose. La, mother, she ain't going to die yet a while!"

"No indeed," laughed the new-comer, gayly; "I've lost my cold in the cars, and don't intend to find it again."

"Hadh't you better come right up stairs now, and lay off your things," said Aunt Grace, working away at the strings of the deep velvet bonnet. "Come now. I had a fire made up in the spare room, for I knew how you'd feel the cold. You run right up, and I'll step into the kitchen and bring you a cup of tea; supper ain't just ready, and a cup of tea is wonderful comforting after a journey. Why, Willard, how do you do, my boy?" and Helen, half-way up the stairs, looked over the balusters to see the hearty greeting between mother and son: it did her good.

So did the cup of tea which Aunt Grace prepared just as she liked it, and brought up with her own hands; and when she had brushed out her curls, and shaken the creases from her black silk traveling dress, and smoothed her neat linen collar with its crimson bow—she had a Southerner's taste for all warm, bright coloring—the heavy-eyed, pettish invalid had quite disappeared in the gay and elegant woman that took up her station to the right of the cheerful fire in the parlor below. Chatting so fast and so brightly with her dear Northern friends, whose heartiness and affectionateness always made her so at home among them, she had not forgotten the dreary traveler approaching. He came at last, just as Aunt Grace began to get uneasy about her supper—chilled and forlorn enough after his solitary ride; so benumbed outwardly and inwardly that he scarcely heard the introductions Will accomplished laboriously, and was glad to find himself alone with his room-mate in an upper chamber.

"By George, Will"—and his face emerged from behind one of Aunt Grace's snowy towels—"I felt like a fool! Why didn't you tell me there was a young lady staying here?"

"Young lady, who?"

"Why the one by the fire. I just took one look; but she's a stunner. Handsome eyes, hasn't she? look a man right through. Lots of fun in her. Who is she?"

"Oh, Helen! Well, that's clever;" and the preliminary flourish of the descending hair-brush was arrested half-way by such a shout of laughter that Helen heard it in the parlor, and Aunt Grace, busied with her biscuits and chickens, in the kitchen.

Such a supper it was, too, as only Ryefield Farm could furnish. "Thanksgiving wasn't the time to stint in any thing," was the doctrine that governed the household; and Helen found that she had recovered her appetite as well as her good looks, and being perfectly conscious of the latter, gave herself up to her uncle's pleasant though not particularly novel jokes, and her aunt's fond petting. As for Mr. Chauncy, he tried to keep up his wonted reserve at first, but the frost melted in the fire of so much kindness, and he niched himself into the family circle in a manner that was remarkable to Willard Goodman, who had dreaded the impression that the stiff, rather formal, manner habitual to him when embarrassed might create.

The evening slipped away, and eleven o'clock came before the circle formed around the parlor fire after tea had been broken. There were nuts and apples. "Nuts are such sociable things," remarked Aunt Grace, and sweet cider sparkling and creaming like Champagne in the old-fashioned cut-glass tumblers.

"You might as well bring the big Bible, Will," said his mother, as he took his cousin's empty glass. "We must be up bright and early in the morning to get to church in season."

It was the first thing that had jarred on the stranger since he entered the household. He had been so long away from all parental restraint that he had shaken off the recollection of its better influences also; and had lost sight of, if not wholly broken, the tie that binds every soul to its Father.

But courtesy forbade that he should show how irksome the proposition seemed, and he began, with his artist's eye, to note the grouping of the picture before him. The open Bible spread out upon the stand, the two lights burning before it, and the venerable head bowing down to the sacred page; Aunt Grace straightening her figure unconsciously, and folding her plump hands before her; Willard listening with habitual attention, his fine face deepening into thoughtfulness; and Helen gazing at the fire light, her eyes shaded by her slender white hand. He began to think he would go to church after all the next day, though he had not been before in many years.

He was glad of it afterward when he found himself seated close to the lady he had so churlishly avoided only the day before. She looked very radiant in the pink hat and plumes that emerged from one of the trunks, and the ample Cashmere shawl that swept in such admirable folds about her tall figure. The russet-colored gloves were just the shade he preferred, and fitted exactly; and there was the faintest breath of heliotrope whenever she moved the handkerchief held so lightly between them. "Radiant!" was the word that came most naturally to his mind when he first encountered her in the hall, dressed for church, and he repeated it to himself whenever he turned that way.

It was not so much the sermon that impressed him, though that was an earnest, grateful appeal to those who listened to number the blessings of the year, and of their whole lives, and be thankful for them, but the Psalm, with its exulting chorus—

No change of time shall ever shock
My firm affection, Lord, to thee;
For thou hast always been my rock,
A fortress and defense to me—and the clear voice of the singer nearest to him, whose hand rested on the time-worn hymn-book which she held out with a gesture that signified her expectation that he would join. And he did so, moved by the choral harmony that rose and swelled around him, wondering at himself all the while, and at the deep earnestness that impressed them. There must be something real, after all, in a belief and a worship that took such deep root in the heart. He found himself wondering over it many times that day.

There was no contradiction in the merriment of the evening; all was cheerfulness, as became those whose hearts and lives were purely thankful. The gathering in the parlor included Will's two married brothers and their families, cousins and friends, all of whom were sufficiently at home to say "Aunt Grace," and to banish every particle of formality. They sang, they jested, and though the shade of Puritanism was the only shadow there and forbade a dance, they played rustic games that were still more mirthful and quite new to the two guests. They were not afraid of linked hands, and even a kiss, these honest folk; and the blushes and pretty confusion caused by forfeits and pawns were no cover for perverted hearts and sullied imaginations.

The merriment went on, and the only two who had been spectators were drawn into it. "What is it? what is it?" called out Helen, brightly, as she came flying out into the hall to redeem a forfeit from the "wretched Englishman."

There was no light there, but that which came through the half-opened parlor door, behind which he stood. It revealed her rose-red cheeks and tangled curls, her eyes dancing with fun and frolic. She put out her hand in the dusky shadow to find him.

"How am I to 'pay the porter?'" she said again, merrily. "It is all new to me."

"And to me too," he said; but he took pay as he had been bidden. He had not intended to, but he could not help the irresistible impulse. They were alone in the shadow, dangerously near, and she held out her hand to him. He took it—took them both—and held them so tightly that she almost screamed, and then he kissed her full on those red lips!

And Helen stood still for one moment, blushing, frightened, but most of all at her own traitorous heart, that did not resent it, and then went flying up the stairs, to stand alone in the darkness of her own room, and wonder how it had all come about.

"It's most time the young folks were home," said Aunt Grace, walking to the window with her knitting. "Don't you think so, father?"

"Don't hurry 'em, though talking won't do it for that matter;" and Mr. Goodman yawned and stretched out his feet to the glowing coals on the hearth. "But I don't mean to sit up. They can look after themselves, I reckon. Helen's able to any day. How that young Englishman has come 'round, though! Willard told me the first night they came that he was so very topping he didn't know how Helen and he would get along. I haven't seen any thing of it, I must say. He seems to me very much like other folks."

"Guess they'll do," said Aunt Grace, quietly, leaning against the sash and looking out upon the shadow of the barns on the new-fallen snow. Such moonlight, and such snow! And the weather had moderated so that one might say, Such sleighing! Helen was having her first sleigh-ride.

"They'll want something to eat when they do get here," she added, presently, ever on hospitable thought intent. "So don't wait for me. I'll just step to the pantry and see what I can find."

Mr. Goodman had already deposited himself on the billowy feather-bed that displayed its inviting outline and snowy counterpane in the down-stairs bedroom, when the quick jangle of bells announced the return of the first of the party. Aunt Grace looked out of the pantry window, but went quietly on with her preparations, and a significant nod as she held communion with herself over the pie-dish. "She had left a light in the parlor, and they could wait till she came; the front door never was locked half the time, and wasn't now, any way."

She forgot that Mr. Goodman had taken his departure since, and the lamp had vanished with him; but there was a cheerful red light from the fire, and Helen made her way toward it and leaned her head down upon the mantle. She stood there without turning round, when a heavier shadow fell out into the room.

"You have forgiven me?" and an arm was passed lightly around her, the hand resting on the mantle very near her face.

"You! Yes, it's myself I have to forgive now;" and the thoughtful look passed away, and the old defiance lighted up her eyes again.

"Children," said Aunt Grace, coming toward them with her loaded tray, "there, I've brought you something to eat; but there's only one plate, I find. However, I guess you wouldn't mind much if there was only one fork too; for 'pears to me you've about made up your minds to eat out of one dish for the rest of your lives."

THE FORTUNE-TELLER.

"HARK, my maiden, and I'll tell you
By the power of my art,
All the things that e'er befell you,
And the secret of your heart.

"How that you love some one—don't you?
Love him better than you say;
Won't you hear, my maiden, won't you?
What's to be your wedding-day?"

"Ah, you cheat, with words of honey,
You tell stories, that you know!
Where's the husband for my money
That I gave you long ago?

"Neither silver, gold, or copper Shall you get this time from me;
Where's the husband, tall and proper,
That you told me I should see?"

"Coming still, my maiden, coming,
With two eyes as black as sloes;
Marching soldierly, and humming Gallant love-songs as he goes."

"Get along, you stupid gipsy!
I won't have your barrack-beau;
Strutting up to me half tipsy,
Saucy—with his chin up—so!"

"Come, I'll tell you the first letter
Of your handsome sailor's name"—

"I know every one, that's better, Thank you, gipsy, all the same."

"Ha, my maiden, runs your text so?
Now I see the die is cast;
And the day is—Monday next." "No,
Gipsy, it was—Monday last!"

A THOUGHT FOR CHRISTMAS-DAY.

WE are wont to look with suspicion on the manifestations of so-called Spiritualists. The nature of the medium is generally vulgar, the communication worthless and disgraceful to all intelligence save that of the communicator. Rappings, however originated, whether by imposture, or a lawless, because ignorant, use of law, will never universally persuade of nearness, presence, willingness.

Yet to us the story of Job is authentic.

And still justice and judgment are the habitation of His throne. Not a sparrow falls to the ground without your Father. The hairs of your head are numbered. "Vengeance is mine," saith the Lord; "I will repay." The Omnipotence of Heaven "comprehends the dust of the earth in a measure." The inhabitants are as grasshoppers; yet to bring life to light for these the Redeemer endured the shadow of death.

To consider how a man had power to forgive sins, and whether that forgiveness involved the remission, or was potent to the revocation of a curse, is the purpose of this paper.

On the 25th of December, while in all Christian homes there was rejoicing over truth and joys, an event occurred that was of infinite importance to one man in the world—that man gave up the ghost.

Old, hoary, wrinkled, placid, smiling, dead, he lay under the moss-grown roof that sheltered him in days and nights when the smoke that curled up from his chimney and the light that burned in his window were tokens hailed by travelers in the wilderness with thankful expectation.

This log-cabin was the very oldest tenement in Hapworth town. A ruin in reality, it seemed merely waiting to make the fact apparent till the old occupant should "stand from under."

It would not have been considered habitable by any other man than Sardius Stone; he used to answer all warning when the shattered condition of the house was spoken of, "It will outlast me." And I suppose it would have done so had he lived on ten years further.

Close by this cabin stood a willow-tree that was still in its glory when all traces of the ancient beauty and picturesqueness had disappeared from the house and its locality. The mighty branches of this willow held the house in shadow all day long, the fair drapery of its hangings fell around the grisly place with the generous grace of nature. Eighty years ago the young pioneer planted the twig he had used for a riding-whip on his long journey, the spray of willow broken from the tree that grew by his father's door. Heaven and earth gave of themselves to the willow, and the twig became a giant. A thousand birds might reckon it their home.

Fourscore years had Sardius Stone dwelt in this town of Hapworth, once called Stoneburgh, after him, its oldest inhabitant.

How must the old man's memory have been stored with facts of wild wood life, and of adventure, feats of daring and of desperation! and how must he have treasured the slow, rich fruits of patience! Sometimes a judicious listener could draw from out this store-house things old and precious; but Sardius was not a garrulous man in his weakest days, and no amount of persuasion could prevail on him to unlock the treasures of his memory, unless he perceived in the listener such evidence of worthiness to hear as acted upon him like magic or like an inspiration.

He had now avoided the world for a score of years and more. His tales had become traditional. It was long since he had been seen in the porch of the ancient public house in the outskirts of the town, once the head-quarters of all travelers. He could not be persuaded out by any solicitation to vote for his country's good in his latter years. Long before his exit he refused to figure among veterans on the fourth day of July. No more telegraphs from heart to brain could thrill the old man's life to any show of action.

He was dead, the careless said, ten years before he made his silent appeal for burial. Nevertheless, when Death officially indorsed that saying, the town seemed struck with wonder. Scarcely any person had perceived, during the autumn and in early winter, that Sardius was roughly shaken—that he felt the cold more keenly than ever before. And scarcely any body was aware of his reviving intelligence, the spirit with which he had taken up the experiences of his early youth again, and the interest with which he dwelt upon them, as if restored once more to friends and neighbors.

Those who cared for him most reverently were all gone before him. Apparently he was setting out without one "God-speed" on his journey; for he had outlived every creature on whom he could rely. Yet the watchfulness of woman was for him—the gentle care, the tender speech, the unflinching reverence for what had been and what was.

It pleased him to call this girl his child by his own daughter's name—his daughter Juliet, who has the fine monument in the old cemetery—that Juliet who died sixty years ago, to the astonishment of the world, which has never yet learned, and never will or can learn, that the death of youth and beauty, goodness and purity, is an event to be anticipated in the course of nature.

The young person who made a sudden claim on his gratitude, and was answered by the last flashing of the fire of human feeling—this young girl who carried for him, month after month, his daughter's name, was an inmate of the lunatic asylum, and the service she rendered the old man was merely such as any good heart might have prompted without thought of result except of the moment.

She was walking in the cemetery one day, the pale-faced, sad-hearted daughter of misfortune, whom griefs and losses had conspired to banish from the glorious paths of youth, and love, and beauty. Sardius found her by his daughter's grave reading that elaborate epitaph which failed so utterly to tell her virtues and his sorrow. The sight of the youthful figure and the lovely face, so mild and sad, her interest in the fine monument, and, he thought, her curiosity, moved the old man's heart. Weeping, he began to tell of "Juliet," and, weeping, the stranger listened. So they were friends thenceforth; friends by misfortune—friends for the sake of the dead, the dying old man, and the young girl who was dead unto the world.

Sardius called her Juliet, and seemed at times persuaded that she was his daughter, and she did never argue with him or say he was deceived, but was really angelic in her involuntary personation of an angel.

The physician under whose charge she was placed rejoiced that any thing could excite and retain her interest, smiled on this friendship, and allowed it to strengthen as it would. She made his last days happier than he or any for him could have anticipated, and the town, which had almost forgotten and was quite regardless of him, was not disgraced by the circumstances of the death of Sardius Stone.

It must have pleased the young girl as often as she saw the smile that struggled through his wrinkles when he recognized her. She made the lonely house seem like a new place to him with the order and the cleanliness she caused to abound there. Her life began to have some interest, her days some connection, when one idea, his comfort, was established in her mind.

There was no mistaking her satisfaction when he would greet her coming by the repetition of some curious dream of the past night. He dated all his comfort and enjoyment from the time he found her in the grave-yard; and grotesque as was the fortune he fashioned from past fact and present fancy, he was certain never to be confused or bewildered by "Juliet's" attempt to set him right. They loved each other with a sort of tender pity that gave large indulgence for the wildest vagaries of fancy. She wearied of no repetition. How often do you suppose the old man told her of his riding-whip, the willow spray, which he planted at his journey's end? How many times did he repeat the Hapworth sale or swindle? I could not begin to tell, but she never tired of hearing; ever fresh, her sympathy sprang up to soothe his trouble, or his wrongs, or indignation; and so many times he averred, in answer to such sympathy, "you are my daughter—you are Juliet," that it should seem no wonder if at length she almost believed it.

So on Christmas morning Lydia Hertz—that was her name—went to carry the old man a token of the birth of THE CHILD. Children they both were, both remembering this great world's festival, and waiting for it day by day.

Old Sardius had not risen when his guest arrived, and at a glance she might have seen that he would never rise. And yet the compassionate creature knew it not.

He looked up at her when he saw her standing by his bedside, for he did not hear her approach. He had evidently desired and expected her to come; she did not need that he should say what she so well perceived. He was eager to speak, and did speak, audibly, clearly, without a struggle, when she came close to him—words which he knew were to be his last—

"I was waiting for you, Juliet. Tell Hapworth I forgive him."

So clear an utterance he had not for years been able to command. It startled Lydia; old experiences in chambers of despair, by the bedside of death, began sorrowfully to enlighten her; yet, though she feared, she did control herself to smile serenely, and to answer,

"I shall tell him this morning. Look! I have brought you a Christmas present, father."

He took it in his hands. He thanked her with a look—that was the last of him: the old man, a hundred years old, was dead.

We might linger here a moment to remember that, eighty years ago, Sardius Stone stood in this very chamber, which Lydia did not darken when she softly closed the door and left him alone, a youth full of spirit and of courage that disdained the luxuries he left behind him—stood and surveyed his quarters, anticipating for the present not much more than his supply of daily wants, a roof over his head, plain fare, and moderate success in disposing of his lands.

Does he lie there a hundred years with even these modest hopes ungratified, the old moss-grown roof ready to fall upon him, a neglected, forgotten man?

This is not all. The history is somewhat more complicated; the runner can not read it.

Those antlers above the door belong to the trophies of his first year in the forest. The rifle, suspended from the next rafter, is rusty from disuse, and indeed long since incapable of service; he brought it with him from the settlements; he was proud of it when a lad—that fact in the connection is worthy of a thought.

The rough furniture, so old and worn, is the same that met his smiling approval as he looked about him in those ancient days, when he was glad to think of all he had renounced of luxury and bondage for the freedom of the woods, the rough fare of independence.

The earth had grown old rapidly during his last half century. How shall we choose to omit the recognition?

According to prophecy fire was fast destroying the world. The old earth and heavens were passing away. Behold all things were being created new. TIME should soon be no longer. The inheritance of all things to them that overcame! Even His paths in the great waters—even the ends of the earth for possession. While the steadfast Redeemer waited for His enemies, reigning till they should come. Old Sardius might have seen them, had his eyes not been so dim, coming from the north, east, south, and west, as we still see them, and as our children shall; for under His feet the Enemy must lie, and our great city be not Paris, New York, London, but Salem, the centre of the world, the centralized splendor of nations—centralized by a celestial policy—the City of Peace—God of Love in the midst of her that she shall not be moved.

Yesterday this old man was almost the only link that bound the conquering present with the toiling past. Dead, past praying for, were the heart of youth that could look on his white hairs, and, reviewing the pioneer's experiences, fail to apprehend the splendor of his fortune who was born to the last half of the nineteenth century. That this link should be broken on Christmas-Day seemed to some minds significant. But by the one man whom it really concerned the news was not received as an event of import.

Lydia Hertz went quietly out from the chamber of death, leaving on the bed the slippers she had made for Sardius. Even under her light step the old boards creaked. The room would have looked most dismal to any other eyes than hers, and to her it was not the same place it was a few moments ago, before he breathed his last. She would not light the fire now that he did not need its warmth. The day was mild and sunny: any person who should busy himself there in needful service could do so without discomfort from the cold.

The first business of the young girl was to find Justice Hapworth and deliver the message. She had seen the gentleman walking sometimes in his garden, or in the church, or driving about in his carriage; every body knew the great man of the town; he had a person worth a glance; he always could command that.

Lydia passed through the great gate, and entered the carriage-way, following its windings through the handsome evergreens until she came near the house. She saw Justice Hapworth descending the steps.

The serious errand on which she came possessed her entirely. She thought of nothing but Sardius Stone and his last words as she approached the master of this place. No misgiving, no vain self-consciousness disturbed her. Calm and steady as a fate she went to meet him.

Justice Hapworth recognized the lady. He had before now observed her in the asylum and elsewhere, and any request she had to make in her own behalf, or in that of any other person, he would be almost certain to heed. He approached her with a smile, but there was no response to it in her serious face. She had come from a presence too dreadful; she could not turn from the friendly dead with tears and greet the careless living with a smile; so, in all the grave integrity of her own spirit, she said, "He is dead—old Mr. Stone. He lies down there in the old house. I just left him. He told me to find you and say, 'Tell Hapworth I forgive him.'"

For a moment Justice Hapworth regarded the messenger with silent wonder; then he frowned, but afterward he laughed. He was so proud, and could afford to be so contemptuous; the message impressed him much the same as though a worm had crawled out of the path he walked in, giving him all the way.

The face of the messenger flushed. Her voice betrayed her, yet she managed to say, with dignity,

"Those were the very words. You may not be the person intended; but I did not know there was another of your name, Sir. He certainly knew what he was saying; and he said it in such a way that I thought, and I think, the words must be of worth to somebody."

"He died at nine o'clock, you say," said Mr. Hapworth, looking at his watch.

"While the bell was ringing," answered Lydia; and it was a matter of small moment to her that Justice Hapworth was so courteous as to follow her to the gate of his grounds, and with his own hands open it that she might pass, or that he should say kindly,

"Even if you made a mistake, and of course you have not, I have to thank you for a good intent. I shall see to it that the town gives Mr. Stone a burial becoming the first settler of Hapworth."

A promise any citizen might have presumed to make.

But when he said, "If you were not in such haste I would ask permission to bring you some flowers from the green-house. You might put them in his room, or perhaps carry them home," she answered quickly, "I am in too great haste, Sir;" and did not even thank him for the courtesy declined.

The courtesies of Justice Hapworth were not usually rejected, and never, it may safely be said, with so poor an appreciation of their value. That any one should decline a flower from his hot-house was a matter of no great moment, yet he would have been better satisfied if the lady had manifested less indifference to the service he would cheerfully have rendered. He was vexed when he wished her good-morning, and did not smile at himself even when he recollected that she was a patient in the Asylum—a person by no means responsible for want of courtesy or plain speaking.

He went into the green-house at once, after he closed the gate upon the girl; thinking that, though she refused them, the flowers should be gathered, and he would himself take them. Take them! The absurdity of the sentiment he would indulge struck him the instant he crossed the threshold of the dainty crystal palace. This perfume and this beauty; how should he transfer it, or any portion of it, to the hovel where Sardius Stone was lying dead? Love might have borne these flowers—or any, the richest, the fairest that ever blossomed—to any place of death, however low and squalid; and placed by loving hands on any bier the gift were well, were decent.

But he must make no such offering; mock no sense by such a tribute. He would, however, go and see poor Sardius in his last state. Accordingly he walked down to the old log tenement, as became the descendant of Squire Hapworth. He was the first person that opened the door Lydia Hertz had closed behind her when she left the old man to convey his message.

No man of reflection associated as he, by his progenitors, with this figure of clay, not long since animated by a spirit that had dealt with the dead from whose life he sprung—no man of any feeling, situated as he was—could have looked unmoved on what Hapworth there beheld: such a figure, such a setting!

Some traces of the manly beauty for which Sardius Stone was renowned in his prime were still to be discerned in the face that was no longer controlled by the spirit that had been in bonds so long. Lydia had closed the eyelids; and the eyes which had looked with pain on vanity for weary years that seemed to have no end for him, gave not now their painful emphasis to the numberless wrinkles with which brow and cheeks were furrowed. And the wrinkles themselves seemed, half of them, to have disappeared. Any fond gaze could have seen something to rejoice over in the now placid countenance, so full of satisfied composure. This man had done with sense and time; the show, so poor to him, was over; he stood among the final verities.

Justice Hapworth, reckoning his age, was astonished at the peaceful tokens of the face. During the past years he had come to regard this man as a model of unworthiness—a gloomy, misanthropic, slanderous old dotard, whose pride had destroyed him, when those who started in the race with him outstripped him, prospering to the end.

Long ago, when the destitute condition of Stone was represented to him, Hapworth had made a provision for him that should keep him in comfort, year by year, so long as he should live. This supply of the ordinary human needs had been made without the old man's knowledge; he had never heard his benefactor's name. Justice Hapworth had pursued this course in the veteran's behalf with special reference to his feelings, fearing that he would, with childish obstinacy, refuse the gratuity when he knew the source; for the hostility of old Sardius Stone toward old Squire Hapworth and his descendants was no secret: there was a time when all its facts were notorious in the town.

Justice Hapworth was a man of action; but some reflection by this dead body he could not well avoid. He did not smile here when he looked on death, and remembered that the last words spoken in that room were words of forgiveness in which he was concerned. When he went away and closed the door and left the body, it was not with the sorrow of the girl who preceded him, but with a deeper solemnity, and some strange questionings.

An electric thrill seemed to pass through Hapworth town when it was told, from street to street, that Sardius Stone was dead. Even those who had most lightly appreciated the pioneer, who lost his wits when he lost his property fifty—sixty years ago; for to that cause people generally assigned the clouds and darkness which gathered over his mind—even such evinced considerable emotion, more than could have been anticipated by any one who knew the neglect he had lived to experience. The fall of the landmark was an event. It gave the pens of editors employment; town records were looked over; general information sought; sounding sentences developed with the fine occasion. The Council, as one man, voted the deceased a public funeral. Mr. Hapworth understood that his motion would secure the vote; and every body echoed what he said in his brief speech, that so much homage as this was due to the departed century.

More attention than had been bestowed on the log tenement for a score of years was its share when people and their children perceived that the moss-grown roof covered the dead body of one who had lived a hundred years, once the owner of a hundred thousand acres hereabouts, whose axe felled the first tree, whose hand planted the first wheat-field of a settlement that had grown to be a city of repute, whose forty prosperous years had been lost in sixty of disaster and helplessness.

There was a proposition made in the early stage of "proceedings" that he should be buried from the church he had helped to build, and which he long attended, but this was overruled; and accordingly the funeral was held in the old cabin. Not from the fine stone mansion on the hill, long the great house of a hundred miles—the home from whence his wife and daughter were buried. Even from the little, tottering, moss-grown cabin which in his prosperous days he had reverently protected from decay—from this poor, willow-shaded lodge, to which he had retired when his old eyes had seen all this world can give taken away.

The preacher, who was an orator, ascended the platform in front of the house, and from thence addressed the immense throng gathered from far and near, in deference to that whose present best representative was to be found in the white hairs, and wrinkled visage, and the name of Sardius Stone.

The country had come to town in crowds. Long would both town and country remember the day's wintry beauty, its quiet and its brightness, the little house, and the exceeding great company; the generous eloquence, and the lofty theme—time, death, eternity; the gravity of the aged, and the attention of children. The last century seemed indeed to wait interment at the hands of this people.

Country folks cut twigs from the venerable willow-tree to plant around their homes, or on the road-side, or in the grave-yard where they had buried their dead. One became a thousand. All in memory of Sardius Stone, who, many a conscience said, had been allowed to pass too far from sight, to live too much alone. Even with the oft-repeated "He would have it so," they could not satisfy themselves.

There was just one mourner for the dead, the poor girl whom sorrows had benighted—she whom the old man called "Daughter" and "Juliet."

Conspicuous among the dignitaries appointed to follow the hearse on foot was Justice Hapworth, whose grandsire the preacher named with honor, and dwelt upon with fervor, as he recalled the early history of the Western District.

Had it been possible Justice Hapworth would gladly have resigned his place in the procession to another. Not because averse to display of this kind. No business, and no celebration of honorable public character, could be transacted in the town without his recognition and assistance. He was needed not merely as the representative of past dignity, but of present power and influence. But something as weak as misgiving disturbed his mind on this occasion.

He was not fearful of violating good taste, to which he was a patient slave, in thus allowing himself to appear in cruel contrast with that which must have burial. The name of Hapworth had superseded that of Stone, as had also the Hapworth deeds and titles. Success was with the living, and ruin with the dead—even the preacher seemed aware of the fact.

The misgiving was excited by nothing Hapworth heard or saw. He did not even recognize that he had any cause for the disturbance he felt. He was not mindful of the fact that the men were dead who used to talk much of the advantage, legal and illegal, taken by Squire Hapworth, agent, in his dealings with Sardius Stone, proprietor of the great land estate.

They were dead who would have talked, and found their listeners while they talked, of the processes by which Hapworth's fortune grew, and Stone's diminished, as the settlement passed through village, town, and city experiences. The man also had long since departed who was witness to the final separation between Stone and Hapworth, when both uttered words neither would ever forget, ending with Stone's "Never mind, Hapworth. You've got it all in your hands at last, but it will be cursed to you—mind that."

Years ago, exaggerated rumors of this quarrel and its causes were rife among the people. Here and there, in out of the way places, some mouldering fragment of the report might be found, but where the current of life ran swift and strong it was unknown, and most people would have felt the shame and the risk of bringing to mind a prophecy proved so false. For what curse had ever fallen on any Hapworth? The Squire's son, and his son's son, went on prospering and to prosper, and year by year their riches increased. No blight of any kind for them—strength and health, and a sound mind; position, power, and the grace to use it, distinguished Squire, and Judge, and Justice. Here stood the youngest representative in his beauty and his pride; there lay the prophet dumb, with thunder-bolt withdrawn—forgiveness on his lips—the last clear token of him a forgiving man.

Ay, and a little further let us look into the brightness of this picture. You might search far in vain for a nobler specimen of manly dignity and grace than this heir presented. The idea of his inheriting a curse was the last that could occur to a right-minded person, aware of his blameless life, his manifest fair fortune. He lived in becoming style though without display. He was not vain; he could not afford the time, and would not afford the money, to gratify vulgarity in his way of living. He never hunted heraldry in search of a crest and coat of arms to paint upon his panels or grave upon his seal. The house and grounds were kept in style without abatement of the splendor in which his father had indulged. But the world's notions had grown since then, and many a dashing speculator, who made his fortune last year and would lose it in the next, eclipsed the house of Hapworth in display. He disdained to rival such, and none that knew him called him niggard. Indeed, to the mind of respectable conservatism Justice Hapworth was a model man; and if the young men of the neighborhood ran off into wild courses of dissipation and extravagance, they were at least indebted to others besides him for example.

Yet the man was cursed. He might give away half his fortune, but was not a liberal man. He was selfish in his aims, even though they concerned entirely the public good. He was narrow in view, not lofty in sentiment, cautious, suspicious. A person need not be exalted to the dignity of an angel in order to be able greatly to pity such a man, though the mob of people round about will magnify his virtues, glorify his deeds, regard him as the model man, spitting on the prophets, stoning martyrs so to prove their brave dexterity, and their most keen perceptions.

When he came into possession of his estate he informed himself of every item of intelligence that concerned him before he would rest. His expenditure he early determined to regulate by his income; yet half that income remained on his hands at the end of every year. He missed all the profit of his charities except that of public praise; for in his heart was no charity, and in his life no beneficence. He missed the satisfaction of a nature whose sympathies are allowed their natural free action; he missed gratitude and love, except that of lying lips and careless tongues, and that nauseous gossip of the newspapers, the "free and unbought press." He missed, in fact, the blessedness of every blessing. The curse had fallen on his spirit, and if any where he had apprehended it, it would have been in the destruction of his property.

He laughed at the word of "Juliet," the tidings from the death-bed—FORGIVENESS—a curse revoked by him who uttered it, but he had good need of a deliverance.

How could he ever be made to understand? I know of but one power that works the unquestionable miracles.

Hapworth's serenity of countenance and general composure testified to the absence of excitement in the circumstances of his lot. He seemed to control those circumstances with a strong hand; in politics, in business, he had the coolness of a commander: no advantage was to be taken by the wary of his loss of self-possession. His sleep was unbroken by distracting thoughts. He was methodical and exact to a belittling extreme, for there is a point beyond which honesty can not go and hope to miss of actual degradation. If any body doubts it, let him trade with three-penny bits a while! But the time was come when even habit should be weak in controlling the man.

Of all faces of beauty, of all forms of grace, of all sweet voices, of all lovely eyes, was there none that could haunt him but the face, the form, the voice, the glance, of the young maid in the lunatic asylum, who had tenderly watched the dying days of Sardi Stone; who had indignantly resented Hapworth's thoughtless ingratitude?

For so it seemed. Of all women she alone ever for one moment disturbed the bachelor's peace, interfered with his ease, accused him in absence, reasoned with him in silence, followed him unseen, compelled him away from his close calculations, shamed his exactness, reasoned with him, persuaded him, proved to him that his self-sufficiency was not all-sufficient. But in his walks and drives he saw her not; and let no one suppose that the purpose of seeking her ever even flashed across his mind as possible. Among his designs you would never find one opposed to his immaculate good sense.

He did not seek her then; but in those wintry days he left undone two things of which he would not need to make account when he should sum up his sins of omission.

From harvest time till January it had been his purpose to cut short, make an end of a certain style of correspondence which had prevailed during these months between him and the agent of the largest portion of his estate. The year had been disastrous to all agriculturists; crops generally had failed, and the small farmers who rented land of him, paying him yearly interest from the profits of their labor, had, to a man almost, failed to act according to agreement. Since the fact of their impossibility to meet their obligations had come to the agent's knowledge, he had been performing the unusual duties of a mediator—stating facts, and leaving them to make their own appeal to the proprietor, who would not be impoverished by the impoverishment and withholding of his tenants.

This state of things interfered with the landholder's habits of business, and greatly displeased him. He had thought the matter over, and refrained from expressing his opinion to the agent because he intended that the business should be settled according to his own mind, and he could not clearly see how that was to be done if what the agent said was true. Somewhere in the business he believed he should be defrauded. To secure himself he supposed he must insist upon the usual settlement between the agent and himself.

He had come to this conclusion before the death of Sardi Stone, but he did not act upon it. Early in the new year he sat down to make a finish of the business much more exactly than he had contemplated. That the grace might be made manifest to every man concerned as proceeding from his own royal hand, he released each tenant from payment whose name appeared upon the agent's list.

Last year he would have been incapable of such an act. On impulse he never acted. This deed was the result of deliberation, not honorable, not high-minded; but men are men, and all their best deeds are not such as would be worthy of the just gods.

If I say this act of clemency and generous justice was a proof that a curse was being removed, I must also say it was a testimony of other influence of which Mr. Hapworth was as little aware. Gentle, liberating influence, that was giving him other honor, other excellence, other beauty, dignity, and joy, than his own to think of.

He was put to another trying test before the spring. Party expedients—acts for which no single man would choose to be responsible—had been discussed in more than one assembly for deliberation of ways and means. Hapworth's influence and money were both wanting, he knew how much. He was to be paid rare wages for himself—of course the reader understands the "consideration of his distinguished service to the cause" was not to be put in the form of wages, but rendered in grateful testimony. Defend us from the recklessness of people who call things by their names!

There was a time when Justice Hapworth would not have hesitated as to the course he should pursue. Such an emergency as the present would have found him prepared, and he would have gone on conquering and to conquer, as heretofore. But in these days he seemed to be not his own man. He was interfering with himself. The rigid will was disturbed. Something fairer even than expediency—something truer and more honorable—was busy with persuasion, argument, reproach. There seemed to be two sides to all these arguments, and an absolute nay ready for all the affirmations.

And was it not an evil hour? Rabid politicians called it so. Was it not defeat, disgrace, when Justice Hapworth washed his hands of an offense against right, in defiance of party regulations? Let them call him sordid, traitor, imbecile!

As if directed by an unseen will—it is a spiritual fact—he threw away his prudence in business, renounced political advantage, and retired from his office when his party, according to threat, dropped him and substituted in his place another. And he looked and lived thereafter like a living man, though his detractors generally said that he was “dead.”

Verily it seemed as if Stone’s forgiveness had a work to do; as if a little heaven were leavening the lump; as if communication were established somehow between two opposing forces.

Where was Lydia?

Gathering flowers in the spring from the grove in the midst of which stood the asylum. She carried the first she found to lay on the grave of Sardi. Often she was walking to the cemetery with such offerings; and if any person thinking much or rarely of her cared to find her, he might have felt assured that in one place he should see her, any bright day—by the grave next the mound that covered Juliet.

Justice Hapworth went one afternoon to the cemetery, contemplating by the way a secret purpose which he intended to communicate to no one.

The willow-trees were bare of leaves as yet, but the twigs were turning to a deeper yellow; the last year’s grass lay brown or green upon the graves, but the roots were springing freshly underneath, and sending up the shoots as yet invisible; the sky was blue as the splendid prophetic knowledge of the sun could make it; the air like balm; the monuments glittering with whiteness; the dead at rest; the birds at work. By the grave of Sardi Stone sat Lydia Hertz; her hand was full of wild-flowers, and resting on the sod.

Justice Hapworth was standing straight before her before either was aware. They had not met since Christmas morning on the Hapworth lawn, and both remembered that occasion and the interview. Did the recollection so prevail as to take from this meeting all pleasure—even all satisfaction? He smiled when he recognized her; she did not frown, nor look with wonder, nor think, since he had come, this was no place for her.

Was there no pleasure in this meeting? Yea, to the loves that ordained it; to the care that never wearies; to the patience that never despairs.

He came there with his secret purpose, which he intended should remain a secret always, but the first words he spoke to this young girl revealed it. Of millions of women fate could not have substituted another in her place of whom this same thing might be said. But for Lydia, his secret had been his own forever.

“I came”—said he, lifting his hat, bowing low to the sad-faced girl—“I came to see about a monument for Mr. Stone. Have you ever thought of a style that would be most appropriate for him?”

Though she merely answered in the negative, she looked up with an interest and pleased surprise that constrained Hapworth to say further:

“Let us talk about it, then. Maybe you can help me. It must not be ostentatious or much ornamented. That would not be appropriate.”

“It would not, certainly,” she answered; and, rising from the mound, she came out from the inclosure of the family burial-place and stood before the monument of Juliet.

“You must say nothing of my intention,” said he; “it is my secret—and yours, too, it seems. You will help me keep it as well as fulfill it, therefore.”

She bowed—did not speak—was evidently taken up with some thought which she desired to express, and yet doubted either her ability to make it clear or his to hear it with satisfaction.

“You will help me, I hope,” persisted the Justice, perceiving her perplexity, and strangely desirous of the aid he was soliciting.

“He told me once—” she answered; “I wonder if I shall tell you!”

“Certainly,” he said, with an assurance that seemed able to settle the doubt in her mind. He spoke out as the ruler of a world. But, do you deem, without emotion? Did the Lord of Life weep by a grave indeed?

“But you laughed when I brought a message from him; so that I have never been satisfied whether it was for you,” she answered.

“Be satisfied,” said Hapworth, with a solemn conviction—a sudden, a wonderful illumination, which he was honest enough to declare outright. “It was for me. It could have been for no other man—for I have surely been forgiven! You are right to remind me. But be kind; and tell me what it was he said!”

While he spoke her face brightened; when he ceased she said:

“You make me happy. I will tell you what he said. Before he lost his property he meant to give the town a library. He said he meant that it should be his monument. After he lost his daughter he intended to turn his handsome house into a library building, and fill it with books—Juliet was very fond of books. But pretty soon every thing was gone, and he could do nothing.”

Justice Hapworth’s eyes were on the child—for so she seemed to him. His serious, mild gaze did not trouble her, and it was not once removed while she spoke; but he looked away when he asked, in a low voice,

"Do you suppose that this design would have pleased him greatly if he could have fulfilled it? And if I should carry out the project, do you think that would be better than to erect a monument down here?"

"Oh yes!" she exclaimed, with an eagerness that expressed well her pleasure. "When I am better—and the doctor says I shall be—" Here she paused.

"What will you do?" asked a tender voice that seemed to care.

"We have a library in our old house—it belonged to my grandfather—and my father and brother were great students. There are hundreds of volumes and nobody to use them. You may have them to put with yours for his monument."

"Ah," said Hapworth, "we must think of that! Some day, perhaps, we shall select the books together. You would really advise me to let the monument alone, and turn the old house into a library?"

"Is it yours?"

"No, but the owner wants to sell it."

"Can you buy it?"

"If you think it would be best. I want to please you, for then I know I should please him. All that you did satisfied him."

"Yes," said she; "he often said so."

"Then you will help me when it comes to arranging the books?"

"For his monument? Yes—if I could—if I am here—but I would stay for that. Will it be long?"

"If you would walk with me a few steps from this place," said Hapworth, "I could show you the house."

"I have often seen it," she replied. "We used to walk there; and he has told me many times about his daughter—how she died—and the very room—I know it."

"We should call the library after his name," said Hapworth—and he was leading the way out of the cemetery, Lydia following him.

Simple talk for record; but while it beguiled him Hapworth seemed to be treading on everlasting foundations; and oh! I shall not strive to prove what divine beauty was in the truth that bloomed aloft.

They walked from the cemetery a few paces till they came near the hill on whose summit stood the mansion, built like some old-time castle. Hapworth did not ask her to ascend the hill with him—indeed seemed hardly to know why he had guided to that place. A solemn fear possessed him. What was in store for him he could not rightly see; but he knew that his destiny was here. As for Lydia, in her sadness was the tremulous prescience of some triumphant joy; and it was manifest, as is the shining of the moon through breaking clouds, fair clouds, that are dispelling to leave clear a fairer sky!

Unfinished as this page might seem, I am tempted to leave it here—to leave this man and woman to the influence of each other's sacred presence. As no imagination of old time ever, on any page, for any eye, rivaled the marvels of science in our day—as truth is always better and more marvelous than fiction, more wonderful in operation, more beautiful in result, I dare not stain this canvas with any gaudy coloring that it may arrest for one moment longer any ill-discerning eye. Let not my work here be thought of, but the transcendent work, the perfect work of Nature.

Here was a man conditioned almost as a god, delivered from the curse of his own bands, looking down on a young girl whom Providence had left alive on earth when grief had tormented beyond reason. She was looking back to him with brightening eyes, brightening intelligence.

They were thinking, as well as speaking, of the old man whom Hapworth's forefathers had wronged. They were consulting together with intent to carry out the proudest wish that old man ever cherished. They were trusting each other as out of ten thousand you shall find one man and one woman. By the immortal, invincible strength of love he should bring her free at last of every cloud of darkness; by the eternal verity of love, she should be strong to leave her life with him.

It was the work of a day, of an hour, questions some reader, with a smiling doubt. Oh profanest skeptic! that might well be; but it was not in this instance. For the first time in his life Hapworth had seen Truth when she rebuked him. For the first time she in him had recognized Destiny—she whom fortune and friends and the world had fooled, and whom God had graciously taken into His own charge when these had proved unworthy, soothing her reason to sleep until a day of strength and the light of joy should come.

Truth and Strength! When Love unites these who shall put asunder? How often is the improbable and the "impossible" of man to be proved the YEA AND AMEN of a diviner spirit?

It might be one day or many that Justice Hapworth waited for his bride. Deem the highest aspiration of old Sardi Stone fulfilled. Survey his noble monument. Look not for Hapworth on the map—the city's name is Stoneburgh. Consider that no poison could destroy this Juliet.

OUR OLD PEW.

WE are quite well aware that there is nothing especially attractive to this fast and not very reverential generation in the title of this article; and while the merits of "The Old Arm-chair" and "The Old Oaken Bucket," "The Old Mill," "The Old School-house," and almost every ancient thing on earth, have been said or sung to not indifferent ears, so far as our observation goes, we are the first to say a word for the Old Pew. If our saying may turn out to be as much a sermon as a song, we hope to win a friendly ear from the large and growing class of our readers who cherish time-hallowed remembrances sacredly, and believe that home-life gains in geniality as well as in elevation by coming under wholesome church influences.

I have had it (here a while we use the first person) in mind for some time to write an essay upon the Church view of the Family, and my thoughts take the present shape from a visit to my native home and the old church of our childhood. I always go home in mid-summer, and it is pleasant to make a double use of the college holidays by taking the old homestead on the way to the Cambridge Commencement. I have just returned from that annual visit, and I found the workmen busy with dismantling the interior of our church, or "meeting-house," as the people there usually style their place of worship. I was glad to be in time to see the building before the work of destruction had gone far, and sit a moment in the old pew before its homely pine and mahogany were torn away to make room for more modern accommodations. The moment spoke for a whole lifetime, and recalled vividly the forty years that have passed since I first took my seat there, and looked up with childish reverence to the lofty ceiling and the solemn preacher. The ceiling does not, indeed, seem to me very lofty now, yet it lifts my thoughts higher than any vaulted cathedral; and the preacher, although he now wears the square cap of an academic president and rules over the oldest university in the land, is not as awful as he was then; and it was very pleasant as I sat, last week, at his table, and enjoyed his sparkling wit and sententious wisdom, to be assured that the familiarity which abates awe need not bring contempt, and that true reverence may grow with friendly fellowship. I can honestly say that the best influence over my boyish days came from that pulpit; and although the preacher was a deep thinker, and I could not understand all of his sermons, there was something in every sermon that came home to me, and even when I could not understand the thought I understood the manner, being perfectly convinced by the tone and gesture that he meant to do us good, and the spirit and the trust were with him. Like other men, I, of course, have had my temptations, and I can truly say that, whenever enticed to venture upon any wrong course, no power has been stronger with me for the right than the remembrance of those wholesome counsels of our old minister, and that searching question, "How shall I look him in the face if I waste my time and opportunities and make a fool or reprobate of myself?" He is now no longer in that pulpit, except on some occasional visit, and the forty years that have gone over his head since I first saw him there have changed him from a somewhat fiery young polemic to a calm and almost judicial sage, yet no man has better kept the promise of his prime, and his ripe autumn fruit is the fitting harvest of his green and vigorous spring-time. One thing it is very cheerful to note in him as the sear and yellow leaf comes on: he is merrier as well as wiser, and perhaps his genial temper is as good a moral now as was his close and vehement preaching forty years ago.

The aspect of the empty pews, as they waited the blow of the hammer (not the auctioneer's), was not as cheering as that of the pulpit; for forty years make sad havoc in a congregation, and as memory called the roll of the old familiar faces no answer came, in many cases, except from the tombstones that record their names. Death had made especial ravages among the solid men who sat in the middle alley, or what in New England is called the "Broad Aisle." I used to look at them with wonder not unmixed with reverence, for they were mostly the rich men of the town, whose stately houses stood in decided contrast with our simpler homes. They have passed away, and for the most part their wealth has gone with them, and strangers live in their houses and occupy their pews. An instructive essay might be written upon the lives and fortunes of some twenty of those solid men, and the lesson might throw some light upon the nature and permanence of our American prosperity. Other faces, however, than theirs dwell most pleasantly in my remembrance, and our old church had its notable persons who have made their mark upon the thought and business of our day. The navy officers worshiped usually with us, and many a weather-beaten head bowed down there in reverence that had braved the battle and the breeze in perils that have become part of our national history. There, too, for years, sat the noted orator and statesman of our vicinity, now more than ever a national name, probably the most regular worshiper in the whole congregation, present morning and afternoon, and at the usual services and at communion, the most successful man of his time, yet always bearing the mark of care upon his brow, and apparently needing no grave warnings of the altar to convince him that no crown is without its cross, and he who wins fame and fortune can not have them without paying a high price. Other men sat there, too, who have won a good name of the public in literature, science, and the learned professions. I will confess, however, that there are some associations with the worshipers that impressed me quite as much as the view of captains and senators and their peers. The school-boy and collegian, as he sat in the family pew, joined none the less fervently in the worship from being aware that gentler eyes than his were turned toward the pulpit, although sometimes, perhaps, an occasional glance toward this or that fair school-mate might have mingled with the love that is divine some little alloy of earthly feeling. He remembers to this day two faces that strongly impressed his boyhood, and gave a tinge of romance to the old sanctuary. Not far in front of his pew sat a child, a little girl with a rivulet of brown ringlets falling down her shoulders, and as she grew in stature, she became, even before he made her acquaintance, a kind of fairy of the boy's day-dreams. Another lassie, of smaller stature and more merry laugh, and with a hand small and dimpled enough to win a sculptor's eye, sometimes entered into his Sunday thoughts and made it pleasanter to go to church. Those two children, the picturesque Laura and the statuesque Hebe, are matrons now, each with her due share of offspring. Was it a merciful Providence that their various attractions so kept the student oscillating between them as to save him from so falling in love as to spoil his studies, or from venturing upon some juvenile declaration that might have brought a disheartening refusal from grave parents, and made him a laughing-stock among the young people? These, perhaps, may seem to be frivolous associations with a sacred place; yet there is a spirit of chivalry natural to boyhood which readily connects womanly grace with religion, and does not prevent a romantic nature from saying the prayers heartily with a little lovely companionship in the sanctuary. Our Puritan churches are so barren in ornament, without a picture or inscription to vary their blank walls, that the human heart is compelled to be its own artist, and set up a Madonna or two of its own from pictured fancies if not upon glass or canvas.

After all these somewhat playful reminiscences, we confess that the old edifice abounds in serious suggestions; and before we surrendered the old pew to destruction, we were compelled to note a few thoughts upon the welfare of the family as connected with the church and its ministry. The first thought that forces itself upon us comes from the importance of duly considering the individual characteristics of the members of the family in religious education, and of not forgetting, in our wholesale methods of training the young, that each girl or boy is an original from the hand of God, and, as such, demands, in some respects, a peculiar nurture. The whole family, indeed, is fenced up within that boarded inclosure, as within the partitions of a sheep-pen, in a way that tends to hide all marked characteristics in a prosaic uniformity. Yet even the Sunday seat with the Sunday face in the gravest sanctuary does not wholly tone down to one dead level every salient point of character. The soberest members of the family, who are intent upon prayer and Bible and sermon with all their hearts and eyes, will, by their way of sitting or holding their head or book, or their cast of countenance, betray their idiosyncrasy; and the imperious shake of the solemn father's head, or the anxious glance of the careful mother's eye, will be, to a shrewd observer, a great revelation of character. Then the children, with their volatile spirits, can not fail to show what is in them, and any man who has a keen eye for human nature need not take his Shakspeare or Lord Bacon to church with him to open to him the secrets of the human breast and prove the force of nature over circumstances. A half dozen girls and boys are a compend of the world's history, and in the hints of pride or vanity, sensitiveness or resolution, quietude or restlessness, listlessness or anxiety, a sagacious looker-on may detect qualities that have made the earth's leading characters and their subjects or disciples.

We must confess that this fact of individuality of nature and experience is not sufficiently considered in our churches, and too often the whole congregation is preached to as if all were exactly alike, and were to be turned to religion upon a kind of turning-lathe very much after the same pattern. Not only in the tone and direction of the services, but in the very order of the services, there is too little regard to individual dispositions and faculties. As a general rule, we are convinced that young people are surfeited with mere preaching, and that the ear and understanding are tasked to an extent wholly out of proportion with the eye, the fancy, and the affections. Our churches run too much to sermons, and to prayers that are often but sermons aimed toward heaven. There is too little to see and feel—too little cheering music, social fellowship, and ritual symbol. We remember what a godsend it was to us in our boyhood when a baby was baptized, and the minister, after the singing of a hymn, came down from the pulpit, and, in the gaze of the great company who stood on tip-toe to be spectators as well as listeners, named the child, after the Divine commission, in a way that made us feel, better than we could then explain, that a little baby is a sacred and mysterious gift, and under that frail mantle of clay rests that royal humanity which the Father made, and the Son redeemed, and the Spirit sanctified. There was very little else in our church to vary the usual tenor of worship. Never a marriage, with its festive sanctity, nor a funeral, with its solemn shadow—never a Christmas wreath nor an Easter flower, to bring into the sanctuary some sacred sense of the rich fullness of human life and the wide range of God's providence. What poetry we had in connection with religion came to us in spite of the church, and even our noble minister, with all his gifts of wisdom, his iron logic and pointed moral and often eloquent appeal, seldom dealt in pathos or ideality, seldom presented church principles and seasons in a way to attract young hearts. We needed some direct appeal from him to bring us to ourselves and to God. The old catechising in a manner filled the want, and a few words from his revered lips to each of us as we met in the church on Wednesday afternoons were treasured up for years, and are riches to us now. Yet there was generally little contact between the pastor and the children of the flock—little of that personal counsel which, in our Protestant faith, may have all the unction and point of the old confessional without its tyranny. Many a youth suffers sadly from not having his own religious difficulties fitly met, and his own religious sensibilities and powers brought out. He finds himself sternly questioned by his own reason, and strongly tempted by his own heart and the world. He finds himself unable to think and feel as others seem to do, and often is in danger of giving over his soul to despair as an utter reprobate, simply because he is made in a peculiar mould, and must take to religion, if at all, as to every thing else, in his own way, and not in another person's way. He is, perhaps, of a sober, ethical disposition like St. James, and wonders that he has not Peter's fiery zeal or Paul's impassioned faith. A true and timely word might set him right, and instead of vainly trying to make of him somebody else, it might help him be himself among the other children of God. There is no end to the illustrations of the principle in question, and a new day will come to our churches when it is duly remembered that in the same pew vast diversity of gifts exists, and we show reverence for the Creator by giving fair play and full nurture to every soul that He has called into being. Perhaps every thoughtful reader can remember cases of promising youths who have been allowed to drift loose from all serious convictions, if not from good morals, in the absence of such personal care for their welfare. Surely it is a somewhat startling thought, as we look upon the tenants of a church-pew, to reflect how many various dispositions are there represented, and what care is needed to give each nature its true development.

Study any family group, moreover, not only as made up of separate persons, but as forming one household. Generally, a looker-on may discern a family likeness in the whole company of children; and even the father and mother, without any unity of blood, assimilate somewhat in appearance by constant association. The intention of Providence evidently is that the family shall be one, not only by living under the same roof, but by breathing the same spirit and furthering the same plans of life. It is equally evident that mere blood is not enough to make them one, and many of the most terrible quarrels that stain history and convulse society have been between blood relations. Mere unity of blood may sometimes create discord; for where, for example, a certain high temper runs in the veins, the inmates of a household may be tempted to quarrel even because they are so much alike. But without such high tempers, and in a family with good average dispositions, there is sure to be sufficient variety of traits to excite uncomfortable feelings, if all are not induced to agree upon some principle of harmony above personal notions and caprices. Hence the blessing of a strong and wholesome religious influence over the household, and the need of enlarging and elevating home life by church devotion and fellowship. It is by no means easy for relatives, even for brothers and sisters, to agree when they wish to do so by mere good-nature, much less by a decent etiquette that disguises chagrin, or by a compromise of manner that tolerates failings for the sake of having its own failings tolerated in turn. It is a great art to solder different metals together; and without the proper amalgam, the more they are brought together the more they clatter and chafe. The higher the materials to be united, the higher must be the element of union; and human souls can come together only in the atmosphere of love, that is the soul's true life and Heaven's best gift. Hence the blessing of a sound, hearty religion in drawing the family together; and the pew, whose door opens to welcome them from the household, should dismiss them to their homes all the warmer in domestic affection from being more fervent as children of God. It would be well, it seems to us, if preaching had an eye more to this end, and our clergy would remember that every Sunday, in the hundred or two families present in the pews, there must be not a few cases where the first principles of brotherly and filial and parental love need to be inculcated. Sometimes the tenderest appeals to home feeling touch the very natures that seem least open to gentle emotions; and we believe that generally, whenever the preacher says a cordial and unaffected word, especially for good mothers, the sternest-looking men in the audience, with not a few of the more refractory boys, will be found inclining to the melting mood.

It may startle sentimental ears to be told that respectable families are not always by mere force of nature harmonious, and need the benefit of church and clergy to bring them into tune. But we are ready to go even further, and to maintain that the very families that have within themselves the largest elements of happiness are very apt to disagree unless they are harmonized by a spirit above their own self-wills. True harmony is the agreement of differences, and where the differences seem at first to be the greatest, as in a concert of various voices and instruments, the harmony may be the most complete. What a fearful din arises when first the drum and trumpet, the flute and fife, the harp and horn lift up their miscellaneous voices; and the novice might well think that Bedlam had broke loose or Babel had come again. But listen again, and the performers no longer following a chance caprice follow the notes of the great master, and the full burst of harmony speaks the triumphant reconciliation of that host of differences, the very best passages in the whole piece harmonizing the most opposite instruments, and perhaps making the silver flute keep friendly company with the brazen drum, or the quivering harp give grateful relief to the sonorous trumpet. Human characters are more various than metal or strings or reed, and require a finer touch and higher mastery to bring them into tune. We are not, of course, speaking now of positive quarrels in a family; for hard words imply low breeding, and rude blows degrade households below the level of those for whom we write. Yet there may be a whole world of discomfort without sinking into such degradation, and family jars may rob life of its best charm, even when they do not break the visible order of the family, or go beyond hard thoughts and moody tempers. The trouble may come from the over-sensitive, who feel acutely every cold look or harsh word, or from the strong will that resents every restraint as an imposition; and often these two traits of character are found to organize a standing disagreement in a family, when delicate nerves on one side, and hot blood on the other, live in a state of chronic warfare, like the tearful rain and flashing lightning of a thunder-shower. We do not believe, indeed, that temperaments can be changed; but we do know that they can be regulated, and at the very point where disagreement most readily commences there the true harmony should begin; for just at that point the necessity of self-control and self-sacrifice most clearly appears, and when these set up their cross of self-consecration the crown of peace will not long be withheld. We suppose that the happiest couple need in some way to find out this secret for themselves and their children, and that no families have so deep and enduring enjoyment as those who learn in due season that human tempers and impulses are very mutable and erring, and must be brought under the influence of a superior authority and spirit. We believe that the simplest lessons of the Gospel, if heeded in due time, might prevent many a family quarrel; and that, instead of an angry divorce, a deeper harmony would unite many a sensitive wife and irritable husband, if the sense of infirmity or wrong had only brought humility before God's mercy-seat instead of multiplying scandal in the world's mischievous ear.

Generally the feminine part of the household is more under the influence of the pew than the masculine part, and is especially better for the influence, when true wisdom guides the pulpit and good sense goes with the sentiment of the ministrations. Sometimes this very subject divides the household, and the husband and wife differ decidedly as to the merits of the preacher or the worth of the sanctuary. Most frequently the skeptical element in the family is on the masculine side; and where actual skepticism does not exist, a certain reserve, or indifference, almost as much nullifies the influence of the Church. How to interest the men and boys is a great question of our time, and one which is answered in various ways, and most conspicuously by two classes of preachers—the sensation orators, who thin the seats of the theatre and caucus by their more inebriating appeals, and the rough-and-ready school of divines, who seem to carry the boxing-gloves and foils into the pulpit, and preach bodily exercise as well as godliness, and recommend a very literal style of knock-down arguments. These may do well in their place; and it takes all sorts of people to make up a church as a world. But, for ourselves, we have far more hope of interesting indifferent men, and even reclaiming refractory boys, by a consistent, calm, and resolute ministry, that urges a Divine authority with devout grace, and aims to nurture the people within God's kingdom in the atmosphere of love, and upon the living bread and waters of the Father's household, than by any sensation rhetoric or rough-and-ready pugnacity. The great question to be settled is, whether life is to be under a divine law or not; and if under a divine law, whether under the divine love also. Now, surely the ministry that mingles true dignity with sympathy and unction is most likely to secure this end, and urge an authority that is gracious and a grace that is authoritative. If a good share of solid sense and clear logic is united with such a ministry, all the better for its power over the masculine part of the family in bringing them to true reverence for sacred things, and into wholesome harmony with the generally devout temper of the women of the household.

There is a great deal of undeveloped talent in the family; and it is a startling question to ask on Sunday, as we look about upon the congregation, what would be the career of these girls and boys if their destinies were to chime exactly with their powers, and they were to become the most and the best that they can become? But talent is not by any means confined to the taste, intellect, or imagination, but embraces every capacity and faculty of usefulness and enjoyment, or of receiving and imparting good. How much more startling becomes the question when extended to all those varieties of sensibility and affection and conscience and thought and purpose in which life has its highest worth and peace! Every Sunday how various and many are the keys touched by the preacher's word, and what power has a true master in bringing out the true tones from that many-voiced humanity! Hence the need—which we urge as our final leading thought—the need of cherishing a true catholicity in church, and of thus making the family feel not only that they are individuals and also one household, but that they belong to a universal empire, a spiritual kingdom, and are to cherish its divine citizenship in the due use of their powers and capacities. They will be all the more a family by recognizing their true union with the universal family; just as each city is more a city by knowing its due relation to the State and nation. Without going into any ambitious discussions of the true breadth of human culture, and the value of a cosmopolitan spirit in society and the world, we are content now with maintaining that each household needs a personal sense of the place of each member under the Divine government to give to each character its just charm and power. The round of a single Sunday's service, more than any week-day's schooling or any ball-room's elegances, should teach a true humanity and test a true grace and dignity. In fact, what great aspect of History, Providence, or Human Life is there which is not, in some way, presented or suggested by the Scriptures, hymns, prayers, and meditations of a well-conducted season of worship? The good old Bible itself is the great text-book of humanity as well as of God, and gathers within its lids the thoughts and experiences not only of famous saints and sages but of nations and ages. It unites with the acts of worship and instruction to win the assembly to a sense of citizenship beyond that of any one caste or family, and to ennoble daily life by the dignity of a divine birthright. The household needs this influence; for when left to itself it tends to a narrow clannishness, or belittling familism, that impoverishes the home, by making it the all-in-all, as much as he impoverishes his estate who persists in shutting himself up within its bounds by walls that shut out the steps of men, and the range of mountain and river, and the light of heaven itself. The true influence, when fitly used, not only enlarges the views of the family, by due knowledge of the broad sweep of the Divine plans and the rich diversity of Providential characters, but it brings each mind to its true bearings by presenting the essential ideas and motives which every human soul must accept if it would be loyal to its birth-right. Thus comes that sacred filial sense and purpose which give the true aim and power, and guide and strengthen all human relations by the master-spirit of a truly filial heart. The human father is a better father from looking to the Divine Parent; and the son is a better son by leaning upon that infinite love; and the friend and the brother can give a richer sympathy by exalting personal affection into a spiritual fellowship, and ennobling private feelings by universal charity. So great is the grace and power of such a high standard over the family that camps and courts imitate its loftiness, and in a certain way—imperfect, indeed—the tone of military honor and social gentility is always bearing witness of the claims of the higher worth over the lower interest, and measuring life more by the quality of its spirit than by the quantity of its goods. The highest quality attaches to the family that is most loyal to the highest good, or has the clearest sense and the bravest service of the divine kingdom. Every true home must have something of this quality; and the lowliest cottage need ask no honors from courts or camps, fame or fashion, when its sons and daughters know and serve the Supreme Power and the Eternal Love. That family may fill a humble seat in the visible church, but it is higher than any dome or spire that pierces the sky; for God's true children are as high as his own mercy-seat, and their Sunday faces, in their reverence and joy, show forth something of the glory and blessedness there enthroned.

It may seem to some that we are dealing in overstrained phrases, and that we have mounted from the old pew to the pulpit, and caught a little of the cant and exaggeration sometimes found there. But we are, we trust, quite in a common-sense vein, and can say in all soberness that every man who can remember a single true Sunday's devotion in church will verify what has been said, and allow that, in our best hours there, we have a certain sense of belonging to the great spiritual family, and being cheered by the Universal Light and animated by the Universal Will. It is most touching and impressive to look upon the assembly where all feel this experience, and men and women of all callings, conditions, and culture are drawn together not only by the common reverence for the sanctuary shown in their common carefulness of garb and manner, but by the great and blessed conviction that they meet together in one Father, and hear His voice and feel His breath in the One Word and Spirit.

We have written in a somewhat old-fashioned strain, although by no means belonging to the class of croakers and fogies. We believe in the old Gospel as the best news, and hold to every good institution that dispenses its living waters. By this time we suppose that our old pew has been made into fire-wood, and thus returned some of the light and warmth which it has been receiving for forty years from the altar. We doubt not that the new and more graceful structure that is taking its place will, in due time, have a story of its own to tell, and we trust that it may have a better story-teller than we. What forty years to come will bring to pass in that or in any sanctuary no sober man will venture to predict; and nothing would better illustrate the mutability of human life and fortune than an exact picture of the old church, with its people, when first opened for worship, in 1818, and now, in the year 1859, when it is to be transformed. In many of those pews then sat young couples just beginning the world together, more than one fair wife bringing a bride's garment and hopes to the sanctuary. Those intervening years have brought new cares as well as new blessings to those seats, and the space between the young husband and wife has been occupied by new faces, with eyes brightening and opening with growing intelligence; and sometimes saddened by vacant spaces that speak of eyes that have been closed in death. How instructive and impressive would be a series of photographs of the family groups in any of those pews at intervals of every five or ten years, and showing the occupants in their various stages of life and culture! A keen eye must see in the boy of forty years ago the features and character of the man now of fifty; yet the keenest eye must allow its inability to play the prophet of the next forty years, and turn with grateful heart from the old pew to the old pulpit and the old Bible, happy to be assured that we are in better hands than our own, and we are governed by One whose ways are not as our ways, and whose thoughts not as our thoughts.

Farewell, old church! We can not forget your seats and walls without forgetting the best gifts that we have ever had from God and man.

WISDOM AND GOODNESS.

I WOULD be good, I would be wise,
For all men should. The wise man saith,
"Folly is sin, and sin is death."

But Fate denies

What I demand for boons like these,
If not a life, yet days of ease.

Not in this world of noise and care
Is Wisdom won, however wooed:
She must be sought in solitude,
With thought and prayer!
She will not hear my hasty cries;
I have no leisure to be wise!

Who can be wise that can not fly
These empty babblers, loud and vain;
To whom there is no God but Gain?
Alas! not I.

But this dark thought will still intrude,
There needs no leisure to be good!

REGULAR HABITS.

BY FITZ HUGH LUDLOW.

I.

A MAN who has married a lovely blonde, and sees himself reflected in two blue eyes, has thereby made himself sure of heaven, having pre-empted two quarter-sections of it and settled on the same. I have no doubt that a great many sweet things may be thought and said of wives who look out of black, brown, hazel, or even green soul-windows. But blue is my specialty. I speak particularly of blue, because my own little woman keeps my heart up by looking tenderly at me with that color, driving away the blues with blue, homeopathically—similia similibus, you know.

I think that you would like to hear how I got her. It is a pretty story, and has lost none of its romance because it was published in the shape of bans a dozen years ago or more. How Lulu and I pity people whose marriage-day—that vail of heads and unvail of hearts—shows nothing under the thin crust of lover-reserve removed but facts, business, convenience! How we rejoice in being and in seeing married lovers! God bless them—be they rich or poor! If they are the latter, it is because for a little while they are in uncomfortable rooms in this world's big boarding-house, until the home they are having fitted up in the far amaranth gardens where the River of Life runs at the porch is all ready for them. But allons! For the story!

The family of old Dr. Benjamin Brightsey awoke every morning of summer at half past four—every morning of winter at half past five, precisely, at the sound of a gong. Awoke, but—with the exception of Dr. Benjamin himself—turned over, made an unpleasant remark regarding the machine, and were asleep again simultaneously with its last vibration. As for Dr. Benjamin—that was a different affair. At the foot of his bed stood a chair, whereon his day vestments had taken their stated six hours of repose once in the twenty-four during the last third of a century. I might have said thirty-three and a third years, but the dignity of the pendulum and Dr. Benjamin seems to indicate the stately word "century" as more befitting an account of either of them. On the seat of the chair mentioned lay Dr. Benjamin's black pantaloons, folded without a single superfluous crease. Above those his vest, from whose pocket the massive gold repeater had been taken, wound up, and placed in a selected hollow beneath his pillow. His glossy strait-bodied coat hung speckless on the topmost projections of the chair-back, covered with a napkin. Over this lay smoothly his immaculate frilled shirt. His merino wrapper, with its nether continuations, occupied severally an arm. On the lowest bar between the legs his blue knit stockings were suspended; and outside of the door his mirror-bright half-boots awaited him, their toes at a calculated right-angle to the threshold. A black stock—fashioned with internal springs whose stiffness made it resemble some curious throat-trap stopping just short of the point where compression of the larynx proves fatal—curled all up into itself, set to catch him the moment that the highest button of his shirt-bosom became fastened.

All these preparations gave promise of promptness in rising and dressing, which Dr. Benjamin took care amply to fulfill. By the time that the other members of his family had taken up the raveling end of those dreams which the blare of the gong had snapped asunder he was equipped to meet the exigencies of the day.

It befell upon a certain morning—sufficiently long ago to have permitted room for the occurrence of a great many dressings since—that Dr. Benjamin set forth upon the early walk which formed the next thing on his invariable programme after getting ready to walk. It was in the month of November—it was a quarter to six o'clock, for winter hours were inaugurated by the gong, as an unwilling concession to the frailties of the laggard sun, with the last month of fall. As the Doctor shoved back the two bolts and turned the great key of the front door he felt a very singular and reprehensible tendency toward the irregular action of shivering, but checked himself in time, and converted the movement into one of enthusiasm, brandishing his arms declamatorily and saying, as to an audience, "Hah! what a glorious hour is the morning!" An observer, however inclined to grant his abstract proposition, might have withheld assent in the special case without laying himself open to the charge of contumacy. As the Doctor opened his door and passed out, Hazelthorpe, his place, did not become visible. So dense a fog veiled all creation that beyond the twin Norway spruces that sentinelled the path to the gate at a rod's distance from the porch, whatever the Doctor possessed in the way of real estate, for purposes of ocular enjoyment, might just as well have belonged to some other man. He stood on his door-step as on an island—like an early Crusoe whose man Friday was sleeping over. The withered grass just around his feet seemed a pattern of badly chased silver—there had been plenty of moisture during the night, but not enough decidedness in it to make frost, and now it hung weakly dropping from every thing—leaves, window-sills, step-rails—even the Doctor's nose. Nevertheless this latter the Doctor wiped, and ejaculated again, with the same air of irrepressible enthusiasm, "Hah! what a glorious hour is the morning!"

The quail from amidst the stubble of a cornfield two or three fences off piped "Bob White" in a disconsolate manner, as if that member of the White family had a stove, and the bird would have given a great deal to get near it. The sparrows kept up a melancholy show of flying fitfully about to dry their wings in a fog which was too wet and heavy to dry itself and get out of the way of the sunshine; and the Doctor inwardly debated why it was that when early rising and walking abroad were exercises so exceedingly beneficial and delectable, nature could throw so many obstacles in the way of them. This thought, however, was almost unconscious to himself, and for the world he would not have acknowledged it to any body, as he strode fiercely through the mist, his nose graced with constantly-recurring drops, and his frill languid with overmuch imbibition. He turned his thoughts to all pastoral images of the morning—the lowing kine driven afield through dewy uplands heavy with clover-sweet and galingale—and came near stumbling over a miserable cow, who, eccentrically straying from the shed before breakfast, stood with an imbecile look toward the spots where grass had been, and dripped audibly. He fancied the lark taking up the song which the retiring nightingale had dropped, and climbing into heaven on the bars of red and golden light, bearing praise as fit finale to his sister's sad complaint. Neither were there larks nor nightingales in the United States of Yankeedom so far as heard from; but place is an inconsiderable fact in reference to spirits, and we had nightingale souls, likewise lark souls, in America—hopeless people coming first, with their songs of despair, and finally after them the men and women who are the true prophets, who catch the first gleams, and mounting, peal forth, “Hope! hope! unquenchable hope!”—the true and right succession for those who are not bilious, and who know, maugre all creeds, that there is no such thing as despair in the universe. The Doctor thought of this, and began to feel less as if he were in an ice-house with a wet towel on his spine. He warmed up, clapped his hands, and cried, “Hurrah for the lark!” without regard to the drop on his nose. A draggled bantam cock, who, like himself, had risen early from force of habit, mistook this action for a challenge, and on a tall litter-heap looked over the fence of the Doctor's barn-yard to answer it with a crow, but got as far as Cock-a-doo, and dejectedly left the dle-doo-oo-oo to be added on at some period when the fog had got out of his throat.

In vain the Doctor sought to lift his enthusiasm. Some special contretemps was sure to occur, or, that failing, the great general contretemps of six o'clock of a muggy November morning dished him in all attempts to forget Nature's temporary accidents of time and place. He strode faster and faster, down gravel-walks made to saunter in, past flower-beds widowed of all color but dun, all perfume but mildew, and finally came to a rustic arbor in his garden, with a wealth of bottled vexation in his interior which principle forbade him to spend on its obvious cause—the morning walk, but which chance afforded no other scape-goat to wreak it on. Had he seen a cat go up one of his autumn-stripped apple-trees he would have felt like shying a stone at her for the intent to steal pippins.

Dr. Benjamin entered the arbor with a jerk, and threw himself down on his bandana handkerchief, which principle, even in the heat of the most excited moments, always impelled him to interpose between the black pantaloons and any seat whatever. The caution was well taken in the present instance, as the rustic seat was mouldy and dripping like all else. Here his eye fell on the proper objects for ingathered wrath. Leaning against the central trunk of the arbor was a guitar—mildewed and rusty as to its lower, snapped as to its higher strings. A capacious meerschaum, smoked half out, lay on the ground by its side, in a little desert of its own ashes. On the seat beside the Doctor “Rob Roy” was sprawling open at the place where the gauger is drowned by Helen Macgregor; and that unfortunate victim, the Baillie, Helen, and all the clan, were additionally drowned in the last night's mist, which had soaked from cover to cover. Evidently the book had been abandoned at that place for some other occupation, whose nature was indicated still further on by a tumbler containing slices of lemon, which either had been bottled in whisky to make them keep, or had attained contact with that fluid in some way still directer. Further on around the circular seat was a knife—open and rusty. It lay in a little bed of chips; and beside it was a futile attempt at a wooden chain, broken at the second link. And on the ground, at the Doctor's feet, was a lady's reticule.

Over the Doctor's benevolent face there came a look of intense sarcasm. Such an honest, good-hearted, charitably-believing face that was of his, that he seemed like a dear satirical gentle lamb, who was playing goat for fun.

“Hah!” said the Doctor, with the audience voice, gesture, and expression; “hah! a pretty, pretty set of young people I have lived to see, to be sure! A little ‘Rob Roy,’ a little whittling; a little whisky—whisky-skin I think they call it. Skin! hah! A little more ‘Rob Roy,’ a little playing on the tum-te-iddle-ty for the girls; a little fine sewing on the little border of a little cobweb collar; a little smoking of Dutch abominable pipes! A little more sleep, and a little more slumber, and a little more folding of the hands to sleep. Hah! a little!—especially a great deal of that. A little flumadiddle! So they live—the pretty ones—hah!”

“When I was young,” mused the Doctor, in continuation, “we began ‘Sir Charles Grandison,’ and had to finish it—all the volumes—if it took us a year. When we got through with it, it was done. Likewise the best of volumes, from Genesis to Revelation; no stopping to fill Dutch abominable pipes, and drink skins, and play a few meet-me-by-moonlight-alones! No; we read at our mothers' knees in those days.”

So thinking, Dr. Benjamin Brightysse took up the abused guitar, and giving its rusty bass-strings a tug to express his feelings, laid it on the seat beside him. On the top of that he placed carefully the well-soaked novel. He then tied the reticule around the pipe, and placed that with the pen-knife and the broken wooden chain above all. Then shouldering the guitar as if it were a novel species of hod, he took the tumbler in his hand and stalked out of the arbor. The fog had not lifted a particle, and a sou'wester coming up increased the mugginess of all outdoors. But with the air of a man on the eve of making and promulgating some grand resolution, he tramped through the bad weather toward that Castle of Indolence—home—which his bright example shamed. As he reached the door it was half past six, but not a sign of life was audible or visible within. Entering his study—a scrupulously neat apartment on the first floor, at the right-hand side of the door—he set the guitar and tumbler on the table; and, with a determined expression, opening his port-folio and unscrewing his patent inkstand, sat down to write.

Having finished one side of a sheet of foolscap in a bold large hand with contents which we temporarily reserve, he folded and indorsed it; said Hah! again in a manner which put some interior conclusion of his utterly beyond doubt forever, and passed out into the hall. On a nail by the study door hung the gong—its knobby-headed, prize-fighting bruiser of a plectrum, in a state of suspended animation, resting over it till time should be called for the next round. That event the Doctor brought to pass immediately, seizing the stick and inflicting a course of the most cruel punishment upon the Chinese sufferer as well as upon the several American ones who, taken napping, were smitten by it indirectly.

Bung—bung—bung—bung—bung! continuously and relentlessly went the Doctor. Never stopping to breathe, he hammered away until Mrs. Benjamin—whose connubial side he had deserted to woo the morning zephyrs, as he called that out-door composition of one part of debilitated sunlight to ten of fog—till Mrs. Dr. Benjamin Brightseye arose in terror and rushed to the head of the stairs to see who it was that had gone mad. In her night-cap and gown she shivered aloft, half with surprise and half with the chill the Doctor had brought in with him, while that indefatigable man pounded away below, only measuring his intervals on the gong so as to interpolate sundry addresses of the following brief and emphatic character:

"Up at last? Hah!" [Bung!] "Not bed-ridden"—[bung, bung]—"though so unmindful"—[bung]—"of Heaven's"—[bung]—"great-est blessing of"—[bung, bung, bung]—"morning hours. Great mercy"—[bung]—"to ingratitude"—[bung]—"and inappreciation"—[bung]—"my dear! Hah! Shall continue to"—[bung]—"play upon this"—[bung]—"instrument till every body is"—[bung]—"up!" [Bung—bung—bung, bung, bung!]

Mrs. Dr. Brightseye, knowing that woman's influence is most potent when gongs and men have tired themselves out, wisely and silently retreated and commenced dressing. Meanwhile two other rooms, occupied by Mr. Rufus and Miss Lulu Brightseye, turned out their terror-stricken inhabitants, and received them again with a like result.

The Doctor's bungs became gradually more and more languid and farther apart; but as he was not a man to stop till he was through, they were not wholly intermitted until, in various stages of incomplete dressing, the three members of the family—shamed, as aforesaid, by his bright example—presented themselves at the foot of the stairs. "Hah!" said the Doctor, vouchsafing no other salutation for the present; after which he returned the patent for early-rising-made-easy to its nail on the wall, and signifying by a magisterial wave of the hand that he pleased to have the family follow him, he entered his study and sat down.

Mrs. Dr. Benjamin—a dear little soul, with a baby eye all running over with good-humor, and quenchlessly comfortable in spite of the sudden inroad upon her late occupations—took a chair right by the side of the Doctor, laid her soft fat hand on his, and tried to twinkle all the solemnity out of him. The Doctor's mouth worked, and for a moment it was doubtful whether he would preserve his gravity; especially as Mr. Rufus was wondering what the d—l, and Miss Lulu was expressing the same idea in a succession of yawns just opposite him; but he drew himself up, said, "Dignity, mother, dignity!" and then, casting an austere look on his offending vis-à-vis, began to shove the guitar with its load upon it and the tumbler toward them.

"Guitar! hah—in its case overnight, wasn't it? Brought tumbler in, too? Rob Roy wasn't soaking from four P.M. yesterday till six A.M. to-day? Didn't find any young woman's huswife rolling around in the gravel? Young gentleman—son of pious parents—supposed to have immortal soul—nineteen years old next birthday—doesn't spend his precious time whittling wooden nothings—oh, no! Fits himself for future usefulness—honor to society—make something in the world—hah!"

"But, father—"

"No 'but fathers' about it. Don't hear any thing else but 'but fathers' from the time you get up—noon—till you go to bed—next day. This has got to have a stop put to it. I have called you down to read a little document to you that I prepared this morning after my walk when you were like the door on its hinges, so you on your bed turned yourself over and turned your heavy head—may not be accurate about the words, quoting from memory, but that's the idea. Now listen, every body. Hah!" The Doctor drew the paper from his pocket, wiped his glasses, and began reading.

"Advertisement for the New York Evening Mirror—ten insertions. A gentleman desires a tutor for his two children—one, a lad of eighteen—the other, a young woman of sixteen. Must be a graduate of one of our Northern colleges—of age—bringing the best testimonials as to morals, knowledge of the ancient and modern classics—and good constitution. It is also essential that he be cleanly in his person—refined in his manners—religious in his tendency—an early riser—and above all, a man of REGULAR HABITS"—"Regular Habits, d'ye see," repeated the Doctor, with extreme emphasis—"Regular Habits! Hah!" And the Doctor smiled a triumphant smile at his family, and rubbed his hands as if the individual described had already arrived, and that family were catching it. He resumed:

"It is peremptory that none others need apply. For others there is not the slightest prospect of an engagement. But any young man who is confident of being able to give satisfaction in the above respects may learn of a situation much to his advantage, where a generous salary will be given, and he will be regarded as one of the family."

Lulu Brightseye looked at her recreant brother—twinkled out of the corner of her two blue eyes at him and at her mother, who twinkled back, and they all broke out into the merriest of laughs.

"What's the matter with that—hah?" said the Doctor, putting himself into a position of defense before his last clause. "Where may the laugh be?"

"I was only thinking," spoke Master Rufus, composedly, "what high esteem he'd be held in, if he was regarded as one of the family."

"Let me see—let me see—said the Doctor, hurriedly running over the sentence—"Generous salary given, regarded as one of family." No! I'll be hanged if he shall—the family 'll have to be an almighty sight better before that would be an honor to any young man of regular habits! Scratch that out—there—this is the way it shall read—"and shall be treated with profoundest consideration by all the family"—that's it! No laughing at him, I can tell you! Hah! I'll go on. 'May apply for three weeks from date, by letter, to Regular Habits, Hazelthorpe, Columbia County, N. Y.' There, Sir! you, Rufus, mail this by the next post—here's the money—inclose it. I'll make one more effort for my family before I die—they shall be something yet, if I ain't sadly mistaken—Hah!"

"And now," concluded the Doctor, "let us go to the only breakfast that we have had at a decent hour in the morning—since the last time our pretty ones had to make an early start to a fashionable watering-place—Hah!"

II.

I sat at the New York Hotel in the gentlemen's parlor, reading the last number of Braithwaite's Retrospect, and wondering whether I would be a physician. Exchanging that for a stray copy of Pollock's Perennial Popular Preacher, I read the exordium of a fine sermon, and wondered whether I wouldn't be a clergyman. Then I read an article in the Law Magazine, with the dulcet title of, "The Inchoate Equities of Minor Cestui-que-trust, when the Malversation of the Ancestor has worked Estoppel of the plea of Nul-tiel record in Law"—read it as far as the sentence beginning, "For as the astute Grotius hath it, the Animus Revertendi of those animals fœra naturæ but dompti loco mutando et cura hominum is to be considered evidence of prior seizin as to the usufructuary who holds a title equivalent to that of entail after possibility of issue extinct," and wondered how the d—l any body could ever be an attorney. I took up the newspapers, one after another, thought how it would seem to be an editor of either of them, and then, not seeing any way open to that elevation, had resort to the advertisements. The hopeful advertisements—the plausible, the sanguine advertisements—always unbarring such rare Golcondas of chances to any one who wanted to buy an unexampled churn, or an inexpressible brick-making machine—always so full of situations sought but so mighty barren of help wanted. The advertisements, which would seem to indicate, that in the United States of America, the power lying idle is to the power demanded for any given work as ten to one. Unless perchance we might retreat to the perilous and impudent assumption that some of the people who have "got places" already, and are keeping out the poor devils who would like to get in (some mind ye, for success is not an utterly worthless proof of worth by a great deal), ought, in decency, to shove along down and take the axe of the pioneer, or the hod of the building material elevator, and let the seekers do the preaching, the teaching, and the doctoring for a little while—just long enough to see what a fist they would make of it, and whether they ought or ought not to clear timber and lift bricks likewise! The said retreat to this perilous assumption was barred in my case by my eye falling upon that paragraph in the "Help Wanted" column of the Evening Mirror inserted by Dr. Benjamin Brightseye.

I sprung to my feet. I was a graduate of one of our Northern colleges. I was the series of other very nice things that the Doctor wanted—up to the margin of "regular habits"—and there I stopped to think. Yes, on the whole, I was that too. I took my regular three meals a day, without a remembered violation of the practice since early childhood, when I had been guilty of one or two infractions of the rule from outward pressure, in the shape of a schoolmaster, who differed with me on the relations of a stomach full of bread and butter to a head full of τεταμμενός εἶναι, εὐχῆς, εἶναι. I also took a lunch of oysters on the half shell at eleven o'clock A.M., and a presomnial repast of deviled bones whenever providential interference, beyond my control, did not render those regularities impossible. And after these several invariables facts my smokes occurred in the same infallible ratio to them of three to one. I had occasionally indulged in beverages compounded, after my own recipe, of Jamaica, one half pint; water, at 190° Fahrenheit, two gills; the juice and half the peel of one orange, and one ounce of sacch. alb. I would now make a solemn resolution to take that prescription once a day, namely, one hour before retiring to rest; and behold me all that was desired—a young man of regular habits.

I immediately sat down at the writing-table of the hotel and answered the advertisement. I might gain a home and something to do for the present, till my uncle, Ptolemæus Tompkins, corresponded with me upon the subject of a capital for the West India trade—neither of which had I rejoiced in definitely for a number of years. I might have a great deal of fun from interviews with old Regular Habits, who seemed a very jolly vein to open, anyhow. Put the case as I might, in that advertisement there was some chance for the employment of an active mind.

I had not taken many sets of deviled bones—imbibed more than a very few orange-punches—before I received a quiescent to the wondering dreams indulged thereafter, in the shape of an answer from Dr. Benjamin Brightsey, signed in his own name. It professed satisfaction with my representations, so far as they had gone, and desired a personal interview at Hazelthorpe, mentioning five P.M. of the following Tuesday as a desirable time for me to arrive there. I put into decent English the very shameful equivalent thereof which I had in my mind—to wit, "Count me in, old hoss" (such terrible habits of thinking in slang are begotten by intercourse long as mine with young gentlemen in good society!), and then began practicing an appropriate demeanor before the glass—an hour every day.

There was no Hudson River Railroad at that period of the world, and I was therefore restricted to the use of a day boat. All the way up from the foot of Jay Street to that landing in Columbia County where I was to debark and take a carriage for Hazelthorpe I did not smoke a cigar. I wished to get to the windward side of the venerable Regular Habits. Had I smelled of the abominable, it might have been necessary to keep to leeward in more senses than one.

I had landed, and was about negotiating with a person in corduroys and undecided cotton collar for the use of a square box known paradoxically as a rockaway, probably because all the rock there had been in it a quarter of a century ago was now as far away as possible, when the venerable beasts whom its pole prevented from sinking into immediate collapse and exhaustion were spared further spasm by an unexpected good fortune. A young man, verging on the further limit of teenhood, with a very large cigar in his mouth, and wearing the very tight pantaloons which at that time were understood to exhibit great recklessness of character, as the opposite extreme symbolizes that fact now, rushed up to me in high excitement, winked with an earnestness that made both his eyes palpitate in company, and ejaculated, "Are you Mr. Lyle? Horace Lyle—heh? Answered advertisement—Regular Habits, you know? I'm Rufus Regular Habits—no, I don't mean—that is to say, Rufus Brightsey. If you are, got the buggy here for you—take a cigar—are you the one? All right, heh? Come along! Now!"

I accepted the introduction, politely acknowledged and declined the cigar, and permitted myself to be led away to the pretty light wagon mentioned, which stood behind its team of chafing bays, fastened to the land extremity of the wharf; whereat the gentleman who had proposed to do my transportation made sundry gestures of an uncivil character, radiating from his nose outwardly, and expressive, as I suppose, of those several spread-eagles which departed in my pocket with my lost custom. I elevated myself to the side of young Rufus, and we began to ascend the hill which leads to the high river-border plateau of that part of Columbia County.

The young man drove almost in entire silence until we reached the summit and turned northward on the great mail road. He was a very careful driver, and looked first to this side, then to that, exploring the stone walls as if they might at any time take an eccentric notion to run against the wheels, and not suspecting in the least that I knew he was studying me "out of the tail of his eye." Pretty soon he gave the nigh bay a light touch on the flank; the team sprung ahead as if the currents of their horse-thought were suddenly changed; and simultaneously young Rufus Brightsey turned on me a searching glance, and said, severely,

"Are you really regular?"

I answered the look with another, and then broke forth into a hearty laugh.

"Well, that is a funny question, seeing you have known me five minutes! Suppose you wait ten, and find out for yourself by studying—the stone walls."

Young Rufus blushed to his temples at being caught in that innocent piece of Machiavellerie; but replied, undauntedly,

"I don't believe you are a bit! You don't look like a man who ever got up at the sound of a gong. I do. Nor as if you were used to being at dinner at plump three, or going without. I am. And I'll bet you smoke. I do that, too, but don't I get raked—well, rather! Now speak out—do, there's a fellow! I won't let on to the governor—no, indeed! Does it look like me?"

I had to confess that it didn't in the least; but not knowing how cunning the old Regular Habits might be, and whether he were not setting the young one, as a skillfully-constructed trap, to catch me after I had bitten at the advertisement, I chose to withhold my confidence until further developments better assured my safety.

This reserve of mine, however, produced no similar behavior on the part of the young man. He waxed more and more communicative—as I believe he would have been to the horses, had not I been there; so full was he of grievances which needed unbosoming.

"Now I am not regular," continued Rufus, lugubriously; "far from it! I have moments—indeed I do—when I wish I were a great deal more so. But if I get thinking for a moment, and try to collect my senses, and cast about for something to occupy me and make me better, it's 'Come along, Rufus! No moping! Activity, man—activity!' Or else the governor says, in such a compassionate tone, and so devilish patronizing, 'That's right! contrition is good for you. Reflect, repent, do better.' And then ends up every thing with a 'hah!' as if he were triumphing over you; so that a fellow gets quite ashamed of himself, and goes off and smokes more pipes than are good for any body—though a pipe isn't bad for a man if he don't do it too much. Oh! how would you like it?"

"But perhaps, my young friend, you don't understand your excellent father?"

"No more I don't. I'd like to know who does—unless, perhaps, it's mother, and she gets it too, sometimes, from the old gentleman, right over the head, when she isn't up by the last stroke of that nasty gong. That's a figure of speech, you know, for of course the governor don't hit her; but I'd rather be hit, for my part, and be done with it. Mother knows how to manage him about as well as any body; she smiles at him, and is always good-natured, and only says, 'Now, Benjamin dear, be a little patient.' But fellows like Lulu or me, who can't say, 'Now, Benjamin,' why, we catch it. And he don't understand us any better than we do him. If it hadn't been for my mother and sister, I'm sure I'd have done something awful a long time ago. I'd have gone to the Mexican war, or taken Eben Smith's advice and shipped before the mast along with him on board a Mediterranean lemon and fig brig; or, when I felt the worst, I might have left a note for the evening papers, saying that I committed my soul to God, my body to the briny wave, and my name to oblivion, and dressed myself in thin clothes, and gone and taken something, or jumped in somewhere! But I didn't. And if you'll only help me, and be kind, and not blow me up, and show me the way, why I'll be glad I never did; and so will mother and Lu. I want to make something of myself—so does Lu; but it don't stand to reason that we can either of us be sixty years old, and go by clock-work at a bounce, without growing into it—does it now?"

"No, it doesn't."

"Well, as I said, I want to reform; I've been running to seed long enough, and I feel it every day. I know Latin as far as Ars Poetica; I've read Thucydides in Greek; but I haven't any heart for any thing. What does it amount to, any way? When I read an English book I want to feel it—to feel as if the man who wrote it was talking to me. If I don't, I pitch it out of the window. Now when a man reads Cicero about Cataline, who doesn't know that he wasn't saying at all what he felt? The old chap was just coming a pious indignation dodge to a lot of other old chaps, and they all knew it was nothing but a stump speech after all. So I keep feeling more and more disgusted with the people that are called regular, classic, and modern; and the only fellows of those ancients that I take a bit of comfort in are just the ones that I suppose really do make me lazier, and more careless, and less like doing the first decent stroke of work in this world. I like Horace, and Caullus, and Anacreon, and every body that isn't regular; and I get worse and worse. Dear me! Don't you know any body who is smart and a real fine fellow—who writes as if he were a real, live man—and who is regular without being a bore? I tell you I want to be a man. Can't you help me? I say, can't you—won't you? If you can, do! Yes, for Heaven's sake, do! And I'll be your friend, and mother and Lu; so that we'd go to the end of the world for you. But if you pitch into us, and go on like the governor—well, I don't mean to threaten, but my last chance of ever being any thing is gone!"

As Rufus said this he waxed more and more impassioned; his handsome hazel eyes grew brighter and brighter; he threw his long brown curly hair back on his neck with a proud toss; and when he finished he took my hand in one of his, almost letting the reins drop from the other, pressing it with a childlike ingenuousness that completely dismissed all my misgivings and disarmed my reserve.

"My dear boy!" I exclaimed, "I will help you to the utmost extent of my abilities. If your father concludes to be suited in me, and I stay, I will try to bring you together—to make you understand each other. I will aid you in making a man of yourself, and we shall all be friends—heh?"

"Yes, indeed, with my whole heart. I knew from the first minute I set eyes on you you were going to be a real true friend to me. I a sort o' felt it in my bones when you got off the old Santa Claus. But we mustn't show it at first before the governor. Oh no! He mustn't know I like you, or he'll set you down for another black sheep like me. Be distant at first, and talk natural history—that's one of the governor's greatest hobbies. Geology—that's another—only be in favor of the real six days, no metaphor about a million years, you know; and never put any grease on your head. There are fifty thousand other things that you must agree with him in, or be set down as a noodle or an infidel; but keep wide awake for them, and I'll give you hints now and then. If you steer clear of all his rocks, and seem regular for about two hours, I know he'll be crazy to keep you."

By this time we had reached the gate of Hazelthorpe, evidently a very pretty place in summer, and not unhandsome now in November, although the very high park paling of pickets, painted pure white, that surrounded it, gave it the look of staring over a very stiff shirt collar at the irregular habits of the world without, and the trees had been planted by a painfully precise eye.

A very smooth and neat gravel road brought us up to the porch, and I found myself gazing on Hazelthorpe House with a most peculiar interest, heightened by the fact that just as our bays opened the view of the house a very graceful girl of sixteen had jumped up like a startled deer, gathered up the rosy-cheeked apples she had been playing with in the whitest possible of aprons, and scampered out of sight, but not out of hearing; for as I alighted the blinds of a front window in the second story rustled audibly, and I became thoroughly conscious of a pair of very bright eyes scrutinizing me from head to foot.

A wholesome, gladsome little woman of fifty, who remained on the porch, greeted me very pleasantly upon Rufus's introduction of me as the Tutor. The Doctor was expected shortly, she said, from a horseback ride, which he always took at four o'clock; and till then I might find all necessary arrangements for refreshment after my travel in the room she had made ready for me up stairs, and return when I liked to the parlor. Rufus showed me my apartment, and added that his mother had not put any thing to drink or smoke in my bed-chamber, because she was aware that I could obtain those luxuries next door of that sad dog himself. I thanked him for the hint, but did not avail myself of it, not having yet seen and sounded the elder Regular Habits. I arrayed myself with scrupulous neatness, gave my hair a business-like brush, and then returned down stairs, just as the Doctor's strong, sinewy gray trotted up to the post, the Doctor firmly seated on him, and finding a stern, hygienic joy in the exercise, although the trots were of three-feet stroke perpendicular. He dismounted, tied his beast, and then whistling between his fingers for the stable-boy, ascended the steps, hung his whip beside the gong, exchanged his Hessians for a pair of slippers at the parlor door, drew off the black dog-skin glove from his right hand, and before I had become seated in the room myself, advanced to meet me with a military stride, gave me a stately De Coverley salute, and said:

"Mr. Horace Lyle, we are punctual—exactly 5 P.M.—it does us credit. The celebrated John Scott, banker, of Chester, says a distinguished collator of anecdotes, was so remarkable for punctuality that on one occasion a gentleman entering an inn in the town of Bala, Wales, and seeing a fine duck roasting on the spit at the landlady's fire, said, 'Let me have that duck for my dinner.' 'No,' says the landlady, 'it is engaged for the dinner of John Scott, Esq., of Chester.' 'Impossible!' says the traveler, 'I met him at Paris in the Hotel du—I forget his name—two weeks since.' 'Never mind,' replies the landlady, 'he ordered duck for his dinner at six o'clock of this day just a twelve-month ago, and John Scott, Esq., never fails, not even a minute.' So the traveler had to order something else; and sure enough, at six o'clock precisely, John Scott walked in, said, 'How are you? Is the duck ready? I am,' and sat down. You will remember also the example of our own Washington—great man, very! Follow such examples, Sir; they are the secret of all success. Be seated, Mr. Lyle."

All this was said without once stopping for breath, but not by any means incoherently. Rather as if the Doctor had taught his lungs that it was an ignominious thing to run down—his clock and watch never did; and that if he could make himself interesting for ten unbroken minutes, why, they must supply the air or burst up at once and acknowledge their frailty.

I am always for taking time by the forelock. The Doctor might get on to some perilous subject whose bearings in his mind I didn't know. Young Rufus had not yet come down; Miss Brightseye I had not seen; Mrs. Benjamin had run out for an instant to see about my dinner. I was thus left without any body to give me my cue, and must, therefore, take ground known to be sure.

"A great deal of mica on your place, Dr. Brightseye—quite a mica-schist formation, I notice. I should think it might even be worked advantageously. I have not seen any development like this between the New York Island specimens and those of Vermont and New Hampshire. I noticed some rocks where I should think the layers were six inches square."

"Ah! hah! you delight me! Have you observed that? Well, it's so. We have plenty of it about here. But there's too much ignorance ever to make it profitable. Too much brutality too, I may say. I haven't the time or inclination to make it a financial experiment, but I brought over Gilson, the mason, to see it some time ago—from Hudson; told him it was diluvial. 'What is it?' says he. 'Diluvial,' I repeated; 'the Noachian flood was full of fibrous insect wings and fish scales that perished in it, and as the waters settled they were deposited in the form of isinglass.' 'More likely,' said the brute, 'Noah got on a tight, as his after-habits showed he liked to, knocked out some of the cabin windows for a row, and they settled and made it. Mica, is it?' said he; 'well, it may be mica, but you won't make it Micah the profit to nobody.' Then he gave a great haw! haw! as if he'd been getting off one of his nasty puns to a bar-room, and said, 'Oh, yes! your gee-hawology is very fine, but I'm not a young fowl to be caught with that chaff!' Then he went away; hanged if I wouldn't have kicked him out if he didn't—infidel! But it's an honor to you that you like science; I respect you for it. Oh, excuse me, Mr. Lyle, but there's a bug crawling up your coat: let me brush it off for you."

"Please don't—I'm very much obliged to you; but if you have a pin handy, just stick it through him into my back. I keep all those things—I'm making a collection;" and looking over my shoulder, I continued, rapidly, "Yes! Scarabæus megalothorax—Coleoptera—Mandibles four—male silent—female makes buzzing noise—palpitation of internal vibratory apparatus—to attract male—fine specimen—very. Nearly allied to Pillularius of the same genus—oblige me." And I stooped to allow the little Doctor to insert a very large tin spike, which he had found on the lower edge of his waistcoat, through the beast and part of the way into my spine. He was perfectly delighted—not Scarabæus, but the Doctor. He had encountered no such participant in his scientific enthusiasm for a long time evidently.

"How delightful," said I, again taking by the foretop the grandpa of gods and men; "how delightful is the pursuit of science in the country! We students, whose means compel us to stay, even during the great part of the hot months, cooped up within the narrow walls of a boarding-house in town, may well envy men who have already purchased by long and regular indefatigable effort their right to an elegant yet scholastic leisure. While yet the dew crystals gem the grass, shedding a morning glory around the feet of the sun, and all those worshippers of virgin day who are worthy to behold them and him, what more delightful pastime exists than to answer the rousing carols of the earliest birds, and hieing forth, a hammer in one pocket, a box of convenient size of binder's boards in the other, and a tin case, painted green, and to be obtained at any hardware store, slung upon your shoulders, to gather specimens from all those kingdoms over which man is vicegerent—path-master—game-keeper—archæologist—king! The lark is there—the glittering pyrites shines in the very stone, it maybe, by which he has made his nest—the early beetle creeps forth to roll his accustomed ball—fit symbol of us all, who on this earth are always rolling our globes, either of ambition, pelf, or hobby; the woodchuck—the chipmunk, Sciens striatus—the morning mole, will none of them stay in their earthy prisons till they have paid their sweet respects to the god of day; but I am talkative—pardon a young man's enthusiasm.”

The ingenuous blush of youth mantled my face. (The recipe for it is to squeeze very hard all over, as if you had filled yourself with air, which you were trying to expel through your eyes.)

“Not at all—not at all!” exclaimed the Doctor. “Your sentiments do you great justice, and I am happy to meet you, Sir. You are worthy of yourself. Hah! yes, Sir. Excuse me a moment.”

The Doctor strode out of the room, and returned presently, bringing Mrs. Benjamin on his arm, and followed by Rufus, holding by the hand a young lady, apparently verging on seventeen, in a most becoming blue silk dress, whose short sleeves disclosed her beautiful plump white arms right daintily. Dark and bright blue eyes had she also, which gave me the impression of the laughing surface over a great depth; soft brown hair, waving, pliant, and abundant; a rose-suffused blonde complexion; and, in fine, a tout-ensemble, which brought me instantly to the following resolutions:

I. I would save the Brightyse family even at the sacrifice of myself.

II. I would harmonize the Brightyse family, though I had to introduce another note to complete the chord.

After which I felt myself fully justified in acknowledging to the polite questions of the ladies that I found myself very well—very well indeed, I thanked them.

“I have the greatest happiness,” said Dr. Benjamin Brightyse, “in presenting to my family its tutor—hah! and he will permit me to add, my friend. I feel the most unbounded confidence that at last all my hopes will be gratified, and that at length we shall indeed become a family united in aim, spirit, manners, and—hah! in fine, every thing! Mrs. Brightyse informs me that tea awaits us, and that a somewhat more solid meal than usual has been prepared for the occasion, as Mr. Lyle may feel the necessity of condensed nutriment, having traveled to-day one hundred and twenty miles and one-sixteenth of a mile—our exact distance, by State survey, from the City Hall of New York.”

So speaking he bowed Mrs. Brightyse to my arm and followed us, gazing victoriously upon the two wanderers who were now to be regained.

III.

After tea Dr. Benjamin Brightyse desired my presence in his study. There I signed a contract with him to the effect that I was to stay in his employ for one full calendar year, death or other Providential interposition alone invalidating the compact; to interest myself in the mental progress of his children four hours in the day—Saturday and Sunday excepted; their physical development four more, and their ethical growth at all times. I was to rise at the sound of the gong, was to be at all the meals punctually, and lastly and inclusive, to show myself in every respect, before himself, Mrs. Brightyse, Master Rufus, and Miss Lulu Brightyse—a man of REGULAR HABITS.

In return for these qualifications and services I was to receive the sum of eight hundred dollars, my board, lodging, lights, and washing, during the year; and if my pupils traveled within that period, I was to go with them, have my expenses paid, and be treated exactly as they were. The Doctor and I having affixed our autographs to these articles of alliance, offensive and defensive, against the works of darkness, sloth, and irregularity generally—we each of us took a copy of them for private reference—the Doctor said “Hah!” and commenced a short inaugural discourse.

“You will occupy, Mr. Lyle, the middle room on the second floor. Mrs. Brightyse and myself will be on one side of you; Master Rufus on the other. Hah! There is something symbolical in this arrangement which never struck me till now. You are a sort of connecting link between my sad wanderer and myself. You will unite us—bring us, as your influence increases with acquaintance, to something like a unity—a harmony of purpose, design, feeling. Rufus has great parts naturally, but is utterly unmanaged, unconcentrated—not in the least like me. Hah! But we shall come together; so shall Lulu and I and Mrs. Benjamin. Yes, yes, we hope great things from you. Let me know your every want—it shall be met immediately. I place my means at your disposal, and will give you every opportunity to accomplish reformation—thorough conversion to regularity of habits. Hah! And now go to the parlor, if you are not too tired—go and get acquainted with your field of labor. May the bright star of fortune shine upon your brow—the star Aldebaran, the eye of the advancing bull—and lead you on to victory! Hah! the Regular, the fixed star, Aldebaran, whose courses change not!”

With this magnificent peroration the Doctor waved me toward the parlor, and promised to follow me shortly. I went in, and took my seat between the blue-eyed Lulu and the hazel Rufus; while Mrs. Benjamin sat twinkling benignly at us by the astral lamp, knitting a tidy for the Doctor's study chair. Rufus had prepared the way for me with his sister, and that sweet little girl smiled on me with a modest frankness as a welcome comer; and we three young people fell into a cosy conversation. I soon perceived that Lulu was as little understood by her papa as the more demonstratively erratic Rufus, and seemed, in her girl nature, suffering still more deeply from the sense of unappreciation. I commenced making resolves, at the rate of three a minute, that I would restore harmony to that sweet family.

The Doctor came in presently, and we kept up a very pleasant conversation until the clock struck nine. I found myself at that moment engaged in a description of a visit I had recently paid to Howe's Cave. “One grand stalactite, half a mile from the Devil's Kitchen, fell a hundred and fifty feet from the sparkling roof overhead, divided into sixty-seven separate arches, composed of feldspar and carbonate of lime. One of these arches is so narrow that a very thin person can just get through by squeezing, and the passage of this arch was attempted by a large person of our party—Major Highjinks, of the Troy Arsenal. He had accomplished the introduction of his head and neck as far as the second cervical vertebra, when—” Ding—ding—ding, etc., went the ormolu clock on the mantelpiece behind Dr. Benjamin. “I must now bid you good-night,” I exclaimed, hurriedly rising; “it being my invariable custom to retire at nine precisely. Good-night, Dr. Brightsey. Good-night, Mrs. Brightsey—Mr. Rufus—Miss Lulu.” And taking up my candle, I strode from the parlor.

“A charming, an unusual young man that, hah!” I could hear the Doctor ejaculate, as I passed up the stairs.

“Very, my dear,” answered Mrs. Benjamin; “but I should much like to know what became of that poor Major Highjinks.”

“So should I.”

“And I,” responded severally the children of the family.

“He will probably continue the recital at a quarter to six to-morrow morning,” said the Doctor, loftily.

But Rufus was not so easily satisfied.

“Hallo there, Lyle!” shouted the youth, coming to the bottom of the stairs. “What became of that Highjinks?”

“He drew out his head, and concluded he wouldn't go in,” said I, calmly, from my room-door; then shut it behind me as I passed in, hearing a peculiar, prolonged whistle from the young gentleman below.

IV.

I had resolved upon my course of action. It was rather a perilous one, to be sure—was pretty certain to be a game of lose all or win all—yet the first step in the reformation of the Brightsey family was to teach the dogmatic sire thereof that there were other regular habits in the world besides his own.

Accordingly, at three o'clock of the cold November morning, I arose with my teeth chattering, and animation so far suspended in my toes that it required logical deduction to warrant me in the belief that they were my own. I dressed myself for the day, and then proceeded to give a series of emphatic, measured knocks on the partition which separated my room from Dr. Benjamin's. The Doctor slept lightly as a cat, and my efforts had been continued but a very short time when I heard him leap from his bed, come quickly to the partition, and inquire, in a tremulous voice,

“Well, Mr. Lyle! Are you sick, Sir—are you sick? Shall I bring the paregoric—shall I—shall I— Well, what is the matter with you?”

I replied, in distinct and sonorous tones, that I had never been better in my life. Furthermore, that it would much gratify me to have an immediate audience with Dr. Benjamin outside of our several rooms, in the entry. Upon which I went out, and was speedily joined by my patron, in night-gown and slippers.

“I regret exceedingly,” began I, speaking with the utmost rapidity, lest Dr. Benjamin's astonishment should permit him to regain breath and interrupt me, “to have disturbed so early in the morning the slumbers of Mrs. B. and yourself; but the fact is that I have not become sufficiently at home in the ways of the family to know exactly where the provision safe stands, and it has been my invariable habit since childhood to take a slight repast at exactly three a.m.; in fact, a habit whose regularity I have never permitted any thing but providential interposition to infringe upon. On the sea-shore I take two dozen clams, a soft-shell crab, fried, or a blue fish steak, with a few onions, fried à la Mayonnaise. I have not lived inland a great deal for a long time past, but I dare say these things will be difficult to get here; and on consideration, I do not object to take a few slices of cold boiled ham, with bread and butter and mustard, or half the roast fowl that was left from dinner, or one or two rare cuts of the roast beef we had, with a little mushroom catchup, some Worcester sauce, and a pickle or so. If you will, for this occasion only, show me the way to the safe.”

“A little boiled ham, some beef, or some chicken and pickles,” mused the Doctor, vacantly, repeating the words as if he did not know but it was some horrid dream, caused by over-indulgence in those articles, in which they, instead of the grandmother traditionally appearing on such occasions, had come to haunt his darkness.

"And I will give you my word," I continued, without the slightest quiver in voice or face, "that I will hereafter help myself to what I want without disturbing your repose. Ah, permit me to carry the candle."

I took the luminary mentioned with a polite measure of force from the Doctor's hand, waved airily the way down stairs, and followed him, as he went down in a state of somnambulism, murmuring, without an exact idea of the import of the words,

"And hereafter you—will—help—yourself."

"Oh, upon my soul, I assure you! You need not give yourself the slightest uneasiness!"

I had calculated rightly that the Doctor was one of those men whose life is so arranged upon a certain system that if any one got him out of it by a dextrous movement he would become so confused as to be at the mercy of the enemy. Had he played chess all his life with a man who opened with a pawn, the first man who opposed him, leading with the knight, would have done for him. Had he always eaten soup and fish at dinner?—fish and soup would have given him the most horrible attack of dyspepsia. On his own ground he was impregnable; off of it, dumb-founded. He could not collect himself sufficiently, therefore, to do otherwise than obey me—once taken at a disadvantage, and at an hour of the morning when he had not been awake for the last twenty years. So he led the way, meek and stupefied, to the larder.

"Ah! delightful!" I ejaculated. "I need not make so serious a change in my diet as I had expected. Here is a large jar of pickled oysters, I perceive—and a very good substitute they are for fresh clams, too! I will take the jar, not to detain you while I remove sufficient for my purposes. Now pardon me a moment while I spread a few slices of bread and butter—one, two, three—yes, here will be enough; and now let me light you back to your bedchamber. You are very kind; really, I thank you a thousand times! I shall now be quite at home without troubling you. Good-morning. Yes, really you must permit me to carry up the candle, not the least trouble I assure you."

Thus I escorted the Doctor up stairs again, and left him at his chamber-door. He entered with the same expression of sleepy mystery on his face, but I thought best to retreat before he could speak and break the spell in a manner irritating to sensitive feelings, and accordingly took my way hastily down the stairs again into the parlor. There I kindled a cheerful fire in the grate, lit two or three candles, and addressed myself to the edibles. Really, I did not wonder that Dr. Benjamin loved to rise so early of cold mornings if it gave him such a fine appetite.

The bread and butter and a number of oysters having disappeared simultaneously with the appetite, I lighted my short walnut-colored pipe—a true, well dyed cutty—and began diffusing the fumes of fragrant Oronoka prodigally through the apartment. Up they floated, and made rich, satiny festoons around the Doctor's picture, by Sully—among the geraniums on the deep window-seat they hung and waved till the bright imperial scarlet of those flowers seemed to grow out of a cloudland, like a little garden of transplanted sunsets, gliding about, unsupported in mid-ether. I sat in the pleasant elysium of this solitary, early morning naughtiness, and felt glad to think, from the absence of all sound overhead, that Doctor Brightsey had by this time fallen in with the young woman who attends to the sleeve of care, and got the place I raved thoroughly knit up again. All was so dreamy, cosy, home-like about me, and the sense of having transacted all my duty with the oysters, and done it well, made my conscience so light, that I was fain to sleep in the deep embowerment of the Doctor's lusciously squabbed leather chair, with the cutty end between my teeth, and the aim of my early rising forgotten, when the Doctor's door banged above me, and I heard a stout, indignant outcry from the top of the stairs,

"Rufus! Rufus! Sir, do you hear me! Wretched boy, how dare you smoke your abominable pipes in the parlor? Can you rise early for nothing but sin? Sin—hah! Yes, Sir—crime—guilty, irreclaimable crime! Stop instantly, Sir, or I'll—"

What the Doctor would have done never became apparent, for just at that moment I emerged from the parlor, and, bowing respectfully, said:

"Excuse me, my dear Sir, but I imagine that Master Rufus has not yet risen. It is I who am below. For many years I have made it my invariable habit to take a few pipes after my little repast; but if it is disagreeable to you here, I will go into the conservatory, or the cellar, or any place you may name."

Dr. Benjamin leaned upon the rail of the balusters as if it would take only a little more to floor him. "And, do you smoke pipes?" asked he in a gasping manner.

"It has been my regular habit since early youth. May I ask, do you?"

"Never! never, Sir!"

"That is exactly as it should be, if you will accept praise from one so much your junior. Either always or never; perfect regularity is the rule in those things. But I will go into the conservatory."

"You may, if you please—hah!" And the Doctor turned away to his bedchamber. I took the remainder of my smoke among the cactuses and the abutlons, but found the smouldering little stove that made it warm enough for them hardly sufficient for me, and the air was too heavy, laden with the spirit of one vast bouquet, formed of all the flowers that had ever lived and died there to be pleasant to breathe. So I finished my last pipe with short, fierce whiffs, and returned to the parlor. I opened the piano, and began practicing the gamut, accompanying my voice in unison. I never was much of a singer, being, perhaps, not unjustly described by one of my friends, who objected to my making a little tenor, on a certain occasion, to one of his baritone solos from Don Giovanni, as a man who could sing straight ahead very well, but when it came to turning a tune, "Oh my!"

"Do-re-mi-fa-sol-la-si-do-si-la-sol-fa-mi-re-do!" I did not commit this outrage in an undertone. I was offensive loudly. I sang—if singing it could be called—at the top of my voice, and in a bravura style, which had, however, the boldness of perfect unsuspecting innocence as its manner rather than impertinent wantonness. I sang as if it were the most ordinary, the natural, and the properest thing to be done, under the given circumstances of half past four A.M., and more or less somnolency existing among other inmates of the house.

There came a pounding on the floor above me as of excited heels, an insane clattering to and fro, and then an animated conversation arose between Mrs. and Dr. Benjamin Brightyse, whose import, the thickness of the ceiling and my own singing, prevented me from learning. I fancied too that I perceived symptoms of a frenzied rush to the door with malevolent intent on the part of the Doctor; an expostulation, perhaps assisted by slight manual traction on the part of Mrs. Doctor, and a return to the edge of the bed with more animated conversation.

But before these impressions could resolve themselves into certainty, the parlor door opened, and I was agreeably surprised by the entrance of Master Rufus, accompanied by his sister. They wore an aspect of far more ordinary maternal cheerfulness, and were neatly dressed in simple, yet very pretty attire.

"I felt wide awake, Mr. Lyle," said Rufus, "and upon knocking at Lulu's door found she was already up, for a wonder, so we concluded to get dressed and come down and join you at the piano."

"That is a very pretty thing you are singing," added Lulu, archly. "How would it do as a trio? Suppose we see."

"With all my heart," I replied. "It is an old chant, supposed to have been composed by Pythagoras. Others, however, ascribe it to a Bolognese monk of the eleventh century. I confess that I lean myself to the former opinion. It is almost all the music of a grand and simple order that I know. Miss Brightyse, will you take the soprano; the bass, Rufus, if you please; and I will try to assist you with my little tenor."

So, in high glee, we sang the scale until Lulu had laughed herself hoarse. Then we essayed the three unfortunate mice whose blind frenzy led them in an insane dance after the wife of the agriculturist, and had cut off their tails in the most inhuman manner a dozen times, when, like a spectre, the solemn form of Dr. Benjamin, arrayed for bed but evidently not quite recent from it, stalked into the room, accompanied by Mrs. Brightyse, completely dressed, shiny-headed and smiling, but with a lingering cloud of apprehension on her gentle face as she plucked the Doctor by the sleeve of his night-gown, whispering ever and anon, "Don't be violent, husband dear; be kind to them—be kind!"

"She asked me to dress—Mrs. Brightyse did!" burst forth the Doctor, as if in that fact lay his irreparable injury. "Dress—hah! at four o'clock of a bitter cold morning—the thermometer, as I honestly believe, but a little above zero! No; I had rather catch my death of cold! Hah! I shall die a victim to this shameless imposition! I will come down in my stocking-feet—I will leave my legs exposed to the inclemency of the weather—I will not put on even a simple dressing-gown! Hah! you shall see what you have brought me to, Mr. Horace Lyle!"

"Yes, Dr. Brightyse?"

"When I engaged you, at seven o'clock of last evening, as a tutor to my children, I did not realize that, like Ho Georgos, in Fabula Alpha of Æsop, as given in Græca Minora, I was taking a deadly animal of the genus Coluber to my bosom!"

"You did not, Dr. Brightyse. I was not aware of that fact myself, having always supposed that I occupied a defined though humble position in Bimana, sub-genus Caucasus." I regarded the Doctor with a fixed and yet mild aspect of disarming innocence as I said this, which did not change at all before his stern, dramatic gaze.

"Sir, I need not say that I speak metaphorically. Hah! very true, the genus Coluber does not demand baked meats during the hours divinely instituted for repose; abominable pipes do not stimulate him afterward; and, being dumb—hah! Sir, dumb!—he does not emit sounds to which, though a warden of St. Jubilate for the last twelve years, I am justified in applying the epithet damnable! Coluber—hah! Coluber literal would perhaps have done better than Coluber metaphorical—hah!" And the Doctor smiled a bitter smile. I returned, with perfect suavity:

"Dr. Brightyse," said I, "if you will do me the favor to be calm for a few moments, I shall endeavor to discover in what I have deserved the comparison you have just instituted. Under those circumstances I shall be desirous, perhaps able, to make explanation—reparation, if necessary. At present, however, the only impression that occupies my mind is, that you are taking out of my hands the physical and mental education of those children whom you commended to them with a cheerful confidence (perhaps, however, not wholly justified), as you observed, last evening at seven o'clock. That you are interrupting a trio attempted for the especial purpose of cultivating voices admirably adapted by nature to great feats in harmony, susceptible of infinite improvement by cultivation. That you are thus defeating the end I aimed at in the strengthening of the lingual and pectoral muscles, which is a branch of the physical education I have solemnly assumed the responsibility of giving your offspring; and—inasmuch as symphony of voices (I quote from no less an authority than the sublime Luther) is a most potent preparation for and assistant of the symphony of souls—their spiritual development also, for which I am holden to you by a compact of equal solemnity. And, in fine, that you are thus obstructing the progress of that reformation which is already as dear an object to my heart as yours—the reformation of those who have hitherto passed the divine hours of early morning in inglorious inactivity.”

Rufus sighed, as if the whole sin of past sloth lay on his conscience like a mountain; and Miss Brightseye cast down her long brown lashes as if the tear of contrition were just stealing from its fountain. Mrs. Dr. Benjamin gazed reproachfully at the Doctor, but smiled, as if any expression on her sweet face could be sarcastic, and needed to have its edge taken off. The Doctor himself, with a perplexed air, leaned on the back of a chair, like a criminal convicted on his own plea, who had been hurried into court without time to put on his clothes. He was ashamed of his violence, ashamed of his night-gown, ashamed to see all that family whose severe tribunal he had hitherto been turning the tables upon him, and becoming his silent jury upon the very offense which had hitherto been his gravest charge against them. All the air of indignant declamation was departed from him; but making one final, desperate stand, he uttered mildly,

“A month ago and you would have been up half an hour later. Are we to be the creatures of mere chronology—servile sun-worshippers, like the heathen of a Heliopolis gone by? Does the coming of winter days lift from us the responsibility of duty—shall we be less industrious than we were in summer—shall we yield to mere inclination? Is it praiseworthy that we are earnest, laborious, faithful when it is easy, and the luxurious June mornings woo us to bask in their fragrant breath; but as soon as cold, darkness, and fog become obstacles, we ignominiously succumb to them? As for myself, Dr. Brightseye, I arise at the same hour all the year round. And if I did not, I could not blame my pupils for lying in bed till any hour, however late!”

There was a mild severity in my manner. Dr. Benjamin sat down in his chair, morally conquered.

“But,” I continued, “I will not be so arrogant as to rely upon my own example. Summer and winter the great Cornaro rose at four. The still greater Buffon invariably at three. While the Emperor Severus, as history informs us, slept with a brazen basin at his bed-side—a brazen ball in his hand; when the latter fell into the former its sound aroused him, and he did not sleep again. The gong of modern days has not been an improvement on that great man’s reveille system.”

“No, I’ll be hanged if it has! The ball only fell once, and then it didn’t wake up all the young Severuses too, feeling as if the d—l were after them!”

“Don’t say d—l, Rufus dear!” said Mrs. Benjamin and Lulu at once.

I resumed: “And the practice of singing an hour in the early morning—from three and three-quarters to the same time after four—is invariable with me. It gives health to body, tone to soul; it has been from early childhood one—of—my—Regular—Habits.”

Dr. Benjamin Brightseye arose from his chair, spoke never a word, but wandered reflectively out of the room. Master Rufus, his sister, and I were about to commence the gamut again; but looking around saw dear little Mrs. Benjamin fast asleep, curled in the corner of the settee, like a sweet baby who has no part in the guile of men. Rufus and I made an arm-chair for her, lifted her on to it gently, carried her up stairs and laid her on her bed, covering her up daintily with the blankets. Where was the Doctor? Oh! that slothful person, unawakened by our entrance, emitted sounds embraced within, but not comprehensive of the gamut, from a large wicker chair, where he had seated himself to muse on regularity of habits on his return from the parlor. We slid a warm rug gently under his feet, threw a luxurious double carriage shawl around him, so that he should not catch cold, and went quietly down stairs.

“Shall we wrap up warmly and go out for a walk?” said I to Lulu and Rufus.

“Oh, delightful!” cried Lulu. “It will be such fun! I never walked when it was dark as pitch; and it will seem just as if we were fleeing from a ruined castle, and going to consult a witch and every thing like that.”

“I’m with you,” said Rufus, “as soon as I light a cigar.”

So we three wandered forth into the gloom in high glee. The ground was hard, the air crisp, the fog not yet risen but kept for such slothful persons as the Doctor, who wooed a less virgin morning. We found fox-fire on the low ground by the old fences—we gathered pocketfuls of walnuts and chestnuts in the dark—we had all sorts of plays and songs; in fine, we had such a good time that we did not return till six o’clock.

At seven, breakfast was ready; the gong sounded for it; we sat down, but no Doctor Benjamin was there. When I had half finished my second cup of coffee the sluggard appeared. He took his seat at the head of the table with a condemned look on his countenance; and Master Rufus observed:

“Please forgive us, father, for the irregularity; but though we knew it was the rule of the family that any one who comes late loses his breakfast, we have put a plate of steak and warmed-up potatoes to keep hot for you, and I do not think the coffee is quite cold yet.”

To divert attention from the mortifying subject, as her sweet woman-heart impelled her to do, Lulu began a most animated description of our walk, illustrated by jumping up every minute to bring some rare specimen of fox-fire or some larger nut. And by degrees the Doctor waxed cheerful, warmed into the conversation, ate his steak, potatoes, and buckwheat cakes with a relish as immense as if he had prepared a basis for it of the very densest morning fog, and forgot how naughty he had been.

As for your humble servant, Horace Lyle, he preserved an attitude of dignified yet affable sweetness, becoming one who has undertaken the reformation of a family, in which there are several young people with unformed ideas, and an old gentleman with one fixed one.

V.

Day by day I was more and more delighted to perceive that my pupils were not quick learners. If there is any pitiable, hopeless order of mind, for which nothing great or useful can ever be foretold, it is the order which my friend the German Professor used to call by that horrible word of his own coining which I hope no one will ever venture to introduce into a dictionary of the English language without an injunction from the Supreme Court of the United States—"Struthiokamelopsychists." "When," as he was wont to continue, "the phrase is from the Dutch-Greek overset, it is, in Anglo-Saxon, 'The ostrich-souls.' Yes, the ostrich-souls, who go about gobbling up this man's rag of rhyme—this one's clenching-nail of argument—so-and-so's crackling fragment of tin-cloquence—such another's pine-splinter of theology—then stick their silly heads into the laurel bush from which ought not only the garlands of the truly great to be outplucked? and flapping their wings, cry hoarsely, 'Am I not verily accomplished?' But is not their tail the mean while evident to the observing?"

I agree with my friend the Deutsch Professor. From ostrich-souls nothing worthy can ever be expected. Rufus and Lulu were in nowise of these. The desire to be accomplished never entered their minds. They had never been able to see "the use of it," they said; and I, being equally dull of optics, forebore trying to persuade them that there was any. What they wanted was to know, to feel, to appreciate; and when they had known, felt, appreciated any thing rightly, to originate, moved and stimulated by the suggestions they had gained. Their questions poured forth on me endlessly—questions which seemed to have been held in by ever-growing embankments of rule, precedent, and reserve, during those centuries of inquisitiveness through which young minds pass in a few years. Happily I had passed through the same phase of life before them; my training had been miscellaneous, but at the same time thorough—for I had thought about every thing that came up, and never left it before arriving at my solution of it, at least—and I was thus able to set them on the right track for an answer to many of their questions. I never dismissed them with the answer that any author said a certain thing because the verb agreed with its noun in number and person, or that coal was found in Pennsylvania and marble in Vermont, because the one abounded in carboniferous and the other in shell deposits. In fine, I tried to give them an idea of the old-world life of the Greeks and Romans—the older-world life of the fossil nations of mollusk, saurian, and tree-fern, and the modern life of Frenchmen, Germans, Englishmen, rather than names or rules for them. For as Lulu expressed it, it isn't to be supposed that that big funny bug with three lumps on him knew he was going to be called a Trilobite and wiggled into his place accordingly to die there, just like a gentleman going to take dinner at the Astor House who sees his card at a particular plate and sits down there for that reason. No, Trilobites Longifrons must have had personal motives of his own and his Creator's for going into the stone where he was found a million of years after—and what were they?

This gives a little idea of the course of instruction we pursued during those hours given to the mental development of Dr. Benjamin's children. And, indeed, during all hours, for our very walks were protracted into talks by these insatiable young people, in which the lessons of the day were reviewed, discussed, fixed. And when Dr. Brightsey met us on our romps through the dead leaves; or, as the season grew later, over the snow crust—his astonishment at beholding his children with cabinet specimens in their hands—or at hearing the names of old dead Greeks mentioned in warm conversation as if they had been next-door neighbors—or of places across the sea talked about like New York or Boston—his astonishment grew so great that when his business did not permit him to join us (as we always asked him to), he would stand leaning against a post and regard us silently for a moment, and then utter a sonorous Hah! which seemed to mean, "Well! that's all I am adequate to!"

Never had he seen his library so much in request. Never had he known before what it was to be asked for a sight of his largest books and engravings. Never had he experienced the father's dear delight of having his children come to him with questions—with modest and at first timid requests for sympathy. As all these changes took place—he regarded the world as more and more susceptible of being made over again—doubts began to creep over him as to whether his regular habits might, by some chance, be after all those which the universe observed in its periodical mutations. The first symptom of this was the abolishment of the gong—there was now no need for it, as I continued to do from preference what I had done at first for strategy's sake, and rose at three always. (I have dropped the habit of late years, finding it interfered with the regular habits of other people.) At five the young people were up also; but Dr. Benjamin could not be converted from lazy habits at his age, and now slept till six, which prolongation of rest improved his spirits and temper amazingly. Mrs. Benjamin went about beaming on every body as usual, but every cloud gone from her gentle brow. Master Rufus, having something to interest him beyond his former scientific yet somewhat monotonous amusement of watching the grass grow, smoked fewer Dutch abominable pipes and abjured skins altogether.

The winter passed away, the spring followed it like a dream, and the full bride-beauty of the queen summer blushed on parterres, veiled itself in quince and chestnut blooms, breathed wide through the land into homes, hearts, and merry-makings, and made every living thing glad with its coming. With it came the full conviction of a truth which had been growing truer within me for a long time—I was very much in love with Lulu Brightyse.

Could I be sure that she loved me? That I had been of great benefit to her I knew; that her reticule no longer lay on the floor of arbors; that her guitar was always well kept and constantly practiced; that she had found an aim for her active, thoughtful nature; and that she was very grateful to me for the change in her life. But I had such a horror of any love which might be only at bottom gratitude under a disguise which it is hard for the untaught young heart to penetrate, that I kept my own feeling dumb, showing it only, as I could not help doing, in action. Perhaps that was just as wrong; but who is willing to acknowledge it to himself when the dear little hand lingers saying good-night, and it is so easy to press it tighter than the mere friend would be likely to; or the peerless little rosy mouth is made up into a kiss for its father, and the impassioned eyes can not help glancing on the deed as if they wished the mouth under them belonged, for the time being, to that old gentleman, though the glance brings back a blush that says, "I know what you mean!"

On the 12th of July came the Doctor's birthday. He was then sixty years old, and we had all agreed to give him a favorable surprise. The preparations for it had been so gradual—running, in fact, through all the months of my tutorship—that I will not burden this simple recital with them, but will give only the result.

On the evening of the 11th a neatly-printed card, adorned with emblematic devices from the pencil of Miss Brightyse, a poetical motto from the pen of Master Rufus, and old English text from the combined pen and pencil of the tutor, was laid, in a neat envelope, on the Doctor's plate at tea—as follows: a cherub at the top feeding an altar flame from a can labeled "Activity;" Saturn, with his scythe slung over his shoulder, vainly endeavoring to blow the fire out, but deterred by a young man with a gong persistently stunning the foe of longevity, while he guarded the fire with his instrument as a shield. Meanwhile the goddess of morning dropped a very pretty garland of amaranths, with the letters LX. in the middle of it, over a capital portrait of the Doctor, as arrayed for his early walk.

Immediately under this symbol the subjoined stanzas:

"The three black sisters all combine
To cut thy thread in two,
But filial hearts shall knit the twine
And spin its strands anew.

"Ruleless the great destroyer comes—
That calculus of Babbitt's
He hath no mind for—but succumbs
To one of Reg'lar Habits.

"We hail thee to thy sixtieth year,
And see no reason why
Thy thousandth may not see thee here
Beneath thy morning sky.

"All blessings on thy hoary head
Light softly, much loved sire!
Oh, never than thy feather bed
Thy turf one more desire!"

And then followed:

"The company of Mr. and Mrs. Dr. Benjamin Brightyse is most respectfully and affectionately solicited to an entertainment given by their children, under the auspices in general of their tutor, Horace Lyle, A.M., K.A., Soc. Coll. Concordia, and in particular of the present festive occasion. Most interesting exercises may be expected—of a musical and declamatory character. An examination will take place of the pupils of Mr. Horace Lyle, A.M., K.A., etc., during the progress of the services, upon the studies in which they have become proficient since his inauguration. Performances to commence at 3 p.m. An elegant repast will be ready for the distinguished visitors at 6 p.m. precisely. Punctual attendance is particularly desired.

"By order of the Committee of Arrangements,
"LULU BRIGHTYSE, Secretary."

The Doctor read the card with undisguised delight; Mrs. Benjamin meanwhile leaning over his shoulder and beaming sympathy.

"Hah!" said the Doctor; "most happy! Hah! Lula, I declare I didn't know you could draw like that! And that poetry—'pon my word, Milton never did that at his age! Delighted! Hah!"

At the hour appointed we all assembled in the parlor, to the number of five. It was a warm afternoon, but breezy, and, according to country custom, we had all the doors and windows open. Dr. and Mrs. Benjamin sat on two large cane arm-chairs, wheeled together in the form of a parquet, and the young lady and gentleman, with me, vis-à-vis behind the piano.

I arose, and with a wave of the hand solicited attention.

"The exercises of the day will open with a performance by Mr. Rufus Brightyse upon a Dutch pipe, of a description which I am safe in saying you have never seen him use before. Though Dutch, I trust you will not find it abominable. Mr. Rufus, if you please, Sir!"

The young man drew from his pocket a handsome morocco case, containing—it might have contained a very large and elegant meerschaum. Instead of that, he drew from it a beautiful Bochan flute; he put it to his lips, and Lula sat down at the piano to accompany him, while, without hesitation, he played the overture to the Caliph of Bagdad from beginning to end.

His father and mother laughed with ecstasy till they had to wipe their eyes.

"Where in the world did you learn to do that?" cried Dr. Benjamin.

"That," answered Master Rufus, "is one of the results of early rising. Since a period as distant as three months ago it has been an invariable habit of mine, which I have allowed nothing but providential interposition to interfere with, to practice this Dutch abominable pipe in the old cider-mill, from four until five A.M. of the days divinely instituted for secular labor."

The classes in Greek, History, Geology, French, German, Latin and English Literature were then called in succession, with an interim of music between each, and did themselves infinite credit, not only by the amount which they had learned, but the amount which they knew.

Miss Brightseye then read a composition. It did not begin, "The gentle flowers of the forest and the soft murmur of the peaceful rills seem to say to us various things of a moral and instructive tendency," the young lady not having enjoyed the advantages of our first female boarding-schools; for the same reason it was not read with a sound so soft that nothing comes 'twixt it and silence; but it was a most delicate texture, wooed of the freshest woman-sense, warped with imagery bright and original as sunbeams, whose subject was, "What there is for girls to do in this world." And it made one feel that it was not such a bad thing to be a girl after all—which, perhaps, is not the prevailing impression left by effusions of that origin at Commencements of the Mount Maria Abode of Industry.

Master Rufus then closed the exercises with one of the wittiest and most playfully philosophical orations I ever listened to, having for its theme "The Regular Habits of People in General." The regular habits of cannibals and of business men, of literati and of clowns, of ordinary and of extraordinary persons, and finally of the Brightseye family, which were described as being the most unique, consistent with all the grand laws of Universal Being, and worthy of being imitated by even the celestial luminaries themselves, of all which had ever become apparent in any age or nation. To adopt a phrase from Jenkins, his good hits elicited frequent applause.

"And now, worthy patrons of the Brightseye Institute," said I, bowing modestly, "I might make a little speech of glorification over our progress—it would be customary, but it is not appropriate; our results speak for themselves. It remains for me, therefore, only to present the prizes. In my manner of doing this I shall also be eccentric, for I give them not to the pupils who have to-day so distinguished themselves, but to those whose pride it is to witness that distinction;" I held out a hand apiece to Lulu and Rufus, and led them from behind the piano up to their parents' chairs.

"As a present, on the occasion of Dr. Benjamin's 60th birthday, to himself and his beloved wife, I have been able to think of nothing more precious and lasting than two loving children, of Regular Habits."

Lulu kissed her father, Rufus his mother; then they all fell into a heap upon each other's necks, and there was a silence for some time, only broken by the sounds of a very gentle weeping in which that once inharmonious family ran together, like one big drop of dew made up of four. I retired to a little distance, and confided my feelings to a hem-stitch pocket handkerchief, being alone in the world.

Like flowers after rain, all the Brightseyes lifted up their heads presently, and laughed with a wide-beaming joyfulness which drew me from my seclusion. They ran up to me and shook what hands I had so ardently and so simultaneously that I would have been more adequately provided for the occasion had I been the idol Vishnu, who rejoices in a dozen of those members.

"Hah!" cried the Doctor—"hah! Mr. Lyle, this is the happiest day that I ever passed in my life. Heaven bless you, bless you! Hah! I can't speak a word or I shall break down, my dear boy." And he fell upon my neck also, and Mrs. Benjamin kissed my forehead over his shoulder.

Having disengaged ourselves once more, the Doctor held me out at arm's-length, and contemplated me. "Hah! I wouldn't have believed it! I really wouldn't! If you'd come and told me a year ago that we should all do, and be, and feel as we do now, I should have said you were crazy—I should! Now, what I want you to do is to tell me what we shall do for you! Whatever it is let us know it, and if it's in human power it shall be done! It shall be done! When is your birthday coming?"

My expression of sympathetic joy changed to one of deep pensiveness. "My birthday, Dr. Brightseye, occurred just after I came to this pleasant house. I fear I shall not spend another in this scene of my so amply rewarded labors." And I sighed, returning to my cambric only friend on earth.

"Why, what does he mean? You're not going to leave us!" burst from all the Brightseye family at once.

"I fear I must," was my sad reply; "I have passed among you, my friends, the happiest hours of my life, but an imperative necessity bids me shortly to depart, perhaps never to return."

I noticed that Lulu did not cry, nor turn away, but stood looking up into my face, her own full of a wondering fearfulness, and snowy pale as she grasped my hand like one who would never let it go. The others stood likewise, in the respect of mute wonderment, waiting for me to continue.

"I have been unspeakably happy here; but if I should continue here, in the relation which I have occupied, it would be only to grow more and more miserable. My trouble is this: Regularity of Habits is the very soul of my existence, and there is one regular habit which, though absolutely necessary to my living, I have not yet been able to practice."

"Dumb-bells?" gasped the Doctor. "There are three pair in the wood-shed!"

Mrs. Brightseye suggested "Hot flip, just before going to bed." Rufus, "A horse and buggy, all to yourself." Lulu alone said nothing.

"No, none of these, my friends; the Regular Habit is one for which money, labor, favor, interest, can not purchase the opportunities."

"Name it! Oh, name it!" cried father, mother, and son in chorus.

"It is the regular habit of being the husband of Lulu Brightyse."

The Doctor sat down utterly overcome. Rufus took both his mother's hands and gazed silently into her face. And Lulu hid her eyes in the lap of the same dear refuge, and for the first time gave way to her heart.

As for me, accompanied by the hem-stitch friend of my desolation, I walked out of the front door and strayed down the gravel-walk, with an indistinct idea that this was the road to a lodge in some vast wilderness where boundless contiguity of shade might hide the fact that I was done for. The suspicion proved erroneous, the path led to the rustic arbor, and I wandered into it, sat down in it, ere I was aware.

Yes, the place where I had so often taught her! The very seat where she had sat beside me asking question on question about the flowers she was too loving to pull to pieces and call hard names! The mica slate we had brought together from all the nooks and corners of Hazelthorpe made a pretty shining pavement under foot! It was her pet clematis that climbed and swayed around the rough posts behind my head. She had been my friend then—perhaps she was not even that now—and all because I could not contain myself, and wait for Heaven or Uncle Ptolemæus Tompkins to make me a rich enough son-in-law for the Doctor!

I bowed my head and thought bitterly for what seemed to me a long time. In the midst of the bitterest of the bitter a little soft hand stole trustfully into my own, a gentle trembling voice whispered at my ear,

"They say I am young, but so was mamma, and you may stay, dear."

I caught Lulu Brightyse in my arms, and of what happened then let the old arbor keep the secret.

This episode, not down on the card of invitation, retarded the splendid repast prepared for the Doctor's birthday festival; but we were all willing to wave the lesser for the sake of the greater Regular Habit, and have tea at half past six.

Right in the middle of our quiet joy, while Rufus was toasting his father in a cup of English breakfast-tea, and the Doctor, after a neat and appropriate response, varied by numerous "Hahs!" on which he leaned as an impregnable bulwark to "breaking down," had given the sentiment, "Our three children!" to be eaten in apple-jelly of Lulu's own making, and Mrs. Dr. Benjamin had said, with tears and smiles fighting amicably for the enviable occupation of her loving eyes, that there never was such a husband as the Doctor, and if Lulu were only as happy as she had been in her married life the gold of the Indies couldn't do any more for her; and I had accepted so many offers to take something to eat, out of sheer affection and relationship, that my plate assumed a pyramidal form, and looked like a receiving warehouse for several firms of provision-dealers; and the very waiter had caught the cheerful contagion and performed the circuit of the table, bearing muffins, with such a delicious rapidity that fears were entertained for the stability of his mind, and we were compelled to stop him and let him lean against the mantle-piece till he could control his ecstasy; right in the midst of all this, there came a ring at the front door, and presently the servant descended, bearing a card, on which, in the largest kind of responsible-to-any-amount looking business hand, was written,

"Ptolemæus Tompkins, Shipping and Commission."

I handed it to the Doctor. "Strangely enough my maternal uncle;" said I, "please excuse me for a moment."

"No! no! bring the gentleman down, Sarah. Ptolemæus Tompkins? Tompkins? Ptol Tompkins? Bless my soul! was he ever at Union College?"

"Yes, Sir; graduated in 1809."

"My class! My chum! Hah! by the Lord Harry, Ptol Tompkins!"

Just at that moment my venerable uncle entered, was about bowing gravely to the company and extending a hand to me, when the Doctor caught him in an ungoverned manner by the shoulders, crying, "Old Ptol! Don't you know me, Ben Brightyse?" and the two chums were hugging each other like little boys.

The introduction to Mrs. Benjamin and Rufus accomplished, the Doctor waved his hand declamatorily toward Lulu and me sitting side by side.

"Do you know who those are, Old Ptol?"

"One of 'em's my nephew—"

"And my son-in-law, that is to be, Providence and the weather permitting. The pretty young lady that blushes so there, and hides her head, is my daughter, and, hah! going to be your niece, if you please. Yes, Sir! Hah, that's my son-in-law, Old Ptol!"

"And my partner," added Uncle Ptolemæus, in his business-like unpremeditated way, at the same time producing another, an enormous, card from his pocket, on which was printed, "Tompkins and Co., No. — Beaver Street." "He's Co. since yesterday; I thought I'd kinder wander up this way and tell him on't. Shipping and Commission. Patronage respectfully solicited; that is, I'll be glad to see you all, if you'll only put on something that ile won't spile, and be keerful o' brushin' against the bar'ls."

"And now let's have a little tea, Ptol," said the Doctor.

Lulu and I have been in the Commission business, as I said when I began, for a matter of a dozen years. Our commissions are to make each other just as good and happy as we can; ten per cent. is paid in smiles and kisses. If you think the sugar in our business is sickish, why stay away; but if you like that and the oil (of human kindness), in which also we do a thriving trade, holding it on tap in our own cheerful hearts, just give us a call, and you needn't be afraid to "rub against the barrels."

There you may be introduced to the Doctor and Mrs. Benjamin, in a hale old age, not troubled by too much early rising, but for the last dozen years making harmony, comfort, jollity, and every household virtue, "their invariable Regular Habits!"

NOTES OF CHARLES LAMB TO THOMAS ALLSOP.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

AS I look over this collection of Charles Lamb's unpublished notes to his friend Thomas Allsop—as I hold them in my hand and remark the fair, smooth, legible, half-prim, clerkly writing—the heavy mercantile paper of the old India House, with the edges rough where he tore them into little note-shapes, and the gray and yellowish hue which has stolen over them with time—I place my hand where his hand must have rested, I think of that genial genius, that true and charitable heart, that long life of silent heroism, and I find how truly Talfourd says in the preface to the "Final Memorials," that "there is indeed scarcely a note (a notelet, as he used to call his very little letters) Lamb ever wrote which has not some tinge of that quaint sweetness, some hint of that peculiar union of kindness and whim, which distinguish him from all other poets and humorists." And therefore, with very few and slight exceptions, Talfourd printed every thing that came into his possession.

I feel disposed to do likewise with these notes, because the lovers of Charles Lamb love entirely, and wish nobody to select or discriminate for them, but would have every word that he said or wrote in all its completeness. For none of our authors, not even Shakespeare, is more a passion with all who feel his genius than Charles Lamb; while perhaps no English author of equal rank is so entirely out of the sympathy of those who are not in his key. Thus, in that extraordinary diary of the dinings out of a fashionable bard of Erin, which Lord John Russell has edited for a hungry posterity in eight volumes, we read:

"April 4, 1823. Dined at Mr. Monkhouse's (a gentleman I had never seen before) on Wordsworth's invitation, who lives there whenever he comes to town. A singular party: Coleridge, Rogers, Wordsworth and wife, Charles Lamb (the hero, at present, of the London Magazine) and his sister (the poor woman who went mad with him in the diligence on the way to Paris), and a Mr. Robinson, one of the minora sidera of this constellation of the lakes—the host himself, a Mécenas of the old school, contributing nothing but good dinners and silence. Charles Lamb, a clever fellow certainly, but full of villainous and abortive puns, which he miscarries of every minute. Some excellent things, however, have come from him, and his friend Robinson mentioned to me not a bad one. On Robinson's receiving his first brief he called upon Lamb to tell him of it. 'I suppose,' said Lamb, 'you addressed that line of Milton to it, 'Thou first best cause, least understood.'"—(MOORE'S Diary, IV. 50.)

Charles Lamb himself also wrote of this dinner to Bernard Barton (Works, I. 264):

"I wished for you yesterday. I dined in Parnassus with Wordsworth, Coleridge, Rogers, and Tom Moore—half the poetry of England constellated and clustered in Gloucester Place. It was a delightful evening. Coleridge was in his finest vein of talk—had all the talk: and let 'em talk as evilly as they do of the envy of poets, I am sure not one there but was content to be nothing but a listener. The Muses were dumb, while Apollo lectured, on his and their fine art. It is a lie that poets are envious: I have known the best of them, and can speak to it, that they give each other their merits, and are the kindest critics as well as best authors. I am scribbling a muddy epistle with an aching head, for we did not quaff Hippocrene last night; marry, it was hippocrass rather."

The meeting of Charles Lamb and Tommy Moore was that of an utterly honest with an utterly factitious man. It charmed the bard to hear Lady Jersey say that she was about taking his "Loves of the Angels" into the country, to read for the third or fourth time; but in company with Lamb he could only discover a bad punster.

It is therefore by those only who already possess the key to Lamb's peculiar genius that the following notes will be enjoyed.

They are in themselves mostly unimportant, but they fit in well, with their details of daily life, among the letters which Talfourd has published. The manuscripts, the folding, the general character of all of them fully illustrate the truth of what Lamb often says of his letters and notes. Writing to Bernard Barton, March 11, 1823, Lamb says (Works, I. 264):

"I am ashamed of the shabby letters I send, but I am by nature any thing but neat. Therein my mother bore me no Quaker. I never could seal a letter without dropping the wax on one side, besides scalding my fingers. . . . My letters are generally charged as double at the Post-office from their inveterate clumsiness of foldure. So you must not take it disrespectful to yourself, if I send you such ungainly scraps. I think I lose £100 a year at the India House, owing solely to my want of neatness in making up accounts."

Talfourd says of Lamb in the year 1824 (I. 307):

"Lamb himself at this time wrote a singularly neat hand, having greatly improved in the India House, where he also learned to flourish—a facility he took a pride in, and sometimes indulged; but his flourishes (wherefore, it would be too curious to inquire) almost always shaped themselves into a visionary cork-screw, 'never made to draw.'"

So Lamb himself, writing to Miss Hutchinson

(I. 308): "I don't think she (Mary) can make a cork-screw if she tried, which has such a fine effect at the end or middle of an epistle, and fills up. There is a cork-screw! One of the best I ever drew."

These little notes have many such. When he signs "C. L." simply, it is often in the most luxuriant cork-screw manner. But after the rounded accuracy and almost formality of the writing in the body of the note, the flourishing signature strikes the eye like a deacon cutting a caper as he goes out of church.

To Southey he writes, 19th August, 1825 (I. 321): "You'll know who this letter comes from by opening slap-dash upon the text, as in the good old times. I never could come into the custom of envelopes: 'tis a modern foppery: the Plinian correspondence gives no hint of such."

To Bernard Barton, 20th March, 1826 (I. 328): "You may know my letters by the paper and the folding. For the former, I live on scraps obtained in charity from an old friend, whose stationary is a permanent perquisite; for folding I shall do it neatly when I learn to tie my neckcloths. I surprise most of my friends by writing to them on ruled paper, as if I had not got past pot-hooks and hangers. . . . . When I write to a great man at the Court end, he opens with surprise upon a naked note, such as Whitechapel people interchange, with no sweet degrees of envelope. I never enclosed one bit of paper in another, nor understood the rationale of it."

To Miss Williams, April 2, 1830 (II. 233): "P.S. I am the worst folder-up of a letter in the world, except certain Hottentots in the land of Caffre, who never fold up their letters at all, writing very badly upon skins, etc."

All these humorous criticisms are verified by this collection of notes. They are written on all sizes and sorts of scraps of paper, generally undated, so that I have been obliged to rely upon the post-mark to determine the precise date, and that is often enough gone. Talfourd says of the letter Lamb wrote to Mr. Gilman after the funeral of Coleridge (I. 394): "Like most of Lamb's letters, it is undated." These little notes, also, are all folded and directed without envelopes. I am brought very near to him as I look at them. It is like passing him in the Strand, or seeing him look up to a friend from his desk at the India House, and hearing him say, with a smile and a stammer, "Good-morning!" For almost each one of them has some word, or expression, which gives the flavor of his genius.

Mr. Allsop's acquaintance with Lamb began apparently about the year 1819. Talfourd speaks of him as "one whom Lamb held in the highest esteem for himself, and for his devotion to Coleridge" (I. 402). In his "Recollections of Coleridge," Allsop says: "The first night I ever spent with Lamb was after a day with Coleridge, when we returned by the same stage; and from something I had said or done of an unusual kind, I was asked to pass the night with him and his sister. Thus commenced an intimacy which never knew an hour's interruption to the day of his death."

A few months before, Lamb had removed from No. 4 Inner Temple Lane, which, with the house he next occupied, was the scene of the famous Wednesday evenings, of which Talfourd has given so delightful a description—of the little suppers with which no feasts of famous men any where or at any time are to be compared, where Lamb, who was growing celebrated, and Coleridge sometimes, and Wordsworth, Hazlitt, Leigh Hunt, William Godwin, Charles Lloyd, Basil Montagu, George Dyer, Martin Burney, Kenney the dramatist, Liston, Miss Kelly, Charles Kemble, Baron Field, John Lamb, and Mary, all met together, and the splendors of Holland House do not obscure the picture.

From Temple Lane Lamb had gone to Russell Street, Covent Garden, "the corner house," says Talfourd, "delightfully situated between the two great theatres." "Here we are," says Mary Lamb, writing to Miss Wordsworth, "living at a brazier's shop, No. 20, in Russell Street, Covent Garden, a place all alive with noise and bustle." It was about this time, also, in the year 1820, that Lamb began the "Essays of Elia" in the London Magazine, in that society of wits and genius which makes that period of that Magazine so unique and brilliant in English literary history. He made now, also, the acquaintance of Barry Cornwall and Macready, so that these little notes cover the most famous period of his life.

The earliest date that I find is November, 1819.

Dear Sir—Many thanks for your offer. I have desired the youth to wait upon you, if you will give him leave, that he may give his own answer to your kind proposal of trying to find something for him. My sister begs you will accept her thanks with mine. We shall be at home at all times most happy to see you when you are in town. We are most-ly to be found in an Evening.

Your obliged C. LAMB.

Saturday, 29. Nov. 19.

Some kind friend had evidently told Allsop of Lamb's doctrine of presents, which he himself lays down in a letter to Wordsworth (I. 208): "There is something inexpressibly pleasant to me in these presents, be it fruit, or fowl, or brawn, or what-not. Books are a legitimate cause of acceptance. If presents be not the soul of friendship, undoubtedly they are the most spiritual part of the body of that intercourse. There is too much narrowness of thinking in this point. The punctilio of acceptance, methinks, is too confined and strait-laced. I could be content to receive money, or clothes, or a joint of meat from a friend. Why should he not send me a dinner as well as a dessert? I would taste him in the beasts of the field and through all creation."

Or shall we forget the very last Essay of Elia, in the Athenæum of the 30th November, 1834, "Thoughts on Presents of Game, etc." "But a hare roasted hard and brown, with gravy and melted butter!—old Mr. Chambers, the sensible clergyman in Warwickshire, whose son's acquaintance has made many hours happy in the life of Elia, used to allow a pound of Epping to every hare. Perhaps that was overdoing it?"

Who does not envy Mr. Thomas Allsop his sending hares and pheasants to such a recipient, and his getting these sparkling autographs in return:

Dear Sir—We are most sorry to have missed you twice. We are at home to-night, to-morrow & Thursday & should be happy to see you any of these nights. Thanks for the shining bird.

Yours truly, C. L.

Dear Sir—The hairs of our head are numbered, but those which emanate from your heart defy arithmetic. I would send longer thanks but your young man is blowing his fingers in the Passage.

Yours gratefully, C. L.

Dr Sir—Your hare arrived in excellent order Last night, and I hope will prove the precursor of yourself on Sunday.

Why you should think it necessary to appease us with so many pleasant presents, I know not.

More acknowledgements<sup>16</sup> when we meet, we dine at 8

Yours truly, C. LAMB.

And here are invitations more alluring than even those to the Empress Eugénie's balls, to Queen Victoria's drawing-rooms, or even to a state dinner at the White House:

My dear Sir—We shall hope to see you to-morrow evening to a rubber. Thank for your very kind letter, & intentions respecting a bird.

Yours very truly, C. LAMB.

Talfourd describes Lamb's introducing him to Wordsworth, two or three years before this. They were neighbors in the Temple. Talfourd was a youth of twenty, attending at the chambers of Chitty, the special pleader, which were on the next staircase to Lamb's. When Talfourd was made Sergeant, Lamb, in his raciest humor, refers to the Temple days: "Now can not I call him Serjeant?" What is there in a coif? Those canvas-sleeves protective from ink, when he was a law chit—a Chitty-ling (let the leathern-apron be apocryphal) do more 'specially plead to the Jury Court of old memory. The costume (will he agnize it?) was as of a desk-fellow, or Socius Plutei. Methought I spied a brother!" (II. 249.)

The second time Talfourd saw Lamb, "he came almost breathless into the office and proposed to give me what I should have chosen as the greatest of all possible honors and delights—an introduction to Wordsworth, who, I learned with a palpitating heart, was actually at the next door. I hurried out with my kind conductor, and a minute after was presented by Lamb to the person whom in all the world I venerated most, with this preface: 'Wordsworth, give me leave to introduce to you my only admirer.'"

Still 1820.

Dr Sir—We had arranged to be in country Saturday & Sunday, having made an engagm<sup>t</sup> to that effect. Pray let us see you on Thurs<sup>d</sup>. at Russell House.

With regrets & all proper feel<sup>20</sup>s,

Yours truly, C. L.

Dr Sir—You shall see us on Thursday, with M. B. if possible about 8. We shall have TEAED.

Yours truly, C. L.

M. B.'s direction is 26 James Streat Westminster. James not St James St.

The "M. B." of this note is Martin Burney, son of the Admiral who sailed round the world with Captain Cook, and nephew of the author of "Evelina." He was one of the oldest and most faithful of Lamb's friends. He writes to Barry Cornwall, in 1829: "M. B. is richly worth your knowing. He is on the top scale of my friendship ladder." (I. 351.) One evening, at a game of whist, when Burney was dealing, Lamb said to him, "Martin, if dirt was trumps, what hands you would hold!" But he dedicated to him his first volume of prose:

"Free from self-seeking, envy, low design,
I have not found a whiter soul than thine."

And when, in the month of May, 1847, the body of Mary Lamb was laid in the same grave where her brother's had been placed eleven years before, it was the life-long friend of both of them, the M. B. of this note, who "refused to be comforted."

In the year 1821-2 Lamb, who was overwhelmed by visitors (many of whom he loved too dearly to refuse either themselves or the consequences of their coming), and by the deaths of several friends, among the rest the father of M. B.—"There's Captain Burney gone! What fun has whist now?"—took lodgings at Dalston, near London, whither Talfourd tells us he retired whenever he wished for repose.

My dear Sir—If you can come next Sunday we shall be equally glad to see you, but do not trust to any of Martin's appointments, except on business, in future. He is notoriously faithless in that point, and we did wrong not to have warned you. Leg of Lamb, as before; hot at 4. And the heart of Lamb ever. Yours truly, C. L.

30 March, 21.

Dr Sir—Thanks for the Birds and your kindness. It was but yesterday I was contriving with Talf<sup>d</sup> to meet you  $\frac{1}{2}$  way at his chamber. But night don't do so well at present. I shall want to be home at Dalston by Eight.

I will pay an afternoon visit to you when you please. I dine at a chop-house at ONE always, but I can spend an hour with you after that.

Yours truly, C. L.
Would Saturd<sup>y</sup> serve?

Ecce Iterum.

Dr Sir—I fear I was obscure. I was plagiarily busy when those tempting birds came. I mean to say I could not come this evening, but any other, if I can know a day before, I can come for 2 or 3 afternoon hours, for  $\frac{1}{4}$  four to  $\frac{1}{2}$  past six. At present I can not command more furlough. I have nam'd Saturd. I will come, if you don't countermand. I shall have dined. I have been wanting not not to see you. C. L.

Dear Sir—I do not know whose fault it is we have not met so long. We are almost always out of town. You must come & beat up our quarters there, when we return from Cambridge. It is not in our power to accept your invitation. To-day we dine out; and set out for Cambridge on Saturday morning. Friday of course will be past in packing, &c., moreover we go from Dalston. We return from Cam. in 4 weeks, & will contrive an early meeting. Meantime believe us,
Sincerely yours, C. L. &c.

Thursday.

Dr Sir—I hear that you have called in Russell St. I can not say when I shall be in town. When I am, I must see you; I had hoped to have seen you at Dalston, but my Sister is taken ill, & I am afraid will not be able to see any of her friends for a long time. Believe me, yours truly, India House. C. LAMB.

"My sister is taken ill." In those few words how much tragedy lies hidden! What a life of patient heroism do they suggest, in comparison with which the career of Lamb's huge contemporary, Bonaparte, shrinks into the merest melodrama; while the misanthropic mouthings of Lord Byron become maudlin when we recall the sweet, life-long, heroic silence of Charles Lamb.

In the year 1796 Charles Lamb was twenty-one years old, and was living in lodgings with his father, who was sinking into dotage; his mother, whose limbs were paralyzed; and his sister Mary, whose needle worked with his pen to support the family. Their resources were a little annuity which Mr. Salt, an old Benchman, had given to his servant, the father of Charles Lamb; Charles's salary, as a clerk of three years' standing at the India House; and the board of an old maiden aunt, who lived with them. The young man was in love with a "fair-haired maid" near Islington, to whom he wrote simple, pathetic, pastoral sonnets. The beginning of the year he had passed in a mad-house, and he writes to his friend Coleridge: "It may convince you of my regards for you when I tell you my head ran on you in my madness, as much almost as on another person who, I am inclined to think, was the more immediate cause of my temporary frenzy." (II. 4.) During one of his lucid intervals he wrote a sonnet:

"Mary, to thee, my sister and my friend."

He wrote afterward: "I look back upon it at times with a gloomy kind of envy; for, while it lasted, I had many, many hours of pure happiness. Dream not, Coleridge, of having tasted all the grandeur and wildness of fancy till you have gone mad." (II. 21.)

On Thursday, the 22d of September, 1796, Mary Lamb, "worn down to a state of extreme nervous misery by attention to needle-work all day, and to her mother at night," broke into uncontrollable insanity, and seizing a knife from the table spread for dinner stabbed her mother to the heart. The coroner's jury brought in a verdict of "lunacy." Charles writes to Coleridge: "With me, 'the former things are passed away,' and I have something more to do than to feel. God Almighty have us well in His keeping." (II. 40.) Mary Lamb was placed in an asylum, but was soon restored to sanity. Her brother Charles instantly contrives how she may be freed from the necessity of living for her life at an asylum. "I know John will make speeches about it, but she shall not go into an hospital."

..... "If my father, an old maid-servant and I, can't live, and live comfortably, on £130 or £120 a year, we ought to burn by slow fires; and I almost would, that Mary might not go into an hospital." (II. 45.) "I very much fear she must not think of coming home in my father's lifetime." (II. 61.) His father was rapidly decaying. When Charles expostulated about playing cribbage with him, to the entire loss of his correspondence and other private duties, the old man said, "'If you won't play with me, you might as well not come home at all.' The argument was unanswerable, and I set to afresh." (I. 54.) At the same time a poor old aunt, who never recovered from the shock of "our evil day," comes to that melancholy home to die—and all the time the young man is getting ready a joint volume of verse with Coleridge and Lloyd.

In 1797 his father died; the aunt still lingered, and his sister was in confinement. There was a dreadful doubt whether she could be released at all—whether legal proceedings must not be instituted to place her for life at the disposition of the crown. "But Charles came to her deliverance: he satisfied all the parties who had power to oppose her release, by his solemn engagement that he would take her under his care for life; and he kept his word." ..... "For her sake, at the same time, he abandoned all thoughts of love and marriage; and with an income of scarcely more than £100 a year, derived from his clerkship, aided for a little while by the old aunt's small annuity, set out on the journey of life, at twenty-two years of age, cheerfully, with his beloved companion, endeared to him the more by her strange calamity, and a constant apprehension of a recurrence of the malady which had caused it." (II. 65.)

From this time he considered his sister Mary "perpetually on the brink of madness." "We can be nowhere private except in the midst of London." (II. 87.) To the end of both their lives she was constantly subject to these attacks. Any peculiar excitement occasioned them; and they came without apparent reason. "What sad large pieces it cuts out of life" (he writes, in 1809): "out of her life, who is getting rather old; and we may not have many years to live together." (II. 133.) Her illness lasted at this time sometimes as much as eight or nine weeks, with often "scarce a six months' interval." "It cuts sad great slices out of the time," he says again, in 1815; "the little time we shall have to live together." . . . . "But I won't talk of death. I will imagine us immortal, or forget that we are otherwise. By God's blessing, in a few weeks we may be making our meal together, or sitting in the front row of the pit at Drury Lane, or taking our evening walk past the theatres, to look at the outside of them, at least, if not to be tempted in. Then we forget we are assailable; we are strong for the time as rocks—"the wind is tempered to the shorn Lambs." (II. 158.)

His intimate friends knew of the great shadow that always lay upon their paths. It grew larger and larger as the years passed on. In May, 1833, he writes to Wordsworth: "Mary is ill again. Her illnesses encroach yearly. The last was three months, followed by two of depression most dreadful. I look back upon her earlier attacks with longing. Nice little durations of six weeks or so, followed by complete restoration—shocking as they were to me then." (II. 252.) When they went upon a little journey, "a strait waistcoat, carefully packed by Miss Lamb herself, was their constant companion." "On one occasion Mr. Charles Lloyd met them slowly pacing together a little foot-path in Hoxton fields, both weeping bitterly; and found, on joining them, that they were taking their solemn way to the accustomed asylum." (II. 341.) In the last year of their united lives they lived constantly together. "It is no new thing for me to be left to my sister. When she is not violent, her rambling chat is better to me than the sense and sanity of this world. Her heart is obscured, not buried: it breaks out occasionally; and one can discern a strong mind struggling with the billows that have gone over it." (II. 265.)

In "Bridget Elia" Charles Lamb describes his sister, who was a woman entirely worthy even this life-long devotion. She was his thoughtful friend, his most sympathetic and affectionate companion, and together with him wrote those charming books for children, "The Poetry for Children," "Tales from Shakespeare," and "Mrs. Leicester's School." The records of human affection have nothing more melancholy, more heroic, or more touching, than the story of Charles and Mary Lamb.

At this time (1822) Lamb drops the "Sir" in his address to Allsop:

Dear Allsop—We are going to Dalston on Wednesday. Will you come see the last of us to-morrow night, you and Mrs. Allsop?

Yours truly,

C. LAMB.

Monday Evenng.

Dear Allsop—Your pheasant is glittering, but your company will be more acceptable this Evening. Wordsworth is not with us, but the next things to him are.

C. LAMB.

Monday Evening.

In July, 1823, Lamb writes:

D. A.—I expect Proctor and Wainwright (Janus W.) this evening; will you come? I suppose it is but a comp<sup>t</sup>. to ask Mrs. Allsop; but it is none to say that we should be most glad to see her. Yours ever. How vexed I am at your Dalston expedit<sup>n</sup>.

Tuesday.

C. L.

The Proctor here is Barry Cornwall, whose acquaintance Lamb made in 1820. The Wainwright is Thomas Griffiths Wainwright, of whom Talfourd gives the following account: "He was then a young man, on the bright side of thirty, with a sort of undress military air, and the conversation of a smart, lively, clever, heartless, voluptuous coxcomb. It was whispered that he had been an officer in the dragoons; had spent more than one fortune; and he now condescended to take a part in periodical literature, with the careless grace of an amateur who felt himself above it. He was an artist also, sketched boldly and graphically; exhibited a port-folio of his own drawings of female beauty, in which the voluptuous trembled on the borders of the indelicate, and seized on the department of the Fine Arts." . . . . "He composed for the Magazine, under the signature of Janus Weathercock, articles of flashy assumption, in which disdainful notices of living artists were set off by fascinating references to the personal appearance, accomplishments, and luxurious appliances of the writer, ever the first hero of his essay. He created a new sensation in the sedate circle, not only by his braided surtouts, jeweled fingers, and various neck-handkerchiefs, but ostentatious contempt for every thing in the world but elegant enjoyment. Lamb, who delighted to find sympathy in dissimilitude, fancied that he really liked him." . . . . "We lost sight of him when the career of the London Magazine ended; and Lamb did not live to learn the sequel of his history."

That sequel is written in the calendar of crime. It is also vaguely hinted in Bulwer's preface to his novel of "Lucretia," the most revolting of all his stories. "I became acquainted with the histories of two criminals existing in our own age; so remarkable, whether from the extent and darkness of the guilt committed—whether from the glittering accomplishments and lively temper of the one, the profound knowledge and intellectual capacities of the other," etc. "The one" is Wainwright. His crime was compassing the death of persons, in whose life-insurance he was interested, by poison most insidiously and adroitly administered. The stories, also, that are told of his relation to women are monstrous and incredible. His whole career recalls the darkest days of license and murder of the ancien régime days of which the spirit is so finely touched in Browning's poem of "The Laboratory."

"Soon, at the King's, a mere lozenge to give,
And Pauline should have just thirty minutes to live:
But to light a pastille, and Elise, with her head,
And her breast, and her arms, and her hands, should drop dead."

So little suspicious was Lamb of the latent character of this man that, in writing to Bernard Barton, 2d September, 1823, he says: "The 'London' I fear falls off. . . . They have pulled down three (supports). Hazlitt, Proctor, and their best stay, kind, light-hearted Wainwright, their Janus."

In August, 1823, Lamb writes under date of August 9, but the note is post-marked September 9:

My dear A.—I am going to ask you to do me the greatest favor which a man can, do to another. I want to make my will, and to leave my property in trust for my sister. N.B. I am not therefore going to die.—Would it be unpleasant for you to be named for one? The other two I shall beg the same favor of are Talfourd and Proctor. If you feel reluctant, tell me, and it shan't abate one jot of my friendly feeling toward you. Yours ever,

C. LAMB.

E. I. House, 9 Aug., 23.

The reply must have been immediate, for the following is post-marked September 10, 1823:

My dear A.—Your kindness in accepting my request no words of mine can repay. It has made you overflow into some romance, which I should have check'd at another time. I hope it may be in the scheme of Providence that my sister may go first (if ever so little a precedence), myself next, and my good Ex<sup>rs</sup> survive to rememb<sup>r</sup> us with kindness many years. God bless you.

I will set Proctor about the will forthwith.

C. LAMB.

In the summer of 1823 Lamb found himself involved in his first and last literary difficulty. It arose from Southey's article upon the "Progress of Infidelity," in which he spoke of the Essays of Elia as wanting "only a sounder religious feeling to be as delightful as it is original." The hard feeling did not last long, although Lamb wrote Southey a long letter about it, and in August of this year he hired "a neat cottage at Islington," in which he was for the first time a householder.

"I have a cottage in Colebrook Row, Islington; a cottage, for it is detached; a white house, with six good rooms." (I. 271.) This was sacred ground to Lamb. In the neighborhood of Islington lived the "fair-haired maid" of his boyish love. "To me 'tis classical ground," he wrote to Coleridge in 1796. The following extract from the "Recollections," by George Daniel, in the London Literary Gazette, during the last year, will be pleasant reading to the lovers of Elia:

VOL. XX.—No. 115.—G

"He took much interest in the antiquities of 'Merrie Islington.' 'Queen Elizabeth's Walk' became his favorite promenade in summer time, for its historical associations, its seclusion, and its shade. He would watch the setting sun from the top of Old Canonbury Tower, and sit silently contemplating the 'spangled heavens' (for he was a disciple of Plato, the great Apostle of the beautiful!) until the cold night air warned him to retire. He was intimate with Goodman Symes, the then tenant of this venerable tower, and a brother antiquary in a small way, who took pleasure in entertaining him in the antique paneled chamber where Goldsmith wrote his 'Traveler,' and supped frugally on butter-milk, and in pointing to a small portrait of Shakespeare in a curiously carved gilt frame, which Lamb would look at longingly, and which has since become mine. He was never weary of toiling up and down the winding and narrow stairs of this suburban pile, and peeping into its quaint corners and cupboards, as if he expected to discover there some hitherto hidden clew to its mysterious origin! The ancient hostelrys were also visited, and he smoked his pipe, and quaffed his nut-brown ale at the Old Queen's Head from the festive tankard presented by one Master Cranch (a choice spirit!) to a former host, and in the Old Oak Parlor too, where, according to tradition, the gallant Raleigh received 'full souse' in his face the humming contents of a jolly Black Jack from an affrighted clown, who, seeing clouds of tobacco smoke curling from the Knight's nose and mouth, thought he was all on fire! Though now, as he called himself, 'a country gentleman,' he occasionally shared in the amusements of the town; he had formerly been a great sight-seer, and the ruling passion still followed him to his Islingtonian Tusculum."

September 6, 1823, he writes:

Dear Alsop—I am snugly seated at the cottage; Mary is well but weak, and comes home on Monday, she will soon be strong enough to see her friends here. In the mean time will you dine with me at  $\frac{1}{2}$  past four to-morrow? Ayrton and Mr. Burney are coming.

No answer is required but come if you can.

C. LAMB.

Saturday 6th Sep.

I call'd on you on Sunday. Resp<sup>cts</sup> to Mrs. A. & boy.

Mr. Ayrton was one of the frequent guests at the Wednesday evening parties. He was director of music at the Italian Opera, whither Lamb rarely went, and never with any satisfaction. It was to Ayrton that he wrote the amusing rhyming letter, applying for orders to see "Don Giovanni" for some friends.

"I go to the play

In a very economical sort of a way,

Rather to see

Than be seen:

Though I'm no ill sight

Neither,

By candle-light
And in some kinds of weather.
You might pit me
For height Against Kean;
But in a grand tragic-scene
I'm nothing;
It would create a kind of loathing
To see me act Hamlet;
There'd be many a damn let Fly
At my presumption,
If I should try,
Being a fellow of no gumption."

The following "letterets," as Lamb called such performances, have various dates in the autumn of 1823:

My dear Allsop—I thank you for thinking of my recreation. But I am best here, I feel I am. I have tried town lately, but came back worse. Here I must wait till my loneliness has its natural cure. Besides that, though I am not very sanguine, yet I live in hopes of better news from Fulham, and can not be out of the way. 'Tis ten weeks to-morrow.—I saw Mary a week since, she was in excellent bodily health, but otherwise far from well. But a week or so may give a turn. Love to Mrs. A. & children, and fair weather accomp'y you.
C. L.
Tuesday.

In the next one how fondly he links his initials with Mary's, whose heart was still "obscured!"

Dear A.—Your cheese is the best I ever tasted. Mary will tell you so hereafter. She is at home, but has disappointed me. She has gone back rather than improved. However she has sense enough to value the present, for she is greatly fond of Stilton. Yours is the delicatest, rain-bow-hued melting piece I ever flavored. Believe me. I took it the more kindly, following so great a kindness.

Depend upon't yours shall be one of the first houses we shall present ourselves at, when we have got our Bill of Health.

Being both yours and Mrs Allsop's truly,
C. L. & M. L.

D<sup>r</sup> Sir—Will Mrs. A. & you dine with us to-morrow at  $\frac{1}{2}$  past 3? Do not dine of troubling yourself to send (if you can not come) as we shall provide only a goose (which is in the House) and your not coming will make no difference in our arrangement.<sup>18</sup>
Your oblig'd,
C. LAMB.

Saturday, 4 Oct.

Dear Sir—Mary has got a cold, and the nights are dreadful; but at the first indication of Spring (alias the first dry weather in Nov<sup>r</sup> early) it is our intention to surprise you early some even<sup>g</sup>.

Believe me, most truly yours,
C. L.
The Cottage, Saturday night.

Mary regrets very much Mrs. Allsop's fruitless visit. It made her swear! She was gone to visit Miss Hutchins<sup>a</sup> whom she found out.

Dear Allsop—Our dinner hour on Sundays is 4, at which we shall be most happy to see Mrs. A. & yourself—I mean next Sunday; but I also mean any Sunday. Pray come. I am up to my very ears in business, but pray come.

Yours most sincerely,
C. L.

It was while Lamb was living at Colebrook Cottage that the adventure of his friend George Dyer, who tumbled into the New River that flowed through the garden, was so whimsically described in the Elia Essay "Amicus Redivivus." It was to Colebrook Cottage also, in this year, that Southey came to explain the misunderstanding between them. The cloud faded in a moment, and their affectionate intimacy, of already nearly twenty years, was never again disturbed. It was in this year that Lamb first knew Thomas Hood, Hone, and Ainsworth the novelist.

In 1824 he writes to Mrs. Allsop:

Dear Mrs. A.—Mary begs me to say how much she regrets we can not join you to Reigate—our reasons are—1st I have but one holyday namely Good Friday, and it is not pleasant to solicit for another, but that might have been got over. 2<sup>dly</sup> Manning is with us, soon to go away and we should not be easy in leaving him. 3<sup>dly</sup> Our school girl Emma comes to us for a few days on Thursday. 4<sup>thly</sup> and lastly, Wordsworth is returning home in about a week, and out of respect to them we should not like to absent ourselves just now. In summer I shall have a month, and if it shall suit, should like to go for a few days of it out with you both any where. In the mean time, with many acknowledgements etc. etc., I remain yours (both) truly,
C. LAMB.

Remember Sundays.

Manning was one of the oldest friends of the Lambs, "next to Coleridge the dearest of them," Talfourd says, "who in company seemed only a courteous gentleman, more disposed to listen than to talk." It was to Manning, at the antipodes, that Lamb wrote the delightful letter, full of humorous misstatements as to the changes that must occur in their common circle by the time the letter reaches him. "Our school girl Emma" was the daughter of Charles Isola of Cambridge, who had been one of the "esquire bedells" of the University. Her grandfather, Agostino Isola, had fled from Italy because of an English book found in his room. The old man had had Gray the poet, Pitt, and Wordsworth among his pupils in Italian; and his granddaughter had lost both her parents. So fond did Charles and Mary Lamb become of her that they finally adopted her as a daughter, and she lived with them until 1833, when she married Mr. Moxon the publisher.

On the 10th of February, 1825, Lamb was fifty years old, and on the 6th of April he writes to Coleridge from Colebrook Cottage, "I came home forever on Tuesday in last week" (I. 316). The date of the following to Allsop is May 29, 1825:

Dear A.—I am as mad as the devil, but I had engaged myself and Mary to accompany Mrs. Kenny to Kentish-town to dinner at a common friend's on Friday, before I knew of Mary's engaging you.

Can Mrs. A. & you exchange the day for Sunday, or what other?

In the summer Lamb and his sister made a long visit to Enfield, whence he writes to Allsop :

Dear Allsop—We are bent upon coming here to-morrow for a few weeks. Dispatch a porter to me this evening, or by nine to-morrow morn<sup>g</sup> to say how far it will interfere with your proposed coming down on Saturday. If the house will hold us, we can be together while you stay.

Yours, C. LAMB.
Enfield, Thursday, after a hot walk.

Apparently they occupied rooms which Allsop had already engaged for his own family.

Dear Allsop—It is too hot to write. Here we are, having turned you out of your beds, but willing to resign in your favor, or make any shifts with you. Our best Loves to Mrs. Allsop. From Mrs. Leishman's this warm Saturday.

Yours truly, C. LAMB.

This damn'd afternoon sun! Thanks for your note, which came in more than good time.

On the 19th August he writes to Southey :

"We are on a half visit to his (Coleridge's) friend, Allsop, at a Mrs. Leishman's, Enfield, but expect to be at Colebrook Cottage in a week or so."

Again to Allsop :

My dear Allsop—Mrs. Leishman gives us hopes of seeing you all on Sunday. We shall promise a bit of Beef or something on that day, so you need not market. We are very comfortable here. Our kindest rememb<sup>s</sup> to Mrs. Allsop and the chits. We lying in people go out on Saturday, Mrs. L. bids me say, and that you may come that evening and find beds, etc.

Yours truly, C. LAMB.
Thursday.

Dear A.—Mary is afraid lest the callico & Handkerch<sup>s</sup> have miscarried, which you were to send. Have you sent 'em?

Item a bill with 'em including the former silks, & bal<sup>ce</sup> struck in a Tradesman-like way.
Enfield. Yours truly, C. L.

Early in September he was back again in Islington.

My dear Allsop—We are exceedingly grieved for your loss. When your note came, my sister went to Pall Mall, to find you, and saw Mrs. L. and was a little comforted to find Mrs. A. had returned to Enfield before the distressful event. I am very feeble, can scarce move a pen; got home from Enfield on the Friday, and on Monday follow<sup>g</sup> was laid up with a most violent nervous fever second this summer, have had Leeches to my Temples, have not had nor can not get a night's sleep. So you will excuse more from

Islington, 9 Sept.

Our most kind rememb<sup>ces</sup> to poor Mrs. Allsop. A line to say how you both are will be most acceptable.

Under post-mark of September 24, 1825 :

My dear Allsop—Come not near this unfortunate roof yet a while. My disease is clearly but slowly going. Field is an excellent attendant. But Mary's anxieties have overturned her. She has her old Miss James with her, without whom I should not feel a support in the world. We keep in separate apartments, and must weather it. Let me know all of your healths. Kindest love to Mrs. Allsop.

C. LAMB.

Saturday.

Can you call at Mrs. Burney 26 James Street, and tell her, & that I can see no one here in this state. If Martin return; if well enough, I will meet him some where, don't let him come.

Dear Allsop—Your kindness pursues us every where. That 81.4.6 is a substantial proof. I think I never should have ask'd for it. Pray keep it, when you get it, till we see each other. I have plenty of current cash, thank you over and over for your offer.

We came down on Monday with Miss James. The 1st night I lay broad awake like an owl till 8 o'clock, then got a poor doze. Have had something like sleep and a forgetting last night. We go on tolerably in this deserted house. It is melancholy, but I could not have gone into a quite strange one.

Newspapers come to you here. Pray stop them. Shall I send what have come?

Give mine and Mary's kindest love to Mrs. Allsop, with every good wish to Elizabeth and Rob. This house is not what it was. May we all meet cheerfully some day soon.

Yours gratefully and sincerely, C. LAMB.

How long a letter have I written with my own hand!

Jane says she sent a cradle yesterday morning. She does for us very well.

Wednesday, Sep. 25.

(Oct. 5, 1825.)

Dear A.—Have rec'd your drafts. We will talk that over Sunday morning. I am strongish, but have not good nights, & can not settle my inside.

Farewell till Sunday.

I have no possible use for the 1st draft, so shall keep them as above.

Yours truly, C. L.

Wednesday.

I only trouble you now, because if the drafts had miscarried, any one might have cash'd 'em. Remember at home.

Ludlow is charming.

My dear Allsop—Thanks for the Birds. Your announcement puzzles me sadly as nothing came. I send you back a word in your letter, which I can positively make nothing and therefore return to you as useless. It means to refer to the birds, but gives me no information. They are at the fire, however.

My sister's illness is the most obstinate she ever had. It will not go away, and I am afraid Miss James will not be able to stay above a day or two longer. I am desperate to think of it sometimes. 'Tis eleven weeks!

The day is sad as my prospects.

With kindest love to Mrs. A and the children,
Yours, C. L.

No Atlas this week. Poor Hone's good boy Alfred has fractured his skull, another son is returned "dead" from the Navy office, & his Book is going to be given up, not having answered. What a world of troubles this is!

Dear Allsop—My injunctions about not calling here had solely reference to your being unwell etc. at home: I am most glad to see you on my own account. I dine at 3 on either Sunday. Come THEN, or earlier, or later only before dinner I generally walk. Your dining here will be quite convenient. I of course have a joint that day. I owe you for newspapers, Cobbets, pheasants, what not?

Your most obliged C. L.

P.S. I am so well (except Rheumatism, which forbids my being out on evens) that I forgot to mention my health in the above. Mary is very poorly yet. Love to Mrs. Allsop.

(Dec. 5, 1825.)

Dear A.—You will be glad to hear that we are at home to visitors; not too many or noisy. Some fine day shortly Mary will surprise Mrs. Allsop. The weather is not seasonable for formal engagements.

Yours most ever, C. LAMB.

Satrd.

Dear Allsop—Mary will take her chance of an early lunch or dinner with you on Thursday: she can't come on Wednesday. If I can, I will fetch her home, but I am near killed with Christmasing, and if incompetent, your kindness will excuse me. I can scarce set foot to ground for a cramp that took me last night.

Yours, C. LAMB.

Tuesday.

Dear Allsop—I acknowledge with thanks the receipt of a draft on Messrs. Wms for 81. 11. 3 which I haste to cash in the present alarming state of the money market. Hurst and Robinson gone! I have imagined a chorus of ill-used authors singing on the occasion:

What should we do when Booksellers break?

We should rejoice da Capo.

We regret exceedingly Mrs. Allsop's being unwell. Mary or both will come and see her soon. The frost is cruel and we have both colds. I take Pills again which battle with your wine & victory hovers doubtful. By the bye tho' not disinclined to presents, I remember our bargain to take a dozen at sale price and must demur. With once again thanks and best loves to Mrs. A.,

Turn over—Yours, C. LAMB.

Colebrook Cottage, Islington, 7 Jan. 25.

Jan'y 25. 1827.

My dear Allsop—I can not forbear thanking you for your very kind interference with Taylor, whom I do not expect to see in haste at Islington.

It is hardly weather to ask a dog up here, but I need hardly say how happy we shall be to see you. I can not be out of evenings till John Frost be routed. We came home from Newman St. the other night late, and I was cramped all night. Loves to Mrs. Allsop.

Yours truly, C. L.

In the summer of this year (1827), still pressed by visitors whom he could not well deny, Lamb removed to Enfield. He wrote to Bernard Barton, August 10, 1827: "I am (tho' you won't understand it) at Enfield Chase. We have been here near three months, and shall stay two more, if people will let us alone; but they persecute us from village to village. So don't direct to Islington again until further notice." (I. 335.) So to Mr. Patmore: "We are dawdling our time away very idly and pleasantly at a Mrs.

Leishman's Chase Enfield, where, if you come a-hunting, we can give you cold meat & a tankard. Her husband is a tailor, but that, you know, does not make her one. I knew a jailor (which rhymes), but his wife was a fine lady." (I. 339.) On the 4th December of this year (1827) he is still at Enfield, despairing over Mary. "But for long experience, I should fear her ever getting well." On the 20th he writes to Allsop:

My dear Allsop—I have writ to say to you that I hope to have a comfortable Xmas-day with Mary, and I can not bring myself to go from home at present. Your kind offer, and the kind consent of the young Lady to come, we feel as we should do; pray accept all of you our kindest thanks. At present I think a visitor (good & excellent as we remember her to be) might a little put us out of our way. Emma is with us, and our small house just holds us, without obliging Mary to sleep with Becky, &c.

We are going on extremely comfortably, & shall soon be in capacity of seeing our friends. Much weakness is left still. With thanks and old rememb<sup>r</sup>s, yours, C. L.

And on the 9th January, 1828:

Dear Allsop—I have been very poorly and nervous lately, but am recovering sleep, &c. I do not write or make engagements for particular days; but I need not say how pleasant your dropping in any Sunday morn<sup>g</sup> would be. Perhaps Jameson would accompany you. Pray beg him to keep an accurate record of the warning I sent by him to old Pan, for I dread lest he should at the 12 months' end deny the warning. The house is his daughter's, but we took it through him, and have paid the rent to his receipts for his daughter's. Consult J. if he thinks the warning sufficient. I am very nervous, or have been, about the house; lost my sleep, & expected to be ill; but slumbered gloriously last night golden slumbers. I shall not relapse. You fright me with your inserted slips in the most welcome Atlas. They begin to charge double for it, & call it two sheets. How can I confute them by opening it, when a note of yours might slip out, & we get in a hobble? When you write, write real letters. Mary's best love & mine to Mrs. A. Yours ever,

C. LAMB.

In 1828 he was still at Enfield, and writes on the 1st of May:

Dear A.—I am better. Mary quite well. We expected to see you before. I can't write long letters. So a friendly love to you all.

Enfield. Yours ever, C. L.

This sunshine is healing.

"The warning" of which Lamb speaks on the 9th of January took effect at the end of the twelve months. In 1829 he gave up Colebrook Cottage, and removed to "an odd-looking, gambogish-colored house, at Chase-side, Enfield. The situation was far from picturesque; for the opposite side of the road presented some middling tenements, ten dissenting chapels, and a public-house decorated with a swinging sign of a Rising Sun; but the neighboring field-works were pleasant, and the country, as he used to say, quite as good as Westmoreland." (I. 347.)

In January, 1829, Lamb was in a very genial vein. On the 29th he sends to Barry Cornwall the "Gipsy's Malison:"

"Suck, baby, suck; mother's love grows by giving."

And on the day previous, January 28, writes the following humorous note to Allsop:

Dear Allsop—Old Star is setting. Take him & cut him into Little Stars. Nevertheless the extinction of the greater light is not by the lesser light (Stella, or Mrs. Star) apprehended so nigh, but that she will be thankful if you can let young Scintillation (Master Star) twinkle down by the coach on Sunday, to catch the last glimmer of the decaying parental light. No news is good news; so we conclude Mrs. A. and little a are doing well. Our kindest loves,
C. L.

(with an extravagant flourish.)

Here is a glimpse of the tenderest beauty of Charles Lamb's character:

At midsummer or soon after (I will let you know the previous day), I will take a day with you in the purlieus of my old haunts. No offense has been taken, any more than meant. My house is full at present, but empty of its chief pride. She is dead to me for many months. But when I see you, then I will say, Come & see me. With undiminished friendship to you both, at the end of a line, and lamely come in with "to his friends" at beginning of another. Love is quicker, & fear from Love, than the transition ocular from Line to Line.

Your faithful but queer C. L.

How you frightened me. Never write again "Cole-ridge is dead"

In the autumn of 1829, to relieve his sister of the cares of housekeeping, Lamb took rooms in the house of an old couple near the cottage, and there they boarded. In September he writes:

Dear Allsop—I will find out your Bijoux some day. At present I am sorry to say we have neither of us very good spirits, & I can not look to any pleasant Expeditions.

You speak of your trial as a known thing, but I am quite in the dark about it, but wish you a safe issue most heartily.

Our loves to Mrs. Allsop & children. C. L.

Early in July, 1833, Lamb writes the last note of this collection. It alludes to the marriage of Miss Isola with Mr. Moxon, which took place on the 30th of that month. On the 24th he sends a beautiful, humorous, tender letter to Moxon about a watch he had given Miss Isola. The heart of the man, who never had a child, overflowed with exquisite feeling for the happiness of the young bride. In view of this marriage Lamb and his sister removed to Edmonton, where, in the autumn of the next year, he died:

My dear Allsop—I think it will be impossible for us to come to Highgate in the time you propose. We have friends coming to-morrow, who may stay the week, & we are in a bustle about Emma's leaving us—so we will put off the hope of seeing Mrs. Allsop till we come to Town, after Emma's going, which is in a fortnight & a half, when we mean to spend a Time in Town, but shall be happy to see you on Sunday or any day.

In haste, hope our little Porter does.

Yours ever, C. L.

This is the last of the little notes. They are none of them remarkable, except that three or four are very characteristic, and that they all have the kind touch of his genius. They are sparkles that sail and glitter along that deep stream of tender human sympathy and humor which Talfourd's book shows Lamb's Life to have been. They open brief glimpses, too, into that realm of heroic silence which was so delicately and thoughtfully treated by Talfourd in the first book of the Life and Letters, that it was not suspected by the world. There is nothing to be added to the majesty and dignity of that life, and there is nothing that can be taken away. Lamb was not a saint. He drank sometimes to excess. He, also, smoked tobacco. But if ever a good, great man walked the earth—good and great in the profoundest and noblest sense—full of that simple human charity and utter renunciation of self which is the fulfilling of the highest law and the holiest instinct, it was that man with a face of "quivering sweetness," "nervous, tremulous, . . . so slight of frame that he looked only fit for the most placid fortune," but who conquered poverty and hereditary madness, and won an imperishable name in English literature, and a sacred place in every generous heart—all in silence, and with a smile.

"VENI, VIDI, VICI."

I.

"MISS MAD'LAINE! you in dar?"

"Yes, Lucinda. What do you want now?"

"What 'o I want? Oh, laws, honey, wants a deal more'n you're gwine to gimme! It's mistis what's arter you dis time—not Cindy."

"Well, and what does she want?" asked the young lady, with a little gesture of impatience. "Why can't you ever give a message at once without so many roundabout speeches?"

"Laws, Miss Mad'laine, I nebber said nothin' 'bout no roundabouts! I was jest answerin' your queshtuns, an' whar I was brung up, dey al'ays tole me dat was manners."

"They told you a great deal too much where you were brought up. What does my aunt want with me, I say?"

"Brest if I know, Miss Mad'laine; Cindy nebber axed nor 'quired to knew, so de consequence is, she don't knew. Mistis she says to dis chile, 'Lucindy, you go up stairs an' see ef Miss Mad'laine's in her room, an' ef she is, ax her to come down to me!' Dat's ebbry word I heard, bress your heart, honey!"

"Quite enough for you to hear, too; and you might as well have told it in the first place. Go back, now, and say I am coming," returned Miss Madelaine, laughing in spite of herself at the odd little figure that stood in the door-way, bobbing mock courtesies with its short cotton gown, wiggling its woolly black head, twinkling its saucy black eyes, and looking altogether more like a monkey than a child. Lucindy was a privileged character, and she knew it very well. She bobbed another pert courtesy, then turned a somerset, not exactly in the door-way, but in full view outside; and this done, scuttled down stairs in a sort of leap-frog fashion peculiarly her own.

Madeline Hayward prepared in a more leisurely way to obey her aunt's summons. She knew, if Lucinda did not, what was wanted of her; and, resolute and high-spirited as the young lady was, she could not help some inward trepidations as she thought of the interview before her. Her hands had been busy with some bit of fancy-work or embroidery: she laid it down slowly, left the room with half-reluctant steps, and glided down the broad oaken stairway with far less alacrity than was usual for her light, swift feet. There was a long matted hall to pass; at the end of it was a dark mahogany door, the entrance, as Madeline knew, to her aunt's private sitting-room.

She drew up her slight figure proudly as she reached this door, and her girlish features settled into a determined, almost defiant expression as she turned the handle and entered. It was a small room, quaintly fitted up with the oldest-fashioned furniture, and Madame Ravenel herself, sitting erect in her high-backed, carved, and embroidered chair, looked admirably in keeping with her surroundings. She was a stately old lady, not far from seventy, if one might judge from the silvery hair drawn with such smooth precision over her temples, and the numerous lines and seams which had printed themselves upon her face. In spite of them, however, the face was fair and beautiful still in its old age; the brow refined and intellectual, the eyes blue and bright and keen yet; the mouth dignified and tender, but capable, too, of such sunny, brilliant smiles as one does not often see lighting up faces which have fronted the battle of life for seventy years.

Lips and eyes brightened with one of these rare smiles as her niece entered the room. "Well, dear," she said, half inquiringly.

"Lucinda told me you wanted me," Madeline answered, a little curtly.

"Oh! Lucinda never can deliver a message properly. I told her to say that when you came down I wished to see you. But it was not necessary to come for that special purpose."

"I was doing nothing of consequence; I could come as well as not," Madeline returned.

"Very well, sit down, then," said Madame Ravenel, graciously. "Since you are here, you can help me wind this silk, and we can continue the conversation which we began three days ago."

Madeline held out her hands for the skein of silk, and made no answer. Madame Ravenel adjusted it carefully upon the slender white wrists, took an ivory winder from the carved work-stand beside her, and continued placidly:

"I allude, of course, to Dr. Gilchrist's letter, Madeline. You did not understand it fairly when I first read it to you, and you were resentful and indignant without reason. I told you then, if you remember, that I would not mention the subject again until you had had time to think of the whole matter calmly and sensibly; after which I felt sure you would feel very differently about it. I hope now that I shall not find myself mistaken;" and the keen blue eyes looked searchingly into the young girl's face.

But she was not abashed by them: "I am afraid you will, Aunt Ravenel," she answered, steadily. "I have seen no reason yet to change my first opinion of that letter, and still consider that its proposals are extremely ridiculous, if not actually insulting."

"In what respect?" asked Madame Ravenel, with a slightly sarcastic smile. "I fail to see, but I am not unwilling to be enlightened by your superior wisdom, Madeline."

"It is not a question of wisdom, Aunt Ravenel," exclaimed Madeline, impetuously. "It is a question of delicacy, of common respect for a woman's most sacred feelings. Dr. Gilchrist wants to make a piece of merchandise of me—another of his son; we are mere instruments to effect his great final object, that of uniting the two estates, and causing his name to be published as that of the largest landed proprietor in Carolina! Whatever he may profess, that is all he cares for. It makes no difference to him that I have never even seen his son—that we may be totally unfitted for each other—that I might possibly take a different view of the marriage from that which he and his son (who seems to be a most compliant son, worthy of such a high-minded father!) take of it. Oh, it is all the same to him, but I assure you once more, Aunt Ravenel, that it is not the same to me."

Her cheek was red, her eyes full of fire as she stopped; but Madame Ravenel remained as cool as before.

"My dear, you said very nearly the same things to me last Friday," she replied. "I thought them more excusable then, because you had been taken by surprise, and in your usual hasty way had jumped to a wrong conclusion. But now, when you have had time to think of the plan, you certainly ought to be able to say something less silly."

"I am willing to be enlightened now, Aunt Ravenel," Madeline said, proudly, "by your superior wisdom. I do not see the silliness; for the facts of the case are exactly as I stated them. Dr. Gilchrist, for the sake of making Hazelhurst and Gilchrist Park one great estate, wishes me to marry his son, whom I have never seen—who has never seen me. His son has dutifully consented to be disposed of according to his father's arrangement; and I am expected to submit as meekly, and take the husband provided for me whether I like him or not. If it is silly to object in such a case, then I am silly—most decidedly and hopelessly—for I never shall consent to it."

"You are not required or expected to consent to it, my dear, until you have proved whether you can like your proposed husband," Madame Ravenel answered, somewhat in the tone of one reasoning with an obstinate child whom one was willing to humor for a while. "That was understood from the beginning, only you will not choose to see it."

"It is not so easy to see it," Madelaine retorted. "Every thing seems to have been settled between Dr. Gilchrist and yourself, even to the wedding-day, long ago; which was rather premature, if my acquiescence was not expected as a matter of course."

A tinge of color came into Madame Ravenel's cheek, and a flash of impatience leaped out from her eyes; but she controlled herself still, saying, pleasantly,

"It is no matter what we have settled, Madelaine. Dr. Gilchrist and I are old friends; this is a wish we have had in common for a long time, and it is not unnatural that we should make plots and plans about it. You must give us credit, however, for being perfectly open in them all; and believe me when I assure you that no one has desired to force the marriage upon you against your own will. It remains, after all said and done, for Sidney Gilchrist and yourself to come to your own conclusions. If you like each other, well; if not, there is an end to the whole matter."

"Then the whole matter is ended now," said the young lady, abruptly. "I shall never like Mr. Sidney Gilchrist, so I hope you will let me hear no more about him. I am sick of his name!" she added, passionately, rising up from her seat as the last thread of silk slipped off from her hands.

Madame Ravenel finished winding it, secured it carefully upon the ivory star, and laid this in its proper corner of the work-stand before she replied to the ungracious speech. Then she looked up with a smile—half mirthful, half sarcastic—lurking about her mouth: "It is you who are premature now, my dear. You reject Mr. Gilchrist before he has offered himself to you; and leave out of consideration the possibility that he may be as little anxious for the union as yourself when he comes to see and know you. It is not really necessary for you to make such vehement assertions, and assume so decided a position—yet."

She could not resist the temptation to give her niece this quiet cut; and it must be confessed that Madelaine deserved it. But her aunt did not count upon the effect it would produce. The blood overflowed the girl's face for a moment; then it flowed back again, and left her white and determined.

"I am much obliged to you, Aunt Ravenel," she said, calmly; "and I beg Mr. Gilchrist's pardon for rejecting him prematurely. I shall not be generous enough, however, to give him any opportunity to retaliate."

"What do you mean?" exclaimed Madame Ravenel, wondering, and somewhat apprehensive; for the calm voice and glittering eyes were signs of a deeper anger than she had ever seen in the girl before.

"Simply that, if Mr. Gilchrist has any idea of visiting Hazelhurst with a view to make my acquaintance, he may save himself the trouble. I shall not see him when he comes."

And leaving her aunt too utterly astonished to be able to make any reply, Madelaine Hayward passed swiftly out of the room, crossed the matted hall, and mounted the stairs once more to her own chamber. There she shut the door and locked it, then sat down in the little chair she had left, crossed her hands upon a table before her, laid her head upon it, and cried passionately. But only for a minute. The proud head sprang up soon, and the tears were dashed away with resolute scorn.

"That's enough!" she said, bitterly. "I shall not waste any more tears upon her petty taunt; only revenge myself for it! She shall see that I am not one to be insulted with impunity; they shall all see that I am not a puppet to be pulled with a string, nor yet a child to be coaxed or frightened into their will. He may consent to be his father's tool, and pay his court according to his father's orders—the coward! but he will not find me so compliant. Let him come, and I will show him how I despise him—weak, tame-spirited, mercenary creature that he is!"

And Miss Hayward's red lips curled, and her dark eyes flashed with the loftiest scorn as she reached this climax of contempt. She certainly looked very prettily heroic; but it must be confessed that it was a waste of heroism, for her epithets were as unjust as her indignation was uncalled-for.

In this world, however, nothing and every thing are real: whatever we fancy is fact for the time being; and many a light straw of imaginary grievance becomes a camel's load of actual trouble by merely believing that it is so already.

And so with our heroine: fresh from boarding-school, and romantic accordingly; proud, sensitive, self-willed, utterly unsubdued by any experience of sorrow or disappointment, she chose now to fancy herself the victim of a terrible indignity—an intolerable wrong—which must be resented and resisted with all her might. And unreasonable as the fancy was, it affected her as really as if it had been an earnest truth.

Late in the afternoon of the same day a light curriole with a span of handsome grays rolled swiftly up the long chestnut avenue in front of Madame Ravenel's mansion. Madelaine had seen its approach from the window of her room, which she had not left since morning, and a sudden suspicion made her linger there and watch for the appearance of its occupant. It was not lessened when she saw a tall, gentlemanly figure spring out and bound up the steps of the portico; and it was doubly confirmed when her quick ears caught the rustle of her aunt's silken dress in the hall, and heard her eager welcome—

"My dear Sidney! How glad I am to see you!"

It was not like Madame Ravenel, hospitable and courteous as she ever was, to hasten out so cagerly to meet a guest, even before he had crossed the threshold. That in itself was enough for the young girl's quick intelligence, even if the name had not been spoken. So, Sidney Gilchrist had actually come; and now her resolve was to be put to its proof!

She had not expected it so soon, and her courage wavered for a moment at the thought of the coming contest. Her aunt would be sure to send for her, and what possible excuse could she make for not going down? Excuse, indeed! The word which she had unconsciously used restored her courage, by again arousing her indignation.

"I shall make no excuse," she said, proudly, to herself. "I don't care how rude he thinks me. I mean to insult him, and the sooner he feels it the better."

It was a hard, unlovely face—in spite of all its beauty of form and color—that was reflected just then in the mirror hanging opposite Madelaine's chair. An expression of bitter, unwomanly pride, mingled with another less easy to define. Only one able to read the hidden workings of the heart below would have seen that it was a secret, unacknowledged consciousness of wrong—an inward warning that she was persisting in a purpose which must some day be repented of—a faint, ineffectual struggle between the best and worst impulses of her nature.

She glanced up suddenly and saw the picture in the mirror, and with an impatient expression turned her back to it, her face to the door. She expected a message momentarily, and waited for it with a sort of feverish restlessness which she was quite unable to control. But an hour passed before it came, and the restlessness changed to wonder, and then to a strange feeling of pique and vexation. They were not so very anxious for her company after all! So much the better, then. She would be at least as tardy in bestowing it upon them as they were in seeking it!

There was a shuffle and scramble outside the door at last—sure signal of Lucinda's approach—and presently the woolly head and saucy eyes made themselves apparent.

"Miss Mad'laine! 's mos' supper-time, an' mistis she said I wor to ax you to cum down to de parlor 'fore de bell rings. Da's a young gemman in dar wid her—werry nice young gemman, Miss Mad'laine," Cindy added, thinking to interest her hearer. To her surprise, "Miss Mad'laine" answered, coolly,

"Tell your mistress that she must excuse me. I do not wish any supper, and shall not come down at all to-night."

"Oh laws! Miss Mad'laine—de young gemman!" began Lucinda, in eager remonstrance; but an imperious "Go down stairs; not another word!" made the woolly head pop back quickly, for the little negro, with all her pertness, knew well enough when her young mistress was in earnest. She scampered off to give the message, chuckling to herself,

"Wha's the matter now, I wonder! Miss Mad'laine's so high an' mighty. Spec she's awful mad wid somebody. Glad it ain't dis chile—ha! ha! ha!"

No more messages came for Madelaine that evening. Neither did Mr. Gilchrist go away. She knew that, for she could have seen his carriage, if it had been brought up, from her seat in the front window, which she never left all through the long summer evening. The rosy twilight tints in the sky melted away into shadowy hues of gray and pearl; the silver horn of the new moon rose slowly above the pines; the long shadows of the trees upon the sward grew more darkly defined in its pallid light; the vines about the window shook and swayed in the cool night-breeze, and cast delicate leaf-traceries upon the chamber floor, fantastic, quivering shadows over Madelaine's unquiet face. But she did not see or heed any thing around her. Her mind was in a whirl of wild thoughts, and reckless resolves, and passionate, unreasoning anger. The whole day had been full of bitterness, none the less bitter because almost entirely of her own making and imagining; and she cried herself to sleep when at last she went to bed, in the late, dark night, believing honestly that she was persecuted and insulted, and had as good right to be miserable as any heroine of them all!

She woke up next morning, after a night of restless dreams, not at all shaken in her convictions, but rather impatient for her breakfast, and somewhat dismayed at the prospect of being a prisoner in her room another day; for she had a presentiment that Mr. Gilchrist did not intend to leave immediately. A presentiment which was confirmed by the servant who brought her breakfast in obedience to her orders, and who informed her gratuitously that Mr. Gilchrist was to stay a week.

"He thinks he will compel surrender by the length of his siege," thought Madelaine, grandly, as she sipped her coffee and buttered her muffins; "but he will discover that 'surrender' is a word unknown in this fortress!"

Nevertheless it was dull work sitting in her room all the morning, with nothing that she cared to do, and not even a new book for company. She had been accustomed to spend a part of the morning always in active, out-of-door exercise, and she found herself more bored by this voluntary confinement than she could have believed possible. Nobody came near her, not even pert little Cindy; and as the hours dragged slowly on she grew more and more chafed and indignant, and more and more in temper for the warm remonstrance which Madame Ravenel—herself thoroughly provoked and impatient—was preparing for her.

It was near noon before she had an opportunity to administer it, for she was too courteous a hostess to leave her guest quite alone in so early a stage of his visit, and Mr. Gilchrist seemed inclined to linger in the drawing-room. He ordered his horse, finally, and went off for a ride; and Madame Ravenel repaired to her private sitting-room immediately, and sent for her niece to come to her. Madelaine obeyed the summons with alacrity. She had seen the horseman cantering down the avenue, and knew that she was safe from surprises, even if such little traps had been in her aunt's line, which they were not. She opened the low mahogany door and met the old lady, who wore her stateliest look, with an undaunted front. The clouded brow and luminous eyes were signs of war, and Madelaine was prepared for war.

"What is the meaning of this conduct, Miss Hayward?" began Madame Ravenel, too incensed for preliminaries. "What excuse have you for insulting a guest in my house, and me through him, in this open manner? Have the goodness to explain."

"Certainly, madame; it is easily explained," replied the young lady, with composure. "Mr. Gilchrist's presence is disagreeable to me, therefore I avoid it by the only method in my power."

"And why, pray, is it disagreeable to you?" asked Madame Ravenel, hotly.

"You know best," Madelaine answered, coolly. Her aunt's anger gave her an advantage which she was not slow to improve. "I told you yesterday, before he came, that I would not see Mr. Gilchrist, and you know whether I had not sufficient reason for my determination."

"It is a determination, then, and you mean to persist in it?"

"Certainly; I mean nothing less."

"You will not dare to do it!" exclaimed Madame Ravenel, passionately. "Sidney Gilchrist is here for a week's visit, and other company will be invited whom you dare not refuse to see. If you have neither fear nor regard for me, you will have some regard for your reputation in the county."

"On the contrary, I am perfectly indifferent to whatever may be said on this subject. The opinions or remarks of the whole county would have no effect to make me change my purpose. If you wish to have the matter publicly discussed, I have no objection. I will be as polite to the expected company as I can be—in my own room."

She said this as calmly as if she were truly as unconcerned as she professed herself; but in secret she trembled for fear lest her aunt should fulfill her threat, and invite guests to whom she could not deny herself without creating public scandal. She had a womanly dread of such exposures, and yet her obstinacy was such that she would have braved any thing rather than yield now. Her aunt's reply reassured her, however:

"I have no such wish, as you know too well, disobedient child!" she exclaimed, angrily. "Your mad folly and obstinacy would be equal to that, or any thing else, doubtless, but I do not choose to have my household affairs the theme for idle talk. You can return to your room, since you find it so pleasant, but take this assurance with you—that unless you make up your mind to appear in the drawing-room this evening, you may prepare yourself to go back to school before the week is over. A young lady"—and Madame Ravenel emphasized the phrase scornfully—"who is ignorant of the first principle of politeness, courtesy to a guest in her own home, needs schools and schoolmasters to mould her manners. You can go!"

A haughty motion of her hand toward the door silenced reply, even if the young girl had been inclined to make any, and Madelaine went out of the room feeling somewhat crest-fallen and not quite so heroic as when she entered. She knew her aunt too well to doubt that she would fulfill her threat if obedience were still refused; and the idea of being sent back to school like a child in disgrace after she had bloomed in "society" for three months, and considered herself free forever from such petty trammels, was mortifying enough, certainly. The humiliation was only second to that of owning herself conquered, and consenting to see, and let herself be seen, by her odious suitor.

She could not shut herself again in the narrow limits of her room with this new excitement in her mind. Mr. Gilchrist would not be likely to cross her path in the course of his ride, and in her restlessness she longed to be out of doors. Her garden hat hung in the hall: she tied it on hastily, and ran down through the shrubbery to a corn-field that skirted the lower edge of the lawn. There was a path through this which made a short cut to the pine-woods, and the tall corn screened her from observation. She was soon treading the smooth, brown woodland carpet, and wandering undisturbed in the shady solitude of the grand old trees. The summer wind whispered through the swaying boughs, and the pine leaves answered with the same soft, mournful song which they have sung ever of old, even as the sea-waves surge to the same sad, wild harmony forever and forever. Birds twittered and sang, waking blither melodies, and wild-flowers, fragile and brilliant, brightened the green moss-beds, or waved over the brown, translucent waters of a little winding stream beside which Madelaine walked heedlessly, with little thought for bird or flower or rippling brook. She had quick senses usually for all forms of woodland beauty, but they were overpowered to-day by a tumult of jarring thoughts, which neither the murmur of the pines nor the sound of "falling waters," which, as the proverb saith, "make the heart glad," could avail to soothe. The longer she dwelt upon her brief interview with her aunt, the more irritated and indignant she grew; and her contempt for Mr. Gilchrist rapidly changed into a passionate hatred, now that he was the means of subjecting her to an alternative so galling to her proud and sensitive spirit. The picture that her fancy drew of her new school life was intolerable: all her old class-mates and dear especial friends would be gone, of course, and the younger pupils, upon whom she had looked down condescendingly before, might wonder and sneer and laugh at her now! The story would leak out in some distorted or ridiculous form; she would be whispered about, perhaps gravely remonstrated with by her teachers, perhaps by her aunt's orders placed under some new and mortifying restraint by way of punishment! A thousand wild impulses chased themselves through her mind as one and another exaggerated image presented itself to her: she would see Mr. Gilchrist—yes, truly! but it would only be to tell him to his face how she hated and scorned him, and would rather go into a convent than ever, ever marry him; and she would go away, too, but not to school; no, indeed! she would be no longer a dependent upon her cruel aunt's bounty and protection; she would go out into the world alone and work, or die. Oh! they would be sorry then, but it would be too late!

All her wild plans and fancies ended at last in a burst of stormy tears—the only outlet for a woman's passion. She sobbed and cried, in reckless abandonment, and buried her face in the green moss with a feeling of despair, ludicrous enough when its utter unreasonableness is considered, but really sincere and heart-felt in her morbid state of mind.

The place where she was lying was a little sheltered nook, looking only like a clump of trees and undergrowth from the broad path which ran close by, but proving a perfect little bower when one drew near enough for investigation. It was one of Madelaine's favorite retreats, and she had taken a world of pains to make it even more beautiful than nature had done; carrying away all unsightly dead leaves and twigs from the soft mossy carpet, transplanting the loveliest wild flowers she could find in the woods, and training the luxuriant vines that wreathed among the trees so as to make a perfect screen of foliage for the more entire seclusion of the spot. She had dreamed away hours and days here, listening to the plash and ripple of the merry brook at her feet, and weaving delicious romances—fairy webs, full of love and passion and adventure, beautiful, shadowy, impossible—such as thousands like her love to imagine, and none ever realize. The little bower was haunted with such visions, and every leaf might have told a separate story. To-day they might have rustled together in sympathetic wonder at a revelation so strange and new as this wild grief of the fair young dreamer. Certain it is they had never seen the like before; and perhaps it was their soft, pitiful sighing at the sight, together with the plaintive murmur of the water, which to-day had a melancholy fall, as if it, too, sympathized with her sorrows, that soothed Madelaine into a temporary forgetfulness of them. Whatever was the cause, she certainly fell asleep, like a child, in the midst of her sobbing, and lay there, with her fair cheek pressing the cool green moss, her dark hair picturesquely disheveled and clustering in soft rings about her face, her white hands clasped despairingly—as pretty a picture of the Sleeping Beauty as Mr. Sidney Gilchrist ever had seen.

Perhaps it was very rude, extremely uncourteous, and highly improper in him—we don't pretend to excuse his conduct any more than to express our belief that any other man would have done the same thing. Mr. Sidney Gilchrist peeped through those very vines that poor Madelaine had twisted and twined so carefully; he knelt upon the ground for the sake of more convenient observation, and with cunning fingers parted the thick leaves until he was able to obtain a full view of the fair, unconscious face before him. A mere accident had revealed her to him. A ribbon, dropped from her dress, lay in the wood-path as he rode slowly along, and by one of those sudden intuitions which come to all of us he divined that it was hers, and that she was somewhere near him.

I suppose he ought to have turned his horse's head in an opposite direction immediately; but I know that he did not do any such thing. He dismounted at once, tied the "red-roan steed of steeds" to a pine-tree, and left him to champ the bit at his leisure, while he departed on an exploring expedition. What malicious fairy led his feet to the very spot I can not tell; but led they were without doubt, and Madelaine's fate was sealed from that hour.

"Veni, vidi," murmured Sidney Gilchrist, as he walked noiselessly away from the bower, after a last, lingering look at the sweet sleeping face which it inclosed. "Come what may, I will complete that sentence before this year is dead!"

It was almost sunset when Madelaine awoke. Deep shadows lay all around her, with only here and there strange red streaks glowing upon the tree-trunks, or lying long and level in the open spaces beyond. She sprang up, bewildered and half-frightened, to find herself in this dusky gloom, and hurried homeward as fast as possible. The most romantic young ladies, I have observed, have as little fancy for solitary places, in the dark, as the least; and Madelaine was no exception to the rule. She was very glad to escape from the deepening shadows, where every one of those sombre pines seemed stretching out ghastly giant arms to impede her progress, and come out upon inhabited ground once more. The sun was quite down when she reached the corn-field; a soft, rosy twilight was stretching its sweet veil over the sky, and the evening was so still that she could hear every sound from the neighborhood of the house as she made her way through the tall, tasseled grain.

But she heard only the lowing of the cattle, and the clear, loud whistle of the negro boy as he drove them home from the pasture; only far-away strains of a camp-meeting hymn sung by old Aunt Cressy, milking the cows; and distant shouts from Cindy and Sam, penning the geese and turkeys. There was nothing in any thing she saw or heard to excite suspicion or reveal to her what had happened in the woods; no bird whispered the secret in her ear, and the breeze told no tales of Mr. Gilchrist's audacious invasion of her privacy, and still more audacious resolution concerning her. So, happily unconscious, she kept on through the corn-field, reached the hedge which divided it from the lawn, and having satisfied herself that neither her aunt nor her visitor were in sight, hurried swiftly to the house. The door of the huge fire-lighted kitchen stood wide open, as usual, and offered a safe entrance. She darted through it unseen, glided up a back stairway, and was soon secure from observation in her own chamber.

She was rather a forlorn-looking figure, however, by the time she got there; dress and hair were in unpicturesque disorder, and she herself chilled, wearied, and utterly miserable in body and mind. She could hardly have summoned physical strength to make a toilet and go down into the drawing-room, even if she had been inclined to obey her aunt's will; so, not being at all inclined that way, she only enveloped herself in a loose wrapper, and lay down upon a sofa to entertain herself with the old bitter meditations—made more bitter still by physical exhaustion and discomfort. A knock at the door interrupted them, and in answer to Madelaine's impatient "Come in!" Madame Ravenel made her appearance. Madelaine could not keep her reclining position before her aunt; but she raised herself with a jerk almost as disrespectful, and waited irritably for her to speak.

"You refuse to come down this evening?" said Madame Ravenel, in a tone of interrogation.

"You can judge for yourself," was the flip-pant, almost impertinent answer.

"I do," Madame Ravenel returned, quietly, though her delicate cheek reddened even in the twilight. "But have you considered the alternative? You know I do not pass my word lightly."

"Neither do I," exclaimed Madelaine, angrily. "I shall keep mine—every letter of it; and you may do the same as soon as you please."

"You little know what you are trifling with," said Madame Ravenel, still quietly, almost sadly. "I can bear with this perverseness, though I might claim a right to something different from you; I can wait patiently, in hope that time will open your eyes—but will others? Is it wise to choose pity and contempt when you might have esteem and affection—to throw away happiness, and accept discontent and regret (as you surely will hereafter, whatever you may think now)—all for the sake of a pride so silly that a child should be ashamed of it? I warn you, Madelaine, I even entreat you, not for my sake, but for your own, my child."

Her last words were earnest even to tenderness, but Madelaine was in no mood to profit by them. At another time, when she was less irritated and unhappy, they might have taken effect, but now her pride was stung by them, and she was all the more willfully perverse because she could not help feeling that her words and behavior were both utterly unbecoming and undutiful. She answered haughtily, and passionately,

"If by others you mean Mr. Sidney Gilchrist, let me tell you that I care as little for his contempt as for his esteem. I despise them both; and as for happiness, I would rather be miserable forever than accept it at his hands. That is all I have to say to him now or ever, or to you about him; and you may send me to school just as soon as you like, Aunt Ravenel. I shall be glad when I am away from every body here, for the place is hateful to me!"

She flung herself down upon the sofa again, and hid her face in her hands, but not before she had caught the look of mingled pain and pity and reproach which her aunt gave her as she silently left the room. She remembered it many a time afterward: even now it stirred up the better impulses of her nature into passionate shame and remorse, and she would already have gladly recalled the wicked and ungrateful words. But it was too late; and she could only vent her regrets and self-reproaches in vehement and impotent rage against Mr. Gilchrist—that grand disturber of her peace, and source of all her troubles!

II.

It was a dull and dreary journey that Madelaine took to New York the next week. There was but one alleviation to her misery—the fact that she was going to a new school where no one would know any thing about her, and she would not have to bear the curiosity and impertinence of old school-mates. She found it almost as hard, though, to endure the stares and comments to which her position as a "new scholar" entitled her; to fall into the routine, different from and more irksome than at the old establishment; and to submit readily always to the rigid discipline exacted at the "Inchky Institute."

The first few weeks were dismal in the extreme. She walked apart in stately melancholy through the day, and at night persistently wept herself to sleep, until her room-mate, a sensible, kindly, warm-hearted girl, who had vainly offered consolation in every shape she could devise, from sugar-plums upward, began to be quite disgusted with her. She had taken a fancy to the pretty face, however—perhaps because her own was not pretty at all—and notwithstanding many rebuffs, persevered in her friendly overtures till at last Madelaine, in spite of herself, could not help being interested, and pleased, and finally sympathetic. Emily Nesbitt had such a cheerful, sunshiny disposition that no one could resist its influence long; and though Madelaine's highly-toned sensibilities were frequently shocked by some of her commonplace, matter-of-fact tendencies, there was still a charm about her which made itself felt even in the midst of the other's morbid discontent.

The end was that the two girls became "friends," and in course of time Emily was made the recipient of all her companion's secret sorrows. Of course, with her prosaic views of life, she could not be as deeply appreciative of them as she should have been; but she was a very patient listener, and never laughed, although she was sorely tempted sometimes. More than that, she exerted herself to obtain alleviation of the weary school confinement, and succeeded so well that Madelaine found herself one Friday evening the centre of attraction in a gay little party out of school-bounds, almost without knowing how she came there. It was a privilege accorded to some of the older pupils who had friends in the city, to spend with them the time between Friday afternoon and Monday morning once in every month. Emily had a married cousin, who considerably extended her invitations to Madelaine also; and after this the two girls regularly passed the monthly holiday together at Mrs. Maxwell's pretty home. She was a young wife, herself not very long emancipated from the Inchkyl dominion; and she perfectly understood how to entertain her young visitors at such times. There was always something pleasant planned for them—a little excursion of some kind, a drive, a concert, or a party at home; and there were always gentlemen enough in attendance, too. Some of them were stupid, and some were clever—the usual sprinkle; but at any rate they were all polite, attentive, admiring, and “none of them Sidney Gilchrist,” as Madelaine bitterly observed.

“No, and it's a great pity,” Emily retorted, maliciously, on one occasion. “If he only knew how quietly somebody else was appropriating his peculiar property, he would be one of them soon enough, I am thinking!”

At which Madelaine said, “Nonsense!” very emphatically, but with a very red cheek at the same time; and, by way of diversion, launched forth into some scornful speeches concerning “her valiant suitor,” as she contemptuously styled Mr. Gilchrist.

But the truth was that Mr. Gilchrist filled a very small space in her thoughts in these days. She was piqued, indeed, at his total neglect of her; for in spite of her rudeness to him, she had scarcely expected to be so completely resigned by him. Some further demonstration she had certainly looked for; yet she had been utterly unmolested by word or visit from him since she had left Hazelhurst, and that was four months ago. But she merely indulged herself in various biting speeches and sarcastic allusions when the subject was brought up, and at other times forgot him almost entirely in a new and far more agreeable excitement.

There was one of Mrs. Maxwell's gentleman friends who was always on hand when the young ladies were with her. He had been one of the first to whom Madelaine was introduced, and the most assiduous ever since in attentions to her. Not at all flattering or lover-like attentions, however; for though he continually sought her conversation, he as continually disputed, contradicted, and even laughed at her most cherished opinions and sentiments. He talked to her with a quiet boldness, a manly self-assertion, which attracted her strangely, notwithstanding she was so often provoked by his fearless disapproval, his straight-forward and wholesale condemnation of much that she believed in and clung to. He was so candid, so right-minded, so clear and discriminating in every thing, that, in spite of her frequent vexation, she was obliged always to feel that he was right and she wrong wherever they differed; and feeling it, her natural ingenuousness compelled her to confess as much. He never paid her compliments, and seldom praised her; but when he did, his few words made her cheek burn and her heart thrill, not with pride, but with a deep humility, a yearning desire to be more worthy of such approval, a passionate pleasure in having won the simplest token of it. Under his influence she was changing very much, growing gentle where she had been proud and willful, self-distrustful where she had been self-assured and obstinate. There even came into her mind certain vague convictions that she had acted foolishly and wrongly toward Mr. Gilchrist, and a very positive consciousness that she had been most ungrateful and undutiful to her aunt.

This change in the young girl's temper was very evident to the Maxwells and to Emily Nesbitt, and the cause of it equally so; but they took very little notice apparently of what was going on. Only Emily could not help occasionally making some sly allusion to Mr. Hayne, and with all her fastidious delicacy Madelaine was secretly pleased whenever she did so. It seemed an assurance of what she longed yet scarcely dared to believe—a confirmation of her trembling, inward hope—to have others notice that he cared for her. And yet she would not acknowledge to herself that she loved him; when the question came up in her own mind, as it did continually, she denied it, with vehement scorn at the idea of giving away her love unsought, and made many a haughty resolve to care no longer for what he thought of her, and no longer to defer to him, like a child, in every thing. There were others who courted her smiles, while he did not at all dread her frowns; and why should she be so solicitous to please him, so humble before him, so full of tremulous gladness at a kind word or look from him? It was a waste of resolution, however, for as soon as she came under the spell of those dark, bright eyes, so full of kindness, but so full of conscious power, all her pride melted, and she was gentle and docile as ever.

Christmas came, and the girls had a fortnight's holiday, the whole of which they were invited to spend with Mrs. Maxwell; and they were both very willing to accept. Emily from private reasons of her own, Madelaine because she knew that Mr. Hayne would be there as usual, and that she should live in the sunshine of his presence for a longer time than ever before.

There was a Christmas-tree and a children's party—given for Mrs. Maxwell's little brothers and sisters—the night before Christmas. A sufficient sprinkling of older people made it attractive for others as well, and Mr. Hayne being there of course, Madelaine of course was happy.

Not that he had much to say to her, for he paid far more attention to the little people than to their seniors to-night. He was the good genius who distributed the gifts (many of which had been his own contribution) from the tree—the exhibitor of the wonderful Magic Lantern—the director of the dances—the most efficient aid at the supper-table—and the chief actor in all the mysterious exhibitions of Chinese dolls, slim-witches, Egyptian hieroglyphics, etc., which kept the children in a sort of intoxication of enjoyment till nearly midnight. Madelaine admired him more than ever as she saw this new direction of his talents, and, if the truth must be told, loved him in the same proportion.

"No one else is like him!" she thought, proudly. "The very children love him and cling to him, and how generous and kind he is to them all! Who but he would take so much trouble to make them happy?" And her heart swelled till the tears filled her eyes, and for the twentieth time she drew back into the shade of a friendly curtain to hide her too vivid emotions, and to press once again to her lips a pretty gift which the Christmas-tree had borne for her. It was a little vinaigrette, exquisitely ornamented, but only precious to her because she knew from a single glancing look as he handed it to her that it was his gift. A queen's coronet could not have bought it from her after that look.

She was still in the shadow of the curtain, half-hidden from the merry, moving throng around her, when she felt herself touched suddenly, and he was there beside her. "I have a request to make, Miss Hayward," he said, as he bent down to her; "and for fear of lacking another opportunity, I must improve this. I want you to go to church with me to-morrow: will you go? Speak quickly, for some one is calling me."

"Yes," answered Madelaine, promptly, caring little for the peremptory manner of his invitation; "I will go." And the next minute a troop of children had found him out, and he was away in the midst of them, without another word for her. She did not speak with him again through the evening, except to say good-night, but she needed nothing more to give her happy dreams.

She was early awake next morning, and stole softly to the window to see if the weather was propitious. To her dismay she found every thing covered deeply with snow: every twig and branch of the leafless trees bore a soft white burden, the street was carpeted in white, and the sky overhead looked ominously gray as if the feathery shower might float downward again at any moment. Madelaine felt sorely disappointed, but Emily waked up just in time to comfort her.

"It doesn't make the slightest difference," she asserted, cheerfully; "nobody minds snow, and I shouldn't wonder if it was very fortunate after all, because you may get a sleigh-ride, you see. In fact I am quite sure you will, and that will be ever so much nicer than a long walk to church."

"But I want to go to church," said Madelaine.

"Well, and can't you go in a sleigh, I wonder? or do you want to prolong the happiness of your tête-à-tête?"

"Hold your tongue, Emily," Madelaine returned, unceremoniously; but the light came back to her eyes, and, in spite of gray sky and white pavements, she went gayly down to breakfast. And Emily proved a true prophet, for Mr. Hayne made his appearance in uncommonly good season, with the gayest little establishment of bells, buffalo-ropes, etc., laughed at the threatening storm, and had Madelaine snugly tucked in among the furs before she had time to feign an objection.

The drive to church was delightful enough, certainly; but she was happier still when she sat quietly beside him in his own pew—they two the only occupants—listening to the beautiful service which he loved so, and joining heart and soul in the joyous Christmas chants and hymns. There was a strong religious element in her nature, developed more in sympathetic feeling than in practical earnestness hitherto, but to-day something deeper and truer seemed to reach her heart and touch it with a sense of penitent humility such as she had never felt before. The sermon was simple enough, for few new or striking things can be said in a Christmas sermon, beautiful and dear as the theme ever is; but the lack of originality mattered little to Madelaine. Tears filled her eyes and overflowed them more than once, and her cheek glowed with a mingling of strange but heart-felt emotions. She felt tearfully happy, humble, and thankful; and strong, too, as if she could do and bear life's duty and burden with a faith unknown before.

They were both silent when they were in the sleigh again; Mr. Hayne gave his attention to the horse, and Madelaine, absorbed in her own thoughts, did not see in what direction they were going. She looked out by-and-by, and found herself in an unfamiliar street, with strange-looking houses scattered more widely apart than usual, while a reach of open country stretched away in the distance.

"Well, what of it?" Mr. Hayne asked with a smile, as he read the question in her eyes. "Don't be afraid, I am only going to give you a longer ride than I promised. That's all."

"I am not afraid," said Madelaine, a little proudly, for she did not quite understand the caution; "but is it not late? Will not Emily and Mrs. Maxwell think me rude to leave them so long?"

"No, I told them of my intentions before we started. You need not mind them. The only question is whether you would like the ride, or would rather go back at once. Which is it?"

"I would like the ride, then," said Madelaine, frankly, and she was rewarded with a look and smile which sent a quick gladness to her heart.

"What did you think of the sermon?" he asked, presently.

"Oh, I liked it," she answered, eagerly, her eyes filling; for she was in that softened mood when tears come as fast as words. It is a womanly mood, and very incomprehensible to most masculine minds; but I think Mr. Hayne understood it for once.

"So did I," he returned, gently. "It touched me more nearly than many a more brilliant one could have done. I remembered more of my own sins, and felt more charitable to my neighbor's than for a long time since."

"I did not know you were ever uncharitable," said Madelaine, simply. "I have never found you so."

"No?" he exclaimed, eagerly. "It is very kind of you to say that, when I have found fault with you so often—even to censoriousness and rudeness. Indeed, my hardness to you sometimes was one of the very things with which my conscience reproached me this morning."

"It need not, then, for you never said a word that I did not deserve; and you might have said a great deal more," was the earnest answer. "Your candor with my follies, my faults, was one of the things for which I had to be thankful this morning."

Mr. Hayne looked surprised and greatly pleased. "Do you really mean all this?" he asked. "That you were thankful for my fault-finding, never angry with it?"

"I mean it all, and more," she answered, steadily. "I don't say that I was never provoked. I was at first very often, but it was only because I could not bear to have the truth told me about myself. I was very foolish and wrong in a great many of my thoughts and ways. You first convinced me of it, and you have helped me to overcome these faults. I know I have enough left still," she added, with real humility; "but I could not help feeling to-day that I had gained something since my last Christmas service, and being thankful for the friend who had done so much toward the gain."

There was no mistaking the sincerity and simplicity of this acknowledgment. It had been perfectly involuntary and heart-felt, and Mr. Hayne, at least, was not likely to find fault with its lack of conventional reserve, its too frank though unconscious exposure of her true feeling for himself. A momentary look of joy and triumph flashed from his eyes as she turned away her blushing face; then he answered, gravely,

"I thank you for saying so much more than I had a right to expect; so much more than I deserve, truly; for my candor was not half so disinterested as you think. It is my turn to make a confession, Madelaine. Look at me while you listen to it."

His voice trembled a little as he spoke her name—he had never called her so before—and she trembled too, with a strange thrill of wonder, and hope, and fear as she looked up to him. His eyes searched hers with a look she had never seen in them before, as he continued deliberately:

"I can not pretend to foresee what you will think of my confession, neither will I try to justify myself, whatever you may say. I will acknowledge, in the first place, that it was not fair to come to you as I did, having a previous acquaintance with your character, and with certain important incidents in your life, that you did not know I possessed. It was not fair to seek your confidence, even though I did it by speaking unwelcome truths, without telling you what I already knew of you. But I had a motive. There was a risk which I did not dare to run. If you had known all, you would have looked upon me with dislike and suspicion, and my friendship would have been rejected entirely. Will you blame me, then, so much for my want of candor toward you?"

He stopped, looking for an answer, but Madelaine was confused and bewildered, perfectly uncomprehending. "I do not understand," she began, falteringly; but she had hardly spoken before a sudden light broke upon her. The blood rushed to her cheeks and brow, and tingled to her very finger-tips with a fiery sense of shame. "Do you mean—can you mean—that you know about—" Sidney Gilchrist, she would have added; but she broke down utterly at the name, and hid her burning face in her hands as the conviction forced itself upon her that this was indeed what he meant, and that he knew the whole story. There had been times when she had longed to tell it to him—she meant to tell it, if ever he gave her a right to bestow all her confidence upon him: but to think that he had known it all along! Oh, what must he have thought of her, what must he be thinking now!

He touched her hand gently as a hundred rapid thoughts like these were whirling through her mind. "What is the matter, Madelaine?" he asked. "Look up and scold me as much as you like, but don't cover your face in that way, or I shall feel that you think me perfectly unpardonable. Will you look up?"

And in spite of her shame, Madelaine could not resist his wish. The crimson face was uncovered, the drooping eyes even raised to his for a moment, and then he went on again:

"I do mean that I know about Sidney Gilchrist. You have guessed right. I have known it from the beginning, and that was the reason that I wanted to know you. Before I ever met you at Mrs. Maxwell's I had heard the story from Sidney Gilchrist himself, and I was curious (forgive me, Madelaine, for now comes my confession) to study at my leisure the character of a girl who was capable of persisting in a determination like that. I see you are angry now; say what you will."

"I have nothing to say," Madelaine exclaimed, bitterly, for she was angry now, "except that it was in keeping with Mr. Gilchrist's character to send another person to make discoveries which he had not the courage to attempt himself."

"In keeping with Mr. Gilchrist's character," repeated Mr. Hayne, slowly, while a curious smile flitted over his lips. "Passing by the imputation upon his courage, may I ask, Miss Hayward, what opportunities you had for judging of his character? According to his statement you never met him, and no communication whatever passed between you."

"I do not care," said Madelaine, promptly, giving way in her annoyance to the old pride and prejudice so much subdued of late. "It is enough for me to know that he was a mere tool in his father's hands, in a matter where no man should accept another's dictation. I have no respect for a man who would marry simply for convenience. Such a man will never marry me!"

"No, not even if Mr. Gilchrist marries you," said Mr. Hayne, laughingly. "He is the last man in the world—I believe it as firmly as I believe the creed—who would enter into such relations with the unworthy motives you ascribe to him. It is true that his father and your aunt would have arranged the match with very few preliminaries; but it does not follow that he yielded so implicitly to their plans. He was a 'tool' in so far as that he was willing to please his father by going to see you; but he openly avowed that all future results must be determined wholly by the mutual impressions formed upon acquaintance. And if his wishes had been followed, you would never have known that such a plan had been projected by any one. Indeed, Miss Hayward, you wrong him greatly by such prejudices. I speak from intimate knowledge, and do only simple justice to Sidney Gilchrist in this defense of one who has never been allowed to defend himself."

He spoke simply and quietly, and his words would have carried conviction of their truth even if Madelaine had really doubted it, which she did not. She had been coming gradually, for a long time, to the same assurance concerning Mr. Gilchrist, and she had only spoken so bitterly from a momentary vexation. Proud as she was, it was not in her nature to be sullen, or to refuse acknowledgment when she felt herself wrong; so she answered, frankly,

"I am very sorry, then, and I beg his pardon for past and present injustice. More than that," she added, with an effort, "I will give you leave to tell him that I said so."

The same triumphant look flashed over Mr. Hayne's face at this unexpected permission; but it was checked before Madelaine could observe it, and he answered, readily,

"I will do that with very great pleasure, Miss Hayward; but—may I say nothing more to him?"

"What more should be said," she asked, hastily, "when I have humbled myself to beg his pardon?"

"Is common justice humiliation?" returned Mr. Hayne, with a smile. "And is there nothing that you can do to prove the sincerity of such an acknowledgment?"

"I do not understand you," she said, coldly.

"I could explain, but I am afraid that I should be considered both officious and impertinent. I do not think I will risk it, Miss Hayward." And he touched the horse with his whip, startled him into a gallop, and gave his whole attention for a few minutes to bringing him back into a proper rate of speed.

Madelaine sat silent, tormented with curiosity, eager to know what he meant to say, yet dreading it with a strange suspicion of its real import.

"What can I do?" she asked, at last. "I wish you to tell me."

"Really?" he returned. "And will you promise not to be offended?"

"Yes, I promise."

"Then I think that the least you can do, in mere justice, is to give Mr. Gilchrist now the opportunity that you denied him at Hazelhurst."

She colored violently, although she had half-expected this, and asked, "What do you mean?" in a tone by no means gentle.

"Simply," he answered, with composure, "that you should signify to him—of course, in no way that would compromise your delicacy—that you are willing now to receive his visits. He happens to be in town at this very time" (Madelaine started, and turned pale), "and I am ready to give him any message, any hint or suggestion, that you may charge me with. You need not be afraid that your dignity will suffer. The whole matter can be most naturally and easily arranged if you will accept of my intervention."

She turned to him with flashing eyes.

"Mr. Gilchrist has one zealous friend, at least! Pray, may I ask if you have taken counsel together, and if this plan is of his arranging?"

Now it was Mr. Hayne's turn to color, but he answered, calmly still,

"I have taken counsel with myself only, and you are the only person to whom the plan has been even hinted."

"I am indebted to you for so much consideration," she began, haughtily; then passionately and suddenly, "I can not do it! I will not do it! I never can humble myself so to Sidney Gilchrist—never!"

"There is nothing more to be said, then," Mr. Hayne replied, with quiet dignity. "Only remember, Miss Hayward, that you asked for my opinion. I did not intrude it, but I was compelled to speak candidly."

They rode on in silence. There was a cloud upon Mr. Hayne's brow, and his lips were compressed with some firm, hard determination. Madelaine's vail was drawn over her face, and her tears were dropping fast. The day which had begun so hopefully, so gladly, was closing in sore disappointment and sorrow. She could no longer hide from herself that she loved this man—no longer deny the secret hope that had possessed her soul from the time when he asked her to take this ride; and it was bitterness indescribable to hear him pleading another's cause rather than his own—to have him planning "opportunities" for Sidney Gilchrist, of all others, instead of improving such a golden one for himself. Surely he had shown her more than once that he loved her! His look, his tone, his manner had proved it, even though he had never said it in actual words. She could not be so egregiously self-deluded—she could not have given up her love, unsought, unrequited, to any man! Her cheek glowed with fiery shame at the bare thought, and yet it seemed now almost certain. All his sympathies were enlisted for Mr. Gilchrist; all his anxiety was that he should have “the opportunity that had been denied him at Hazelhurst;” in other words, that he should be allowed to woo, win, and marry her!

“He is tired of me, I suppose. He wants to see me fairly married to somebody else, and then his conscience will be clear!” But this thought had hardly been born before she strangled it. “No, he is too noble, too high-minded, for any thing like that. He does not dream that a silly school-girl would dare to love him. And yet—after all—perhaps—it may be only because he is so honorable that he will not say any thing for himself as long as another has even the shadow of a claim. Mr. Gilchrist is his friend, and it would not seem right for him to supplant him, and never say a word in his favor. Oh!” and here the sweet hope thrilled back again, and a yearning regret sprung up that she had grieved and perhaps offended so true a friend. She stole a shy glance at him from under her veil. He was looking straightforward, with the same close-shut, resolute lips, the same clouded brow; and the poor girl thought, “Oh! he is angry—very angry, I am sure. I never saw him look so before. What can I do?” And her distress increased as mile after mile passed, and he still did not speak.

It had begun to snow some time back. The air was thick now with flying white feathers, and her own cloak and hat were powdered with the light, clinging flakes. But Mr. Hayne took no manner of notice, except that he turned the horse's head homeward when the first flurry came, and once tucked the robes a little more carefully around her. They were rapidly nearing home now; familiar landmarks came in sight, well-known buildings loomed up through the snowy mist as the sleigh-bells jingled once more through the city streets. Poor Madelaine was in despair. In a few minutes more they would be separated, and if she left him in anger when would she have an opportunity for reconciliation? Perhaps never! and any thing else could be better borne than that they should no longer be friends. She struggled with her pride and timidity, and summoned up courage to make a great effort. But just as she was about to speak Mr. Hayne himself broke the long silence.

“You have had a very dull ride, Miss Hayward,” he said. “I hoped to make it pleasant for you, but I have failed, I see, totally. I can only say that I am very sorry, and beg your pardon sincerely for having unintentionally offended you.”

“Oh!” she exclaimed, eagerly, “do not say that. It is I who should beg your pardon, for I did not keep my word. I was vexed when I had promised not to be. But I am very sorry now. You are right, and I was wrong. I will do any thing you wish me.”

“I have no right to wish any thing,” said Mr. Hayne, coldly, but his eyes sparkled nevertheless, and his lip quivered with a repressed smile.

“You are angry with me, then!” and her voice grew tremulous. “I am very sorry, but I could not help it. It was so sudden, and I am so proud—I could not bear it at first. But now—indeed I am willing, indeed I wish to do whatever you think is right.”

“Are you really in earnest? do you mean all you say?” he questioned, with ill-subdued eagerness.

“And you will be guided by me entirely in this thing?”

“Entirely,” she answered, half trustfully, half desperately, determined at least to regain his favor, whatever else happened.

“Then I accept your promise,” he exclaimed, joyfully. “Remember that I hold you bound. And you must accept my heartiest thanks, Madelaine. You do not know how much you have given me in making this promise; but I pledge you my word, my sacred honor, that you shall never regret it.”

His face was radiant now, a perfect sunbeam, and Madelaine, poor child, could not help taking some of its glow and brightness into her own aching heart. It did not occur to her, as it may to the sagacious reader, that for a man who had just disclaimed the right to have any wish concerning her, he was usurping a rather remarkable control of her actions: she was only conscious that he was no longer displeased or disappointed, and she revived again with a new sense of hope and comfort.

“When may Gilchrist come?” he asked, as they drew up at Mrs. Maxwell's door.

“Whenever you please,” was the unhesitating reply.

“What message may I give him from you?” as he lifted her out of the sleigh.

“May I say that any friend of mine will be welcome to you?”

“Yes,” she returned hastily, and ran up the steps of the portico to escape further questioning. He followed her and made his adieux as a servant came to admit them.

“I can not come in. I have a dinner engagement, and no time to spare. You will make my excuses to Mrs. Maxwell, and I shall see you again this evening, as early as I can get away. Good-by!”

He gave her hand a squeeze and ran down the steps. Madelaine hurried up stairs in a flutter of wonder, apprehension, delight, and despair. She had to see Sidney Gilchrist at last; she had to let him make love to her if he chose; perhaps she would have to marry him after all! for she had given her promise to be "guided entirely" by Mr. Hayne's wishes. But oh, what did he mean by that last, earnest whisper about any friend of his being welcome to her?"

Emily was up stairs, and she had not a minute's time to compose her fluttered spirits before she was assailed with a volley of saucy questions and sly insinuations which she tried vainly to escape or to answer unconcernedly. Her only resource was to go to work vigorously to dress for dinner, and turn a deaf ear to her mischievous tormentor. "If she only knew how cruel she was," thought poor Madelaine, "she would have some mercy." Wherein she was mistaken, for it so happened that Miss Emily knew a good deal more than her friend, and her conduct was therefore all the more malicious and inexcusable.

But there was a respite after dinner. Mrs. Maxwell had only a family party, and Madelaine was allowed to slip away unnoticed while the young mothers and aunts were discussing family topics, and the gentlemen cigars in the library. Emily was a relation and bound to remain, though she had a wicked desire to follow the fugitive, and torment her skillfully a little longer. Once alone in her own room, with nobody to see her, and no light even but the soft red glow of the coals in the grate, Madelaine first took a comfortable little cry, and then feeling somewhat relieved, settled herself to think over all the strange history of the day, and to wonder what would happen when Mr. Hayne came again. It was a roundabout road that her thoughts traveled, however, and before she had arrived at any satisfactory terminus, Emily's mischievous eyes peered through the red gloom, discovered Madelaine cowering in a deep chair in a vain endeavor to elude her vigilance, and pounced upon her viciously.

"Well, Miss Hayward, you are truly entertaining and companionable to-day. You go to church in the morning before church-time, and stay till five in the afternoon. Then as soon as you have had your dinner—selfish thing! you steal off up stairs and leave all the company, never caring who wants you! I suppose I am no judge of politeness—not being a native of the chivalrous South—but according to my uncultivated Northern notions this isn't it, any way."

"Oh, Emily!" Madelaine began, deprecatingly. "You know they didn't want me down stairs. You were all talking family matters; I knew I was in the way, and so I left you."

"Very generous indeed! Considerate to the last degree!" Emily retorted, provokingly; "and going to crown your magnanimity by keeping out of the drawing-room all the evening, I suppose."

"No, indeed; I will go down at once," cried Madelaine, eager to escape. "Let us go directly."

"Oh, I dare say! You are in a great hurry to go down now that you know Mr. Hayne is there."

Madelaine could not help starting, but she answered, coolly, "No such thing. How should I know that Mr. Hayne was there?"

"By my telling you, of course. Haven't you just heard me say it? And he is waiting for you now. So you can come down if you choose—or I will tell him that you don't choose, shall I?"

"Just as you please," was the affectedly indifferent answer; but the gas flared up suddenly, and there was a hurried smoothing of hair, and adjusting of ribbons and flounces for a minute or two. And then the two girls went down together. At the foot of the stairs Madelaine could not resist a question that had been burning on her tongue.

"Emily, did he bring any body with him—any other gentleman?"

"Yes, I believe he did," said Emily, with the greatest simplicity, knowing all the while that it was an unblushing falsehood, but unable to refrain from the wicked satisfaction of seeing her friend's cheeks whiten at her words.

"Not there!" she exclaimed, spitefully, as Madelaine, in the calmness of desperation, was turning the handle of the drawing-room door. "Do you suppose I would send him among all those chattering women? He is there—in the little parlor. Go in, you goose!" and with a shove toward the door indicated Miss Emily rustled away and left the poor girl standing alone in her agony of distress and apprehension. For a moment she had a wild impulse to rush up stairs, lock herself in, and refuse to see them at all. But then pride came to prevent that, shame too, and something else as well. She determined to "meet the enemy" as a heroine should; so carrying her head like a queen—or Madame Ravenel—she sailed into the little parlor with "level fronting eyelids," prepared to show Messrs. Hayne and Gilchrist that she was not appalled even by their united presence.

Greatly to her surprise, a little to her disappointment, and finally wonderfully to her relief, heroics notwithstanding, she saw at once that Mr. Hayne was alone. The room was fully lighted, and too small to conceal any body for a moment. He sat quietly upon a tête-à-tête, the only occupant of the "little parlor."

He rose politely as she entered, and offered her the seat, which she accepted confusedly. Then he made a place for himself beside her, and the close proximity did not tend to lessen her embarrassment. She felt strangely awkward and ill at ease, and could not for her life have found a word to say. Mr. Hayne himself did not seem as usual. He was agitated and nervous, fidgeted with his hands, twirled his mustache, and made some incoherent excuse for coming late; which, considering he had come remarkably early, was rather uncalled-for. There was a distressing silence for a few moments. Finally, Mr. Hayne plunged into the subject with which both minds were engrossed.

"I have taken a liberty, Miss Hayward, which I am afraid you will not like, even after your generous promise to me to-day."

Miss Hayward's eyes expressed inquiry, but she did not speak.

"I dined with Sidney Gilchrist this evening," he continued, "and gave him the message with which you intrusted me."

Still no answer, but the color wavered on her face, and her lips grew tremulous.

"You remember what it was—that any friend of mine would be welcome to you? Upon the strength of it he expressed a wish to call immediately—this very evening. I did not forbid him; and, to tell you the truth, Miss Hayward, he came with me—he is here now."

The large eyes grew strangely luminous, the wavering color faded altogether, and the tremulous lips seemed hardly able to frame the reply that was expected. "Where is he?" she faltered out at last, for no effort of pride or will could steady her voice.

"In this room," was the answer, low, but clear and unhesitating.

It was like an electric shock: Madelaine sprang to her feet and stared around the small, well-lighted room as if she expected to see Mr. Gilchrist rise through the floor or drop from the ceiling. But she could see nothing, and she turned again to Mr. Hayne with a look half-reproachful, half-frightened, and wholly bewildered.

"I do not see him," she began, with childish simplicity, but stopped short, for she saw an expression on his face which startled her. It was white with excitement; his eyes glittered, every feature was agitated with some strong emotion.

"Must I tell you in so many words? can not you see?" he asked.

"I see nothing," she said, faintly, but even as she spoke a terrible light flashed into her brain. He saw the gradual intelligence in her eyes, the wonder, dismay, incredulity that succeeded each other upon her speaking countenance; and he knew that now was the time to strike a bold stroke for victory.

"I see you understand," he said, quietly and resolutely. "Sit down again," and he drew her back unresisting to the sofa. "Sidney Gilchrist is here, in his own person, to plead his own cause. He throws himself upon your mercy, Madelaine, and believes that you will forgive him because he loves you, and because you love him!"

Unparalleled audacity! and yet Madelaine survived it! for the last assertion was but too true, and the first thrilled her with such a certainty of bliss that it overpowered, for the moment, every other remembrance.

"You made me a promise to-day, Madelaine," he continued, with bold and increasing confidence when he saw how mutely his first insolence was borne. "You said that you would do any thing I wished; and now I wish you to lift your head, to uncover your face, to look into my eyes and say, I forgive you every thing, for I love you!"

He extended his hands as he spoke and touched hers, which were closed over her face and almost as crimson as the burning cheeks they covered.

At his touch they sprang apart, her head lifted itself proudly and her eyes flashed anger at him. But only a lightning flash, brief as bright. The next instant it was quenched in a rain of passionate tears, and her face was hidden again—not in her hands, but upon Sidney Gilchrist's shoulder. His arms were around her in a strong, loving embrace, his lips showered kisses upon her hair, whispered words of fire in her ear, and nothing in past, present, or future had power now to disturb the unspeakable joy and love which possessed and absorbed every faculty of her being.

Faint heart never won fair lady, and if impudence deserves to be crowned with success, certainly Sidney Gilchrist merited all he had won. He did not escape so easily, however, as appears at first sight; for after his "fair lady" had somewhat recovered command of her faculties, he had to stand a pretty fire of feminine reproach and invective. Emily, and Mrs. Maxwell too—perfidious creatures!—came in for a fair share of Madelaine's indignation; for it turned out that they had aided and abetted Mr. Sidney Hayne Gilchrist from the very beginning of his nefarious plot, and she had been the unsuspecting dupe of all three!

Nothing in the world but the fact that she loved this said gentleman—whatever the name he chose to assume—better than pride, better than obstinacy, or any other womanly besetting sin, would have saved any of them from the extreme of her wrath. As it was, she forgave them all, out of the fullness of a happy heart.

Mr. Gilchrist wrote a letter to Madame Ravenel: so did Madelaine. The last was full of womanly penitence, confessions, and confidences. The first contained only three words: "VENI, VIDI, VICI!"

A BIT OF ANGLING.

I FISH.

The reason is, I like it. There is great joy for me in this fine sport. My rod and I are the best of friends. Having for many years been trained and educated in all the angler's arts, I look upon myself as equal to the proper bringing up of any of the finny family.

One afternoon last summer I enticed trout from a brook that ran and reveled along a cool Franconia valley. A mossy cushion mitigated the asperities of the rock on which I reclined, and I was happy. A canopy of waving branches overhead shut off the fiercest beams of the sun, while softer rays, trickling through the foliage, diffused a tender warmth around. The delicate perfumes of forest flowers filled the air, and the music of the rippling waters echoed ceaselessly. Beside me lay an ample basket, half filled with speckled luxuries. Before me was the prospect of its speedy repletion.

The trembling undulations of my line announced another victim. A breathless moment of suspense, a few skillful allurements, a bit of scientific fascination, and the sharp hook, entering his innocent gill, whirled him quivering through the air, to my ready hand.

Rustling twigs and footsteps crushing the dry leaves distracted my attention. The boughs parted, and my seclusion was disturbed by a lovely apparition. Indistinct notions of white flowing robes, a pinkish shawl, shiny slippers afflictively diminutive, a jaunty wide hat of the order known as flats, and other appurtenances of feminine attractiveness, came upon me; but I was mainly absorbed by two lustrous eyes, extravagantly distended with horror as they rested upon the struggling captive from whose lacerated nose I extracted steel.

It was sweet seventy-six that stood and gazed. I thus numerically designate her, not from any knowledge that I possessed of her age, which I hasten to announce as apparently eighteen, or seventeen plus, but because at that early period I was able to distinguish her only by the number of her room in the hotel the second floor of which we both inhabited. Her door was opposite mine, and open at most times; and every morning for a week I had taken in her image with my boots, and cherished it.

Circumstances had not entitled me to advance a claim upon her attention. Our relations had been rigidly formal. I had, one unlucky evening, stepped upon her dress, and made a hole in it, but I did not consider this a suitable opening for intimacy between us. Twice at table I had enjoyed opportunities of offering her mustard, but I could not bring myself to look upon mustard as the proper medium through which to establish a durable acquaintance with so exquisite a being. If it had been the cream, or honey, or even pudding, the case would have been different; but mustard lacked delicacy, and I recoiled from its intercession.

And now, unlooked-for chance had brought us strangely together. Releasing myself from the enthrallment of the augmented eyes, I rose and, courteously, I think, explained my occupation.

"Dear me," said she, "how horrible!"

That is just what she said. Sweet seventy-six said it was horrible. I thought this sort of beginning inauspicious, but I believed the point susceptible of argument, and ventured a contrary opinion.

"Oh, it is horrible," she persisted; "how can you bear to do it? So cruel, so heartless; poor little dears, all shiny and speckled, too," and she bent over the basket, much moved.

"Excuse me, how can you say so? People will eat trout; you eat them yourself; I think you breakfasted with two and a half this morning. Now if trout were not caught, trout could not be eaten. Therefore trout must be caught. Else how would you breakfast?"

This elaborate reasoning was ineffectual. Pity for suffering nature had overflowed this tender little heart, and left no room for logic any where about her. A series of compassionate remonstrances assailed me. How could I resist them?

I, too, began to look upon myself in the light of a barbarian, and admitted disagreeable doubts respective of my recent sport.

"Oh, pray," concluded sweet seventy-six, "pray don't do it any more! I think I never can eat fish again. I didn't know it was so dreadful. Please, Sir, give it up. Be merciful!"

Of course there was no denying such appeals, and so I promised, and ruefully gave over. One gleam of satisfaction alleviated my regrets. Conventional ice was broken, and we floated upon the waves of comparative familiarity.

At tea that evening smoking pyramids of savory trout rose before me. Sweet seventy-six's plate was near. I timidly dared to fill it. There was no remonstrance. She had, then, forgotten; but I shuddered to think of the consequences, should the recollection too suddenly break upon her.

"There," she exclaimed, flushed with a tardy consciousness, as she opened her fair lips to receive the last morsel that her plate afforded, "now if that should have been the poor darling that I saw you catch, Sir. I wonder, now, if it was. Do you think it could have been, Sir?"

"I believe it was," I answered gravely, and not without apprehensions.

"But how do you know?"

"I recognize it by the size," said I; "it was the largest of them all."

"Why, how nice! Do you know, now, I had no idea it could have been so nice. There is a great deal in cookery. I'll take another, if you please, Sir."

I mused.

That this incident affected me unpleasantly, I will not attempt to conceal. I could not conceal it even then. It seemed as if fair seventy-six were not animated by that rectitude of sentiment which young women ought always to possess. In the matter of fish she appeared fickle. She was incapable of hardening herself against an appeal of appetite, though the original means of gratifying it were abhorrent to her. Reflecting thus, I went with her to the drawing-room.

We talked. Trout were referred to. With timid confusion she admitted her weakness, and spoke in slightly opprobrious terms regarding it. But on the question of the enormity of angling she remained obdurate. Then with feminine rapidity observing my concern, she deployed smiles and comforting murmurs, and playful agitations of curls, and other expressions of artful artlessness, known only to maidenhood, obliterating, as the evening faded, all thought of severity in my mind.

We walked a little on the piazza. I spoke, not coherently I am afraid, of the scenery and the lakes, and the mountain streams and the echoes, and undertook imbecile figures of speech, and occasionally obtruded feeble flatteries, suggested by the splendors of the firmament, and consequently moonshiny.

She gave me to know that her name was Laura. Something was said about a surname, which conventional forms required me to take note of. It was Larcher, and I thought it a bore.

When we parted, between our respective doors, she lighted her candle by mine, and beamed upon me with her eyes. The hot spermaceti fell upon my fingers, but I uttered no cry. She turned at last to go, and said in a manner that betokened final decision,

"Well, good-night; good-night!"

The next thing was, she came round upon me, and said she would shake hands, if I would promise sacredly never to massacre those sweet little fish any more.

What could a man do?

From that moment I resigned myself to in-fatuation. I caused my seat at table to be fixed beside Miss Larcher. At every regular meal I devoured her with my eyes. I avoided the woods and mountains, except when she chose to visit them, and cultivated brilliancy of boots and polish of manner. At the end of three days I was as inextricably fettered, metaphorically, as some time ago were Mars and Venus, by Vulcanized process.

And yet I am fastidious. At least I think so. Experiences within a few short weeks had taught me to believe that I was very fastidious. I had been at Saratoga. My friend Dixford had shown me his sister and some attentions. I was attracted toward Miss Dixford. Her style of beauty was determined and imperious; black hair, dark eyes heavily shaded, implacable nose, and mouth delicately firm. I was at first rather awe-struck by her general regality, but in time we became fine friends, and I experienced devotion toward her. We rode together incessantly for two days, regardless of the dust and the comments of society. We had souls above both. On the third morning I gave a violent proof of my interest in her. I rose before the customary hour for breakfast to join her in an early ramble. We approached the springs, hitherto an untraveled region for me. Miss Dixford called for water. She handed me a glass. By unwonted exercise of fortitude I gradually absorbed the fraction of a gill. Before I had accomplished this, Miss Dixford had introduced the entire contents of her glass into her system, and had called for more.

To record the details would be to occasion myself unnecessary pain. The remembrance is odious. Five distinct successive draughts, large draughts, five large goblets full, that resolute young lady disposed of. I stood aghast.

"Come," she said, in a voice which seemed to bubble up from some troubled deep, "come, let us go back."

"Certainly," said I, "by all means."

"You do not like the waters, I am afraid," she said, in tones still moist and effervescent.

"Not to drink," said I, gloomily.

"Dear me," said she, "I adore them. I am not up to my ordinary mark this morning," she added, with a bibulous sort of smile; "I shall have no appetite all day."

"Oh," said I, faintly, "not up to the ordinary mark?"

"No," she answered, "I usually take seven. I have taken eight." (Here a burst of heroic pride.)

"I admire your courage, Miss Dixford. I think you are a Joan of Arc, so far as conquering delicate and sensitive instincts goes."

Miss Dixford was pleased at the compliment, and appeared to regret that she had not given better ground for it by straining a point and achieving a few extra glasses that morning.

The same day I left Saratoga. I did not consider that it was proper for me to become the satellite of a luminary whose lustre was liable at any time to be quenched by excessive medicinal fluid. I could not reconcile myself to the idea of intimacy with a young lady who made a daily cataract of her esophagus. For myself, I resolved to look at once for waters of oblivion, which I could hardly hope to find near Congress Hall.

As I was about starting, Dixford came to me.

"Why do you go so unexpectedly?" he asked.

"The truth is, my dear fellow," said I, "there is no fishing. It is charming here, in every respect, except that it is hot, and the roads are dusty, and— Well, never mind; but there is no profitable fishing. I must have fishing. I am going to Newport."

"We shall be sorry. Julia will be sorry. She was pleased with you, and for her to be pleased—that is something. How do you like my sister, Plimkins?"

"She is most amiable, and I respect very much her decision and dauntlessness, if I may say so."

"Ah, there's where her strength lies," said Dixford. "Intellectually she is strong. She astonishes me, sometimes, in that direction."

"She does astonish one, sometimes," said I.

"Oh yes," said he, "she will do something yet. I think it will be Greek, or geometry. She has much to learn, she says, to reach her own ideal standard, but she will reach it. Her receptive faculties are very great. Perhaps you have noticed that."

"Very," said I.

I went to Newport. The second morning after my arrival (I pass over all inferior incidents), a mediæval lady of good-natured mien begged my pardon and asked if I were a Plimkins of Boston. Learning that I was, she furthermore hoped I would excuse her, and was curious to know if my mother had been a Rydwell. This bit of curiosity having been affirmatively assuaged, the good-natured lady claimed me as a friend, on the strength of her former boarding-school affection for my mother, whom she had not seen for forty years, and presented me to her daughter, in whom I took immediate satisfaction.

Lina Pinkerby afforded a thorough contrast to the dark lady whose picture had recently been washed from my breast by five glasses of Congress water. She was fair, and full of daintiest drawing-room refinement. Her liquid eyes seemed calculated to furnish the oblivious element I needed; and I could not help anchoring my regard in them.

The weather, which blustered much about this time, produced such peculiar effects upon vagrant crinoline that crinoline staid mostly within doors. Thus the accomplishments of Miss Pinkerby developed themselves. She sang sweet little ballads, and played languishing waltzes all day long; and all the evening she floated like a soft white cloud held together sash-wise by a yard of rainbow, on aromatic airs compounded of Labitzky and Lubin.

She was kind to me, and it was very comfortable; and my anxieties, caused by annoying recollections, wore away. Congress water gradually evaporated from my mind. I was, in a measure, myself again, excepting that I never thought of fishing.

One day, however, I yielded to the persuasions of an ardent amateur, and took advantage of the first luxurious weather Newport had known during my visit. We fished. Good fortune fell upon my companion; but as for me, I felt that the sport had lost its charm. I lost first my reputation as an angler, and subsequently my apparatus. Then I went away.

I strode toward the hotel. I passed the beach. Bathers disported in strange attire. The sea was dotted with heads, variously bobbing. A figure emerged, dripping and diffuse. It ran by me. It screamed an aqueous salutation. It invited me to wait and see it home. I gazed with a full heart and a vacant face. It was she.

I saw Lina Pinkerby in red flannel. Not only red, but wet. She seemed to need squeezing, not to say wringing out. As she skipped away to her dressing-house, I thought of fresh boiled lobsters of magnified proportions. Perhaps I could have borne it, but for the wet and the legs. The trowers overwhelmed me, and the presence of palpable bifurcation made me swell with grief. And swathed in wet red flannel! She left a sinuous rivulet in her path. Was this the stream of oblivion I had hoped for?

It was the second time within two weeks that my spirits had been dashed and weakened with water.

Presently Miss Pinkerby came forth, dry, and neatly costumed, and handed me a damp bundle to carry. She was lively, and glowed with more than usual animation, but her smile had lost its savor, and the glistening of her eye was salt.

"Do you swim, Mr. Plimkins?" she asked.

"Not for pleasure," said I.

"Are you not fond of the water?"

"To fish from, I am," said I.

"Now I like nothing so well," said she.

"We bathe here every day when it is warm. Sometimes I bathe twice a day, I am so fond of it. I keep two dresses. The other one is yellow. Do you like my dress, Mr. Plimkins?"

"Infinitely," said I; "it would be nice in a comic pantomime."

"Yes, it is generally thought pretty," she said.

Then I became stolid, and spoke no more, except with pointed brevity. Miss Pinkerby offered an opinion on the weather, with which I disagreed. She afterward hinted at the advantages of riding on so lovely a day—a turn of conversation which I did not encourage.

The next day I turned my face in the direction of Franconia. I had yet three weeks for summer recreations, and I craved a brief season of undisturbed happiness.

Very well, then. My friend who reads will be likely to understand that I am somewhat given to fastidiousness. But in the case of Miss Larcher, all afflicting doubts vanished one by one. Her sensitiveness on points of pure feminine taste was very affecting. I gradually melted beneath her influence, and gave myself up to absorption.

Sometimes I obtruded a remonstrance in the matter of trout fishing.

"Oh don't, please don't, Mr. Plimkins," she would say, "you distress me when you speak of it."

"But consider—"

"Now you know I never consider; don't ask me to consider. Besides, I can't spare you. To-morrow we must see the Flume again."

"Some other day, perhaps."

"Next day we do Lafayette. Now tell me, Mr. Plimkins, do I trouble you so much?"

"Trouble? How can you say such things?"

"Well, it seems to me—don't you think, now, that you are tired of running on these foolish expeditions with me?"

"Dear Miss Larcher—"

"I think you want to get back to that horrid brook, with your naughty rod and line, and hurt and kill those sweet little fish that taste so good at tea."

"I want to catch them for your tea."

"No, it is not right, I'm sure."

"Yet you eat them."

"I know, dear Mr. Plimkins, I am very inconsistent; truly I am very bad, but don't scold, please."

Bless my heart!—to scold her. The notion was too wretchedly ridiculous. And so she had every thing her own way.

Ah, those days of sunshine at Franconia! What never-ending delights came crowding along! There was joy in every thing; in the fair lake of echoes, reposing in serene and tranquil beauty, hugged round by giant mountain arms; in the Indians on its shores, who chattered gibberish incomprehensible to themselves, and who sold us, at high prices, untrustworthy baskets and impracticable fans; in the tin horn, at one end of which I used to distort my face and bring on pains of ague, awakening the voices of the everlasting crags near by; in the eccentric cascade, in the neighborhood of which no water had been seen within the memory of residents; in the infantile tame bears, which ate raspberries freely, and tore the garments of those who proffered them; in the hot and weary paths of Cannon Mountain; in the dizzy acclivities and hard-backed ponies of Lafayette; in all that came within the sphere of our consideration.

I was never happier, and I intimated some such idea, in a quiet way, to Miss Larcher. She said she was glad. I remember perfectly well that she said she was glad, and it was on the evening of my sixth blissful day that she told me so.

Six days there were, during which my sun of delight was undimmed. On the seventh there appeared a spot. It was nearly six feet high, and well whiskered; and it displeased me.

It came from New York, and its name was Copsey. Copsey had personal attractions, and a note of introduction to the Larcher family. For these reasons he was permitted to attach himself to the Larcher party. Consequently I reviled him.

Laura was amiable and kind-hearted, I said to myself. I said so because she took this Copsey, who was twice as big as she, under her protection, as it were, and assisted him to enjoy the scenery, and showed him all the lions, including the bears, for an entire day. I did not see her ten minutes, excepting at dinner, and then she outraged my feelings by asking me to help Mr. Copsey to butter.

By the time the gong sounded for tea I was greatly discomfited. I entertained vicious thoughts respecting Copsey. I observed that he was treated with solicitude. As we all turned parlorward I assumed desperation and announced a determination to fish on the morrow.

"What! Oh no, Mr. Plimkins," said Laura, "you will not leave us?"

"No," said I, "but I shall fish."

"Now that is a paradox," said she.

"Can you think it so?" said I.

"But you will not forget your promise," urged she.

"We many of us are apt to be too forgetful," said I.

"That is very true," she answered, penitently, as it seemed—and then, confidingly, "have I done any thing wrong, Mr. Plimkins?"

"What an odd question," I said; "I think I am interrupting you—good-night!"

"Mr. Plimkins," said Laura, pathetically, this time, beyond a doubt, "good-night! if you will say it. I shall breakfast early to-morrow morning—very early—as soon as the gong sounds. You will sit by me?"

Of course there was nothing to be said in return but a full acquiescence. And so I left, and went, not wholly at ease, to newspapers, and finally to bed.

Why need I recall too vividly the alternations of rapture and despair which followed? One day the thermometer of my hope would rise to fever heat; the next, it would sink into the tube out of sight. I longed to vituperate Copsey, who had embittered my existence, but pride restrained me. One day he attempted familiarity with me.

"I think you spoke of fishing?" said he.

"Well, Sir," said I.

"I fish a little," said he; "I should like to join you some day."

"I generally fish in solitude," said I; "and besides, I would not draw you from more refreshing in-door entertainment."

He laughed a little, and pulled the ends of his mustache. I burned with wrath, almost to blazing, and left him for fear I should get put out.

One evening Laura and I stood watching the newly arrived as they descended from the stage-coach. Suddenly she cried out queerly, and darted away. The next instant she was shaking vigorous hands with a male, whose appearance was unprepossessing by reason of dust. She accompanied him within doors, and for an hour was unseen in her accustomed evening resorts. At length she entered the parlor with the stranger, made him known to every one as Mr. Murvison, from New York, and withdrew to a distant corner, shutting herself out from all the world but him.

I felt more kindly toward Copsey, and interchanged some observations with him on the state of the atmosphere.

That night I went to bed in a dismal frame of mind. It was a wonder, now I think of it, I did not go in my hat and boots. I dreamed thus:

I had grown a fin or two, wore scales, and had a floppy tail; yet I retained my individual consciousness. There were others like me. One was whiskered, and I recognized in him the Copsey genus. Another, which I avoided with assiduous care, was of the nature of Murvison. We floated in pellucid waters. We acknowledged an inclination for worms, and yearned for grasshoppers. We were prone to much opening and shutting of the mouth, and other singularities.

We saw appear above us a well-known face surmounted by a well-known hat, and supported by a well-known body, clad in a well-known garb. We were alarmed, but a fascination prevented us from hastening away. Our fins shook with emotion.

Presently we saw a line descend among us. From it depended a hook on which hung bait. Such bait! It was a smile and a sweet word deftly twisted together. I had no power of resistance. I dashed forward and suffered. I felt myself torn from my proper way of life. As I dangled helpless in the air I saw my beautiful captress smiling unconcerned at my agony. Shame and sorrow overcame me. I was trifled with for a while, then disentangled, and cast carelessly aside.

I writhed in blind mortification until a sharp shock roused me. Alas! it was the Copsey gasping and struggling vainly by my side. I wriggled about with some difficulty, and obtained a view of her who had deluded and destroyed us. Her face was mildly radiant as ever, and intent upon the waves below. Then I was reckless. With one impetuous throb of my tail I flung myself in the air, and fell with a dull splash into my element. I was free again.

I woke and found myself on the floor, amidst the shattered fragments of the wash-basin. My dream was over, and the scales had fallen. I was no longer a foolish fish.

The next morning I sought Mr. Copsey and opened the subject of angling. He lifted his eyebrows.

"Are you going?" asked he.

"I am," said I, with energy.

"But," said he, "do you not fish in solitude?"

"Not when I know a companion in distress," said I.

"Then you do not care for more refreshing in-door entertainment?" said he.

My heart ached, but with a degree of self-command that surprised myself, I winked.

"Do you know about Murvison?" he asked.

"Not I," I answered.

"I have just heard," he continued, "that it has long been understood that he is to marry Miss Larcher. They are near neighbors in New York."

"Ah!"

"Yes."

"Let us go fish."

As we stepped from the door we encountered Miss Larcher and Mr. Murvison. I displayed my rod defiantly.

"Going to fish, gentlemen?" she asked, airily.

"We are going to fish, Miss Larcher," I said—

"going to fish for trout."

"Well, together, I think you will get many," she said. "Do try, for Mr. Murvison is very fond of them, and so am I, too, you know, Mr. Plimkins. Now see if you can bring home ever so many."

From that time I caught trout incessantly while I remained in Franconia. I supplied all that the hotel needed, every day, and at the end of a week I wound up my visit with a very large string.

I think that in future I shall fish more than ever.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

THE usual quiet of our domestic affairs has been interrupted by a singular attempt to excite a servile insurrection in Virginia. Among those who bore a prominent part in the disturbances in Kansas, on the anti-slavery side, were John Brown and his seven sons. Two of the sons lost their lives, and the remainder of the family appear to have imbibed a monomaniacal hatred against slavery and slaveholders. The father was the leader of his party in several of the later contests in Kansas, and from his part in one which took place at Ossawatimie he received the sobriquet of "Ossawatimie Brown." After the pacification of Kansas he visited various parts of the country for the purpose of organizing a scheme to aid in the escape of fugitive slaves. He appears to have come in contact with many prominent abolitionists, who regarded him as a harmless monomaniac, and gave little attention to his projects. In May, 1858, a meeting of himself and his confederates was held at Chatham, Canada, where a plan for a Provisional Government of the United States was formed. All residents of the country, whether slave or free, might become members of the association by promising allegiance to the "Provisional Constitution." Brown was named Commander-in-Chief, with almost dictatorial powers. Shortly afterward Brown, with two of his sons, appeared in the vicinity of Harper's Ferry, in Virginia, and under the assumed name of Smith rented a small farm in Maryland, a few miles from the Ferry. Here were gradually collected a considerable quantity of arms and ammunition—rifles, pistols, pikes, cart-ridges, and the like; and a body of 22 men, of whom 17 were whites and 5 colored, joined him from various parts of the country. With these, on the night of October 16, he made a descent upon the town of Harper's Ferry—a place containing about 5000 inhabitants, with a United States arsenal in which more than 100,000 stand of arms are usually stored. The arsenal was left wholly unguarded. The insurgents took possession of the buildings without opposition; and at 10½ o'clock in the evening they arrested the watchman on the railroad bridge, and made arrangements to stop the train about to pass. A part of them then proceeded to the residences of Messrs. Lewis Washington and John Alstadt, wealthy farmers residing within a few miles of the Ferry, made them prisoners, with such of their slaves as they could secure, and brought them to the arsenal. These operations were performed so quietly that no general alarm was aroused during the night. In the morning, the persons connected with the arsenal proceeded to their places of labor, and were one by one captured and secured in the buildings. About 30 persons were thus made prisoners. The alarm became general when it was found that the public edifices were guarded by the armed sentinels of the insurgents. The most exaggerated reports of their force were put in circulation. It was stated that they numbered many hundreds of men fully armed, and that the slaves had risen to support them. It seemed incredible that any such enterprise should be undertaken except by a large force. In the early morning some random firing took place, by which several lives were lost. Military companies from the neighborhood began to arrive about noon of the 17th, and the insurgents were gradually driven within the arsenal grounds, two of their number having been captured. Desultory shots were fired during the course of the day on both sides. One of these, discharged by a son of Brown, killed Mr. Beckham, the Mayor of the town; young Brown was at the same moment shot, and mortally wounded; a rush was then made for the room in which the two insurgent prisoners were confined; one of them, named Thompson, was dragged out, shot upon the bridge, and flung into the river beneath. A successful attack was made upon one of the arsenal buildings, in which most of the prisoners were secured; these were liberated. Some of the more important prisoners were, however, shut up in the engine-house, where the insurgents had been forced to intrench themselves. At 11 p.m. the United States marines, under command of Colonel Lee, arrived, and were posted so as to command the engine-house, which was closely invested during the night. Early in the morning Brown sent out a flag of truce, proposing terms of capitulation. He demanded that his men should be allowed to march out, with their prisoners, unmolested, to a certain point, when the prisoners were to be liberated, and his men should then shift for themselves as they best could. The terms were refused, and preparations were made to storm the engine-house. Cannon could not be used without endangering the safety of the prisoners, and an unsuccessful attempt was made to break down the doors with sledge-hammers. A heavy ladder was then brought up, and used as a battering-ram; the door gave way, and the marines rushed in, in the face of a heavy fire. Brown, who was severely wounded, and Coppie, with two negroes, Green and Copeland, were the only survivors in the engine-house; Stephens had been previously captured. Four men had been sent away the previous day with the slaves who had been seized by the insurgents. Two of these, Cooke and Hazlett, were subsequently taken in Pennsylvania, and surrendered to the authorities of Virginia. The citizens whom they had taken prisoners were released unharmed; they had suffered no ill-treatment beyond their forced detention. The following list contains the names and fate of the persons engaged in this mad undertaking:

1. John Brown, of Essex County, New York, wounded and prisoner.
2. Ottawa Brown, his son, of New York, killed.
3. Watson Brown, ditto ditto killed.
4. Aaron C. Stephens, of Connecticut, mortally wounded.
5. Edwin Coppie, of Iowa, prisoner.
6. Albert Hazlett, of Pennsylvania, killed.
7. William H. Leeman, of Maine, killed.
8. Stewart Taylor, of Canada, killed.
9. Charles P. Tidd, of Maine, killed.
10. William Thompson, of New York, killed.
11. Dolph Thompson, of New York, killed.
12. John H. Kage, of Ohio, killed.
13. Jerry Anderson, of Indiana, killed.
14. Dangerfield Newby, negro, of Ohio, killed.
15. O. P. Anderson, negro, of Pennsylvania, killed.
16. Lewis Leary, negro, of Ohio, killed.
17. Shields Green, alias Emperor, negro, of Pennsylvania, prisoner.
18. — Copeland, negro, of Ohio, prisoner.
19. J. E. Cooke, white man, of Connecticut, prisoner.
20. William Hazlett, alias Harrison, prisoner.
- 21, 22. Two men, names unknown, escaped.

Of the citizens and soldiers seven were killed, and a number wounded.

The Grand Jury of Jefferson County being in session, bills of indictment were found against the prisoners, charging them with inciting slaves to insurrection, with treason, and murder. They demanded to be tried separately, and the Commonwealth elected to try Brown first. He asked for a delay, on account of his severe wounds; this was refused by the Court, and the trial commenced on the 26th of October. The prisoner, who was unable to sit, lay upon a mattress. The trial lasted three days, and Brown was found guilty upon all the counts in the indictment, and sentenced to be executed on the 2d of December. In reply to the formal question why sentence should not be pronounced, Brown said that his sole object was to free slaves; but that he had no intention to incite them to revolt or to commit murder. He justified this action. Had he interfered, he said, thus in behalf of the rich and powerful, he would have been applauded; and if it was necessary for the ends of justice that his life should be taken, he was content. As to the treatment he had received on his trial, it had been more generous than he could have expected.

Elections during the month of October were held in Iowa and Minnesota, where the Republicans were successful; in Pennsylvania, for State officers and members of the Legislature, resulting in favor of the Opposition; in Maryland, for members of Congress and of the Legislature; the Congressional representation stands as before—three Democrats and three Americans; in the State Legislature the Democrats have a majority; last year they were in a decided minority. In Baltimore the election was characterized by more than the usual amount of riots and disturbance; organized bands of ruffians belonging to the dominant American party surrounded the polls and prevented their opponents from depositing their ballots. Several persons were killed, and many others severely injured.

A correspondence, which has not been published, but which is represented to be of somewhat threatening character, has taken place between our Government and that of Great Britain in relation to the San Juan affair.—Mr. Ward, our Minister to China, had an interview, by appointment, on the 8th July, with the Government of the Chinese province of Chihli. The Governor seemed anxious to explain the conduct of the Chinese at the battle of the Peiho, and to learn the intentions of the French and English ambassadors; Mr. Ward replied that he came to attend to the business of his country, and knew nothing of the purposes of the other Powers; the difficulties between them and the Chinese must be settled by themselves. He was pursuing the course marked out by the treaty with the Americans, and hoped that the Chinese Government would abide by the stipulations of that treaty, and furnish him with the means of going to Peking. The Governor replied that the treaty was to be ratified at Peking; but Mr. Ward could not be allowed to proceed thither until the arrival of the Chinese Commissioners from Shanghai, who had been appointed to be his escort. Mr. Ward said that it was not respectful to his Government that he should be kept waiting for more than a month the arrival of the Commissioners. The Governor finally consented that if the Commissioners did not make their appearance in ten days Mr. Ward might then proceed to the capital. Permission to this effect was received from Peking; and on the 20th Mr. Ward and suite set out. Indirect accounts of his arrival and courteous reception have been received, but they contain no particulars.

SOUTHERN AMERICA.

Although no decisive measures have been undertaken in Mexico, every thing indicates that the contest between the parties must soon be settled. We therefore present a general view of the present position of the belligerents: Mexico now consists of 28 States and Departments, containing 115,000 square leagues, with an estimated population of 8,550,000 inhabitants. Of these the party of Juarez, known as "Constitutionalists" or "Liberals," hold 23 States, comprising six-sevenths of the territory, and a little more than half of the population. They hold all the ports of the republic, with the single exception of San Blas, on the Pacific. The States held by the adherents of Miramon—the "Church" or "Conservative" party—are those lying immediately around the capital, and are by far the richest and most densely-populated parts of the republic. Strictly speaking, however, only the principal towns even in these States are in the possession of the Conservatives, the intervening country being overrun by guerrilla bands of the other party. There is little harmony between the various Liberal chiefs, while those of the Church party are more united. The command of the wealth and influence of the clergy also gives them a considerable advantage over their opponents. The seat of government of the Liberals is at Vera Cruz, that of the Conservatives being at Mexico. Each party, at the latest dates, was making preparations to attack the other at its seat of government. In the absence of foreign intervention, the greater wealth, unity, and concentration of the Church party renders its position the most advantageous. The Government of Miramon has just concluded a treaty with Spain, by which the former promises full indemnity for losses sustained by Spanish subjects owing to the non-fulfillment of former treaties; in case of differences arising respecting the amount, the question to be referred to the Emperor of the French or the Queen of England. Our Minister, Mr. McLane, has returned to Mexico with assurances which are supposed to render certain the conclusion of a treaty with the liberal Government.

EUROPE.

The text of the treaty arranged at Zurich between France, Austria, and Sardinia has not yet been officially made known. According to abstracts which appear to be reliable, it merely re-affirms the agreement entered into at Villafranca, but leaves the question of the future condition of Italy to be decided by a European Congress. Austria gives up Lombardy, with the exception of Mantua and Peschiera, to France, who transfers it to Sardinia. Of the Lombard debt 250,000,000 francs are to be transferred to Sardinia. France and Austria are to endeavor to bring about a reform in the administration of the States of the Church. The rights of the Dukes of Tuscany, Modena, and Parma are to be reserved for the special consideration of the two Emperors, who are, moreover, to endeavor to bring about an Italian Confederation, of which Venetia, under Austrian supremacy, is to form a member. The great Italian question thus remains undecided, and a collision may at any moment take place, which will again throw Europe into a state of war. The internal affairs of the Papal States, and the relations between them and Sardinia appear to present the most immediate points of danger. The Emperor Napoleon, in reply to a speech from the Archbishop of Bordeaux, extolling the Pope, expressed himself with great caution. He hoped that the whole world would soon share his conviction that the temporal power of the Holy Father was not opposed to the liberty and independence of Italy. The Government which replaced the Pope on his throne could only interfere in his administration by respectful counsel. The Holy Father looked with anxiety to the day when Rome should be evacuated by the French troops. That day must soon come, for Europe could not consent that this occupation, which had already lasted for ten years, should be indefinitely prolonged. But when the army withdrew, what would succeed it? Would it be anarchy, terror, or peace? To this significant question the Emperor ventured to give no definite reply; but the fact that military and naval preparations are pushed forward in France with uninterrupted vigor indicates that, in the opinion of the Emperor, the peace of Europe is by no means placed upon a firm basis. In the mean time the Sardinian Government is making preparations which look to the renewal of hostilities. The new army will consist of 100,000 men, and the National Guards will number 600,000. The King, in reply to a deputation from the municipality of Genoa, affirmed his determination to defend the cause of Italian independence to the utmost of his power, and expressed a hope that the wishes of Italy would be granted by the European powers. The deputies of Parma and Tuscany have been admitted to interviews with the Emperor Napoleon. They assure their constituents that the Emperor remains faithful to his promise to protect the Italian cause, and are assured that the principle upon which the whole hangs—that of non-intervention by arms—will receive no injury from any quarter whatever. —Garibaldi has made a speech in which he sets forth his view of Italian prospects. He says: "Events are progressing favorably, but there is yet much to be done. The day is come in which Italy must regain its independence. This time it must be accomplished, and from the Alps to Sicily she must be free. Providence has given us the man we needed to re-knit us together. It is around Victor Emanuel that we must rally to repulse the stranger from our soil. Let him but retire, and leave us to enjoy our possessions in peace, and we will at once welcome him as a friend; but so long as he desires to subject us to his dominion he has nothing to expect from us but the fire of our artillery. Before every thing it is imperative that we should all be soldiers. Our entire nation must form one army; and if domestic duties detain a few round the family hearth, let them remain there like soldiers, musket or sword in hand. Fifteen days are enough to render a brave Italian a brave soldier. But we want arms; and that this want may exist no longer, I have proposed that Italy should form a subscription to purchase a million of muskets." Subscriptions to purchase these muskets pour in; the municipality of Milan has furnished 100,000 francs for this object.

Difficulties have for some time existed between Spain and Morocco, growing out of attacks made by the Barbary pirates upon the Spanish possessions. After a series of unsatisfactory negotiations, the Spanish Government has announced its intention of commencing hostilities against Morocco. This step, it is reported, meets with the approbation of the French Government, which has also some dispute with the Moors. The English papers see in this movement a hostile demonstration against Great Britain, thinking that it looks to new acquisitions of territory in Africa by France.

From Great Britain there is no intelligence of special importance. It is not probable that the steamer Grent Eastern will be sent across the Atlantic before spring.—The official correspondence between the Government and its officials in China in respect to the battle of the Pei-ho has been published. Mr. Bruce, the English Commissioner, says that there was no doubt felt either by himself or on board the fleet that the force sent against the forts was amply sufficient for their reduction, and that he is willing to accept the responsibility of the measures taken by the Admiral. Lord John Russell's reply virtually approves of the course taken, notwithstanding its disastrous result, and says that active preparations are being made, in conjunction with the French Government, to bring the Chinese to terms.—The strike of the London builders still continues, and there begins to be great distress among the workmen; resolutions have been adopted appealing to the public for subscriptions for their support.

Literary Notices.

Women Artists in all Ages and Countries, by Mrs. ELLET. (Published by Harper and Brothers.) Although neither in art nor in poetry have the most splendid honors been accorded to the genius of woman, yet in each department she has won that eminence which makes the record of her achievements a worthy theme of biographical description. In the present volume Mrs. Ellet has collected the memorials of the most distinguished female artists in every period of history, furnishing a mass of curious information which has never before been given to the world in a compact form. Her materials have been sought, with patient assiduity, from a wide range of authorities, and have been wrought up into the attractive shape in which they are found with the literary tact and skill which usually mark the productions of the author. The reader will be surprised to meet with so many names, of which he had probably never heard before, that have attained distinction in art. The record commences with Callirhoe, the daughter of the Grecian Dibutades, and closes with the promising young American, Harriet Hosmer, of Massachusetts.

The first sculptress of whom history has preserved an account was the daughter of Erwin von Stienbach, of Strasburg, who has left a glorious monument to his genius in the cathedral of that city. She aided in the ornamentation of that noble building, and her sculptured groups have been admired by visitors during the lapse of ages. Toward the close of the fifteenth century Italy produced the first woman who gained reputation as a sculptor in that land of beauty and art. This was Propertina di Rossi, born in Bologna in 1490, who added to rare loveliness of person and brilliant female accomplishments the artistic gifts which made her the object of admiration and pride among all her contemporaries. She began with the minute carving of peach-stones; and, among other specimens of her skill, executed a crucifixion of Christ, comprising a number of figures—executioners, disciples, women, and soldiers—equally remarkable for its effective grouping and its delicate finish. She next undertook the decoration of the Church of San Petronio, in Bologna, for which she completed some exquisite works; but falling a victim to unrequited love, she died in the early blossoming of her fame. Another Italian female artist of this period was Marietta Robusti, the daughter of the great painter Tintoretto, who, cherishing the most enthusiastic affection for her father, inherited no small share of his talent. Her person was beautiful; her soft, musical voice was a fit accompaniment to the lute and other instruments, on which she was an accomplished performer; and her devotion to art was exceeded only by her filial attachment. It was no wonder that she was the joy and pride of her father. She followed him, dressed as a boy, wherever he went; his pictures fed her young imagination with forms of beauty; whether he labored at his models, or studied the antique statues, or casts from Michael Angelo, the coloring of Titian, or the nude figure, she was by his side, noting his first sketch in the moment of creation, and watching the progress of its execution. She soon attained his wonderful freedom in handling the brush, his strength and precision in drawing, and his richness of coloring. Devoting herself chiefly to portraits, she astonished even her father by her success; and it soon became the rage among the Venetian aristocracy to be painted by Marietta.

The family of Anguisciola, in the sixteenth century, was celebrated for six daughters, all gifted in music and painting. Of these the best known was Sofonisba, born in Cremona, between 1530 and 1540. Her artistic talent was developed at an early age. While yet in her girlhood she attracted the notice of princes. She was received with honor at courts, and was rewarded with high honors and profitable appointments from her royal patrons. Her paintings were remarkable for boldness and freedom. In some of her pieces the figures seemed almost to breathe. She attained great success in comic, as well as in more serious productions. In the latter years of her life she was deprived of sight, but retained her intellectual faculties, her love of art, and her relish for the society of its professors. The réunions in her house were attended to the last by distinguished painters from every quarter. Vandyke was frequently her guest, and was accustomed to say that he had received more light from this blind old woman than from all his studies of the great masters.

One of the most celebrated women of the sixteenth century was Lavinia Fontana, who was born in Bologna in 1552. She painted in the style of Carracci, and some of her pictures, in softness, sweetness, and tenderness have even been compared to those of Guido Reni. To delicacy of touch she united rare skill in taking likenesses. The first ladies in Rome sought to become her sitters, and the greatest Cardinals were ambitious to have their portraits executed by her hand. Her portraits were displayed in the galleries of the nobility and the most cultivated persons in the land. She also produced several compositions on sacred subjects, some of which are now in Bologna. In her later works she acquired a softness and warmth of coloring that remind one of the masters of the Venetian school.

About a century later (1640) was born Elisabetta Sirani, one of the most gifted women who, in any age or nation, have devoted themselves to the fine arts. She was a pupil of Guido Reni, from whom she imbibed an exquisite sense of the beautiful, and a peculiar gift of reproducing it. To this she added a vigor and energy rare in a woman. With the gift of genius she combined singular personal loveliness. She was admired for her gracious and cheerful spirit, her prompt judgment, and enthusiastic attachment to her art. Her devoted filial affection, her feminine grace, and the charming kindness of her manners, completed a character which her friends regarded as an ideal of perfection. This fascinating artist was snatched from her friends in the flush of early womanhood by a cruel and mysterious fate. It is supposed by some that her sudden death was a base murder, and that she was the victim of professional jealousy. No clear light, however, has been thrown on the unhappy event.

Passing rapidly over the intervening period, we find the nineteenth century signalized by several living female artists of eminent distinction. Among these one of the most remarkable is Felicie de Fauveau, who was born in Tuscany, but taken when an infant to Paris, where her education commenced. She was brought up in devout loyalty to the ancient monarchy and the Roman Catholic Church. Her studies were varied and profound. Ancient history, the classics, modern languages, heraldry, and archaeology, by turns, received her attention. She had the faculty of coloring with skill, and might have been a great painter had she not resolved to be a sculptor. Her taste led her to adopt the mediæval manner, and she took Benevenuto Cellini for her prototype, occupying herself with art in both its monumental and decorative character. The first work she exhibited was a group from Scott's novel, "The Abbot." This was followed by a group of six figures in bas-relief, consisting of Christina of Sweden and Monaldeschi in the fatal gallery of Fontainebleau. It at once challenged universal admiration, and was hailed as the brightest promise of future excellence. She was but a girl in the bloom of early youth when she won this triumph, and the appreciation she met with confirmed her unchangeable devotion to her chosen career. Felicie remained with her family in Paris until 1830. Her mother's house was the centre of a delightful circle of persons of high rank, of cultivated women, and of accomplished artists. The friends assembled of an evening in their drawing-room would gather round a large centre-table, and improvise drawings in pencil, chalk, and pen and ink; or would model in clay or wax, brooches and ornaments, sword handles and scabbards, dagger-hilts, etc. The young artist wished to revive the days when sculpture lent its aid to the gold and silver smith, the jeweler, the clock-maker, and the armorer. A great impulse was thus given to the taste for reviving mediæval fashions for ornaments, and also mediæval feelings and aspirations, which at last found expression in Puseyism in religion, and Pre-Raphaelitism in art. In the midst of her brilliant career the Revolution of 1830 broke out, establishing Louis Philippe on the throne of France. With her ardent devotion to the Bourbon cause, this was to her a personal calamity. She was at length induced to take part in a conspiracy for the restoration of the fallen house, and, after an imprisonment of several months, was forced to leave Paris. She first took refuge in Switzerland, and finally went to Florence, where she fixed her permanent abode with her mother and brother. Here for a long time she suffered from extreme poverty, until, by her great success as a sculptor, she achieved a modest independence. At present she is pursuing her art with indefatigable zeal, scarcely allowing herself a moment's relaxation. Her principal associates are a few of the higher church dignitaries, and two or three distinguished Italian or foreign families. Retirement is agreeable to her, and her political opinions have drawn around her a line of demarkation. Still she is beloved by many, and admired and appreciated by all, leading an honored life, which seems a realized dream of work, progress, and success.

Not a little romantic interest is attached to the career of Harriet Hosmer, the distinguished American sculptress. She was born in Watertown, near Boston, Massachusetts, in 1831. Her father was a physician in that place, who, having lost wife and child by consumption, was determined to guard his surviving daughter by a vigorous physical training. He gave her horse, dog, gun, and boat, and insisted upon an out-door life as indispensable to health. She early manifested a taste for modeling and collecting curious specimens of the animal creation. Her love of practical jokes was so great that the schools in the vicinity of Boston found her an inconvenient pupil. She was then placed under the care of Mrs. Sedgwick in Lenox, who was requested to make the health of the rapid damsel the first consideration, and permit her to ride and walk, shoot and swim to her heart's content. Here she formed an intimacy with Mrs. Fanny Kemble, whose influence tended to confirm her already decided tastes and habits. It was mainly her encouragement which induced her to adopt sculpture as a profession, and devote her life to the pursuit of art. At the age of nineteen she left Lenox, and returned to her father's house in Watertown, where she commenced in earnest the preparation for her career. With a cousin, who was studying medicine with her father, she spent many hours in dissecting legs and arms, and in making acquaintance with the human frame. Lessons in drawing and modeling, and her anatomical studies, were alternated with the rides and boating on which her father wisely insisted. She was now sent to St. Louis for the purpose of going through a regular course of instruction under Dr. M'Dowell, professor of anatomy in the college, who was an old friend of her father's. Here she remained for several months, pursuing her studies with unflinching diligence; and at the close was presented with a diploma, testifying to her anatomical proficiency. After leaving St. Louis in 1851 she commenced modeling an ideal bust of Hesper, which she finished with complete success within a year. "Now," said she to her father, "I am ready to go to Rome." "And you shall go, my child, this very autumn," was the reply. The father and daughter were soon on their way to Europe, and arrived in Rome in the autumn of 1852. Since that time the career of Miss Hosmer has been a series of successes. Her productions evince a remarkable versatility of talent, and are no less admirable in execution than felicitous in conception.—The lover of art can not fail to give a cordial welcome to the volume, in which the authoress has associated her own name with so many noble examples of female genius, reflecting equal honor on womanly character and the claims of art.

Ticknor and Fields have issued a new volume of poems by JOHN G. SAXE, entitled The Money-King, and Other Poems, containing the greater part of the productions of the author since the publication of his previous popular collection. The principal poems in the volume have already attained a wide celebrity from their recitation on different public occasions. Of the remainder some of the most striking are: "I'm Growing Old," "My Castle in Spain," "A Reflective Retrospect," "How the Money Goes," "Town and Country." They all evince the satirical keenness, playful humor, variety of diction, and ease of versification for which the author is noted.

The Palace of the Great King, by the Rev. HOLLIS READ. (Published by Charles Scribner.) In this volume the discoveries of natural science are applied to the illustration of the power, wisdom, and goodness of the Creator. The author has availed himself of the results of modern research to give novelty and interest to his theme, and the study of his work is equally adapted to enlarge the sphere of knowledge and to quicken the religious sentiments.

The Wheat Plant, by JOHN H. KLIPPART (published by A. O. Moore and Co.), is an exhaustive monograph on the important cereal to which it is devoted. It gives a complete view of the origin and history of the wheat plant, describes its structure and composition, and explains the conditions of its successful cultivation. Several facts of interest with regard to the production of wheat in the United States are furnished in the course of the volume. While the wheat crop of England has increased at least fifty per cent. in the last century, that of the United States has fallen off in nearly the same proportion. Within a hundred years wheat was raised in New England, Delaware, and Virginia, as an ordinary crop; now a wheat-field is a rarity in those States, and they may be considered as no longer wheat-growing regions. Portions of New York that formerly produced thirty bushels to the acre now seldom average over eight bushels; and even Ohio, with her comparatively unexhausted soil, does not average over thirteen bushels to the acre. Illinois is behind Tennessee and Kentucky in the production of wheat, the former State growing less than seven bushels to each inhabitant, while Tennessee produces nine bushels, and Kentucky seven and a half. The remedy for this deterioration in the celebrated soils of the West is to be found in an improved system of scientific culture, the principles of which are discussed at length by the writer.

Poems, by JAMES CLARENCE MANGAN. (Published by P. M. Haverty.) In the biographical introduction to this volume, by Mr. John Mitchel, we find an interesting sketch of the author, one of the wayward sons of genius whose imagination outruns their discretion, and whose poetry is better than their life. Clarence Mangan was born in Dublin, about the year 1803. He was of humble parentage, and after picking up the rudiments of an imperfect education in a boys' school in his native city, was employed for several years as a copyist in the office of a scrivener. He subsequently gained a scanty livelihood by toiling as an attorney's clerk—though of this period of his life little is known, except that he was accustomed to speak of it with loathing and horror. He was a shy and sensitive youth, keenly susceptible to external impressions, and of a gentle and unexact disposition. An early disappointment in love, by which he became the victim of a fair deceitful tyranness, seems to have made his subsequent life bitter and desperate. The brightness of the universe was clouded by this event; and from that time the natural impulses of his heart were chilled. When Mr. Mitchel first made his acquaintance he had the air of a stricken and withered man. He never loved, and hardly looked upon any woman forever more. True, he did not gnash his teeth and beat his breast before the public, nor make himself and his sorrows the burden of his song; but life was henceforth a dreary and painful passage to the grave. He was wretched in his home; betrayed at his need by a friend; and then baffled, mocked, and alone amidst the wrecks of his world, it is certainly not wonderful, however pitiable, that "he sought at times to escape from consciousness by taking for bread opium, and for water brandy." In the year 1830, when he was about twenty-seven years of age, he began to contribute short poems—usually translations from the German or Irish—to a small weekly periodical in Dublin. In spite of his faults he made friends with some of the literary men of that metropolis, and through their influence obtained employment in the University Library in the preparation of a new catalogue. As seen one day by his biographer, "perched on the top of a ladder, in that vast repository, he was an unearthly and ghostly figure, in a brown garment; the same garment (to all appearance) which lasted till the day of his death; the blanched hair was totally unkempt; the corpse-like features still as marble; a large book was in his arms, and all his soul was in the book." Here he labored mechanically, and dreamed—roosting on a ladder—for months, perhaps years; combining two lives in his own person—one well known to the Muses, the other to the police—one soaring to the empyrean, the other too often lying in the gutters of the streets. "No purer and more benignant spirit ever alighted upon earth; no more abandoned wretch ever found earth a purgatory and a hell." With all his misery he had no malignity, sought no revenge, never wrought sorrow and suffering to any human being but himself. In his struggle with the world he wore no air of defiance; but was always humble, affectionate, almost prayerful. He continued his contributions to various periodicals, became deeply interested in the political struggles of Ireland, though without taking an active part in them, until his life was wasted and gone, his intellect drugged in the lethargy of opium, and his whole soul weighed down by the wretched body to which it was chained. "Some friends he still had, who regarded him with a reverential compassion and wonder, and would have felt pride in giving him a shelter and a home. But sometimes he could not be found for weeks, and then he would reappear, like a ghost or a ghoul, with a wildness in his blue, glittering eye, as of one who has seen spectres; and nothing gives so ghastly an idea of his condition of mind as the fact that the insane orgies of this rarely-gifted creature were transacted in the lowest and obscurest taverns, and in company with the offal of the human species." But the sad tragedy was near its close. After an attack of cholera, brought on by a lack of proper nourishment, his friends found him at a hospital, utterly destitute, and nearly at the last stage. He lingered for a few days, and died June 20, 1849.—The selections from his writings in this volume consist principally of translations from the celebrated master-pieces of German poetry, interspersed with original compositions of a striking character. He evidently possessed the soul of the poet, his imagination was fired by the glow of passion, and his most characteristic effusions were inspired by the bitterness of experience rather than the promptings of a superficial fancy. According to Mr. Mitchel, they possess "that marvelous charm which makes him the household and heart-enshrined darling of many an Irish home. I have never yet met," he tells us, "a cultivated Irish man or woman, of genuine Irish nature, who did not prize Clarence Mangan above all the poets that their island of song ever nursed."

Gold-Foil, Hammered from Popular Proverbs, by TIMOTHY TITCOMB. (Published by Charles Scribner.) The author of this volume, a distinguished journalist in Massachusetts, and who has recently won an enviable reputation as a poet by the brilliant and original production entitled "Bitter-Sweet," here assumes the functions of a popular moralist. He exhibits many qualities which admirably fit him for this important but ungrateful office. With a decidedly contemplative turn of mind, a love of looking at the different aspects of a subject in various lights, he combines a keen, though not unkindly, observation of human nature, a confirmed habit of reflecting on social phenomena, and a practical common-sense view of the duties and purposes of life. He places himself on a level with the generality of readers, without aiming at philosophic depth or ideal elevation. His remarks are often original, though seldom startling, and never tainted with the love of paradox—that frequent bane of popular essayists. In the expression of his opinions he is often positive even to dogmatism, and in many cases calls forth the opposition of the reader instead of producing conviction. The volume, in the main, is of a wholesome tendency, and will doubtless command a large circulation.

Editor's Table.

HOUSEHOLD NAMES AND DATES.—The names of our kindred and friends seem to be as much a part of themselves as their features or their skin. In fact, so close is the connection between their names and themselves that it is hard to conceive of them apart; and it needs no little amount of effort to realize the unquestionable truth not only that most of us had existence before we had our present names, but that not many centuries ago the present mode of naming people began, and before the tenth century surnames were unknown among our European ancestors. Thus, if our Washington had flourished in the England of the tenth century, instead of the America of the eighteenth century, he would have been called simply by his baptismal name, with, perhaps, the addition of his residence; and, according to ancient usage, he would now be known as George, of Mount Vernon, instead of George Washington. Mr. Buckle is probably right in ascribing the general introduction of family or surnames, after the tenth century, to the rise of that secular liberty that afterward so mightily confronted the Church, and thus early began to question its exclusive prerogative, by adding the name of the family to that given in baptism. It is clear, as he remarks, that the habit of classing relatives together thus by a common family name must tend strongly to band them together, and often make the affinities of blood tell against the pretensions of the priesthood. The history of England for ages certainly illustrates the power of such surnames; and very often the feuds both of politics and war have turned upon family interests, and so lifted certain family names into rallying words and war-cries. The tables are now so turned as to reverse the ancient custom, and our conspicuous men are far better known by their surnames than by their baptismal or Christian names. We call the father of our country Washington, and never use the "George" by itself; and no audience would know what a speaker meant if he were, in describing our two great statesmen and orators, to speak of Henry and Daniel, instead of adding the Clay and Webster. Whether we like them or not, we are all born to the inheritance of our surnames, and the tribes of Finns, Goslings, Slys, Shirts, and Slaughters, and the like, have their unromantic names from birth by the same hereditary title that hands down the euphonious appellatives of the Courtenays and Montmorencies, the Fitzwilliams and De Veres.

In given (or Christian) names the choice is left to us; and there is now, moreover, greater latitude than in old times, when the Romish Church claimed to name each child from the saint's day nearest its birth; or when the Puritan confessors looked with equal reverence and exclusiveness to the worthies of Scripture, and thought no words inharmonious that repeated the virtues of the Gideons, Lots, Ebenezers, Obadiahs, Hannahs, Abigails, and Mehetabels in their households. Great liberty of choice is now given us; and we do most heartily urge upon our readers the duty of using this liberty wisely and conscientiously, quite well satisfied that not a few of those who bear through life some odd or discordant proof of their parents' caprice or folly will say Amen to our words, and think of this article gratefully every time they are spoken to by name. The mischief that has been done by ugly or pretentious appellatives can not be done away without the desperate resort of an appeal to the Legislature; yet a little common sense can easily prevent the repetition of the mischief in time to come.

What name shall we give to our child? is a question that is asked about as often as the fact of a birth, and very often answered very strangely by quite sensible people. We have not a long catalogue of pet names to propose, but we have a few practical principles to present, that may be none the less serviceable because somewhat obvious. It must be remembered, first of all, that a name is not for an hour nor a day, nor for a romance nor an epic poem, but for a lifetime, and probably a lifetime of commonplace tenor, without startling incident or heroic achievement. Now what is to be constantly upon the lips ought to be free from all disagreeable peculiarities and exacting associations. To call a boy Job, or Zerubbabel, or Nebuchadnezzar once, to illustrate some passing freak of his conduct or hap of his fortune, may do well enough; but to fix such a name upon him for life is exposing him to mortification as frequent as the wind. To go to the opposite extreme is equally unwise, and we invite ridicule quite as much by sonorous pretension as by harsh homeliness. Thus the names of Julius Cæsar, Pompey, Cato, Brutus, and the like, are generally dismissed from household use among us on account of their being over-ambitious, and are more frequently given in satire than in seriousness. The names of our great modern heroes and sages are liable to the same objection, unless they have become so common as to fail to suggest any direct association with the originals. Thus it may be that Calvin and Luther, Milton, Franklin, and Washington have ceased to suggest the characters that first bore them, and are therefore as meaningless as James or John, Thomas or Peter. Yet, in marked cases, even these familiar names become embarrassing; and if the new Martin Luther is found making friends with the Pope, or John Calvin preaches universal salvation, or John Milton grinds scissors, or Benjamin Franklin or George Washington turns monarchist or defaulter, the association of ideas becomes somewhat embarrassing. The names of less familiar notables may be sometimes more objectionable; and whenever they suggest characters that are the reverse of the new namesakes they are offensive. To name a boy Napoleon or Wellington, when there is not the most distant expectation of his being a great soldier; or to call some little baby Dickens or Thackeray, when it is doubtful whether any grain of humor or pathos will ever go with the word, is almost cruel; and, in fact, a peculiarly sober face would be made, in spite of itself, amusing, if stamped with the letters of one of those great humorists. Sometimes, indeed, a name may do something to mould the character, by creating a definite anticipation and cherishing a congenial purpose, as in the case of many of the Old Testament worthies, who were born under providential auspices, and so named as to declare their mission. But not to insist upon the prophetic or miraculous marks of their future career, such persons were generally more noted for moral and religious traits than intellectual gifts; and it is very clear that whatever encourages the young to cultivate certain moral qualities must do much to shape the character, so that names of moral and religious promise may have the effect which they suggest. But such effects belong to a peculiar people and age, and we do not see any very decided proofs that the girls and boys who bear the most saintly names in the calendar are, on that account, any nearer the saintly graces. Intellectual gifts, moreover, follow a still more occult law of descent; and if hereditary blood can not transmit genius the baptismal font will not be likely to do it; so that if our poets and orators often have proxy children, we do not think that parents who are not poets or orators can make Shakespeares or Miltons of their children by giving them those illustrious names as incentives.

Decided thus in our principle that a name should be neither homely nor ambitious, but at once simple and agreeable, so as to slip pleasantly from the tongue and agree with the general tone of our current human life, we are ready to give a few hints upon the application of the principle. Clearly every child, as being a distinct personality, is entitled to a distinct name; and the main point is to choose what his distinctive name shall be. The parents may run through the list of apostles, prophets, patriarchs, and saints, and choose by the ear, or by some family association, according to their taste; or they may look over the records of their own ancestry, and see what names are most noted or worthy, and be especially careful to perpetuate such ancestral names as are in danger of becoming extinct; or they may follow out some choice line of affinity, whether local or national, and perhaps secure originality without oddity. It is well for us, who are mainly of the Anglo-Saxon or Germanic races, to think more of the desirableness of our own simple and beautiful ancestral appellatives, and to resist the recent passion for the florid words of France and Italy. We wish to see more Alfreds and Harolds, Edwins and Hermanns, Berthas, Ediths, and the like, although it may lose us some Marie Antoinettes and Eugenias, Alphonsos and Ferdinands. The best names, however, seem to have the freedom of all civilized nations; and, with some modifications, our James, John, Henry, William, Mary, Ellen, etc., are known the world over. It is well to add as many as possible to the number; and we do not quarrel with the new candidates for favor that carry a little touch of romance with them, without drawing too much upon our tongue or our fancy. To this class belong Harold and Ernest, Maude, Mabel, Blanche, and many others. One, however, is sure to be in good taste by choosing one of the simple common names; and the parents who call their child William or Henry or Mary or Ellen can not go astray. Far better be content with this simplicity than follow the too frequent American habit of consulting the last romance or the Biographical Dictionary for out-of-the-way words. Girls suffer most in this way; and one's ear sickens at the surfeit of sweets in the catalogues of our female schools and academies, which abound in superfluous appellatives, in comparison with which the old-school euphuisms, such as Angelina Seraphina and Laura Matilda, are commonplace words. If a parent wishes an original name for a child, it can readily be secured by making a Christian name of some family surname or some ancestral seat or association. Camden mentions an instance of a knight in Cheshire, each of whose sons took different surnames; while their sons, in turn, also took names different from their fathers. They altered their names, he says, in respect to habitation, to Egerton, Cotgrove, and Overton; in respect to color, to Gough (which is red); in respect to learning, to Ken-clarke (a knowing clerk, or learned man); in respect to quality, to Goodman; in respect to stature, to Richard Little; and in respect to the Christian name of the father of one of them, to Richardson, although all of them were descended from one person, William Belevard. Our surnames can not be thus changed; but our proper names can be chosen at will, and a great number of suitable proper names might at once be added to our stock, by making proper names of the most desirable surnames on the ancestral roll. Thus, if John Smith marries Mary Vernon, how easy it is to pay a tribute to the good mother by calling the eldest boy Vernon Smith, instead of adding one more to the thousands of John Smiths who are dunned for each other's debts, and pestered with each other's letters.

This variety, however, may be as well secured by a judicious choice of middle names, such as was common among the Romans, and is now coming into wide use. The Romans gave each child a proper name (prænomen), and also the family name (nomen), frequently with the addition of a second family name referring to the gens (or clan) to which the family belonged (cognomen); while, in case of marked persons, a fourth name (agnomen) was added, corresponding somewhat to our habit of calling distinguished men by their characteristic trait or their most conspicuous achievement. We might very easily, and perhaps wisely, revive this Roman usage, and give children, besides their one proper name and that of the family, a middle name, taken from the most important ancestor or the most characteristic branch that has been grafted into the family tree. No harm would be done if several, or even all the children had the same middle name. The mother's own family name may furnish the needed cognomen; and if variety is needed, it may be, according to a frequent classic usage, found in the name of the father's mother or the mother's mother, so as to perpetuate in the children the ancestral surnames on the paternal and maternal side. Such a custom does good by cherishing a proper family feeling, and suggesting the important truth that a man's blood is a fact significant enough to be looked after, whether to correct failings or to encourage virtues that run in its arteries. For no idea can be more false than the frequent notion that each person is a separate individuality, with no antecedent history and no inherited dispositions of body or mind. Each person is the growth of his own family or combination of families; and to neglect the study of pedigree, is to be more negligent of the welfare of men than we are negligent of horses, cows, sheep, and even of swine. Our blood, indeed, so far as it is a fact of the past, we can not help, but we must make the best of it; and in order to make the best of it, we must know what it is. We do not blame families of noble lineage for thinking well of their ancestry, but let them think well in thinking wisely; and it is wise to use an honored ancestry not to pamper an idle pride, that could never have made them honored, but to encourage the worthy traits that perpetuate honor and put away shame. We must remember, however, that noble things have been done in our day as well as in William the Conqueror's time or in the Crusades; and that it is far better for a family to build its name upon some recent or present fact of heroism or usefulness than to pay the Herald's College for inventing a coat-of-arms by stealing the quarterings of some bloody old warrior whose bones were dust before the parvenu's name was heard of. In our own country it would please us to see more willingness to own up what we really are, instead of pretending to be somebody else. Why not take the family crest or seal from some brave thing done in our day? Let our Astors take the beaver as their device, if the family name rests upon the fur trade; and let the Fultons take the steam-boat; and the Franklins the electric kite; and the Morses the magnetic telegraph. Nay, if a family owes its position to a stout ship-carpenter or a brave sea-captain, let the sons and daughters put on their seal and their carriage—if they put any thing on—a broad axe or a rudder, to show that, if they have never done much of any thing themselves, they come of good blood, and the old man was at work in earnest, and left them and the world better off by his pluck.

It is to be hoped that the present revival of genealogical studies, the frequency of family histories and conventions, will do something to enrich our household nomenclature. They who are called the old families have always known their titular wealth, and have tried to keep alive the memory of the chief notables of their blood by the baptismal register. In some cases the names of half a dozen children embody the family history for the centuries since America was known, representing at once the Colonial and Revolutionary worthies, and those also who in trade or the professions have won for themselves a position since the National Independence. Yet most of us Americans, if we would only know it, belong to families quite as old, and we have ancestors who did their part alike in the Colonial, Revolutionary, and National times, although their part may not be matter of public note. To us their history is none the less interesting from their comparative obscurity; and a good account of their traits, manners, pursuits, connections, and fortunes, might not only amuse, but instruct and warn and encourage us. Some stout old citizen or faithful matron might reappear, in spirit as in word, among our own sons and daughters; and so our family record, by a judicious choice, might be a chronicle of the old times as well as a promise of the new. Yet we would by no means favor the custom of continuing precisely the same names in a family, so as to make it necessary to say Junior or Senior to distinguish between father and son, or use numerals to prevent confusion between neighbors; but we would endeavor to make every child's name in some respect unique, so as to prevent all confusion between different members of the same family, or members of different families. The most ludicrous and often the most annoying mistakes arise from identity of names, and John Smith is by no means the only form in which the old comedy of the two Dromios is repeated. A friend of ours, who has a name by no means very common, complains of being dunned, sued, made love to, and condoled with, by being confounded with two or three persons of the same name. In some cases, where no such practical mistakes can occur, the home affections are sadly disturbed by giving the name of a deceased child to the next-born, so as quite to do away the idea of the continuance of personal identity and regard after death—such as is so sweetly embodied in Wordsworth's charming poem, "We are Seven," which numbers the dead as one with the living. We have known three brothers to bear precisely the same name; so that the survivor reads on the family tomb the deaths of two brothers who bore his name before his birth, and whose record there differs from what his own will be only in date and age. There are names enough for all; and if one middle name does not suffice to make a distinction, then use two or three, as is the custom of the old world. The recording angel may know the difference between all the John Smiths and Tom Browns on his book, and the trumpet of judgment may proclaim each one with such emphasis that its rightful owner may answer at the call. But here, in this world, for our everyday affections and uses, we like a distinct word for every distinct thing or person, and we trust that Heaven itself will make distinctions clearer instead of darker; so that names, which are the best part of the heart's vocabulary, and waken so many echoes of old times and hopes of new joys, will there have more instead of less of their old variety. When Burns writes to Mary in Heaven, he probably knew which Mary he meant; but if there are many Marys there to be addressed, it might be important for them to know which is called for.

But whatever a name may be, it is not its sound but its bearer that gives it expression. If a rose by any other name might smell as sweet, it is the sweetness that sweetens whatever name it bears, and makes the rose to be the rose. We must remember, then, that each name carries with it a meaning growing out of the bearer's character; and thus, while we all have our blood name from family, and our water name from baptism, so we have our spirit name from our leading traits of character or conduct. In looking over the Family Record in the Bible, the thoughtful father or mother sees far more than the dates written upon those leaves, and the name of each child suggests at once a character as marked as each face. Often the pet words of endearment that are applied to little children foretoken future character or reputation, and stick to the little ones through life. A large class of our common surnames probably originated thus; and all those that sprung from personal traits that appear from childhood carry with them something like a hint of the ruling temperament and disposition. At school and college the habit of giving nicknames often runs quite in the classic line, and a dozen boys have their agnomen from their comrades before they know it. Thus one is called the Slow, another the Fast, another the Fat, another the Noisy; and who shall exhaust the college words that designate various characters—as the dig, squirt, dash, beau, bully, fish, etc.? In business circles the same tendency appears; and nothing would be more amusing than a directory with the nicknames of leading merchants and professional men interlined. We treat our public men in the same way; and our Hickory, Rough-and-Ready, Old Bullion, and the like, are words familiar as the heads of our Presidents, and are made the ready catch-words of party times. Every workshop and every ship is fertile in its own class of epithets, and divides honors and rebukes with a free hand. Our universities carry up the custom in stately form, and their D.D.'s, LL.D.'s, and the like, show the passion for enlarging the old name by an appended title. We like the disposition just in accordance with its justice, and are in favor of having every man called by his true character, whether the epithet expresses his skill in his trade or profession, or the extent of his learning, or the worth of his character. It is far better to designate men by their calling than by wholly artificial titles; and if a list of worthy citizens is appended to some petition or circular, it is far more sensible to append their trades or business than to dub them all as esquires. An honest carpenter or shoemaker is quite respectable when claiming to be what he is, but is put into an equivocal position the moment he takes or receives titles that do not belong to him.

positions and habits. It is less important to note the son, for example, as lawyer or physician or merchant, or clergyman or colonel or honorable, than as a good and true man; and if household honors were embodied in diplomas, it would be found that the traits that the world knows least of in its love of obtrusive talents, have been most cherished and loved in the family. It may be that the highest name ever given on earth—and one, too, which keeps its glory in heaven—belongs to the character least known by the world—the name of Blessed. The blessed ones of the household—they who are most open to God's grace by gentle affections and spiritual faith, and most earnest to do God's will in a round of constant and loving service—are not likely to be the men most fond of military or civil titles; or the women most ambitious of shining in ball-rooms, or making golden marriages, or figuring on anniversary platforms.

So it is that the passion for appending titles of honor to the name leads us to consider the traits that give the name its true quality or worth. We have no quarrel with the true respect for people of quality; but in a very straightforward way we would try to enlarge this respect by deciding who are the people of quality, by deciding upon the quality of the people, and endeavoring to educate the true quality. In the old world, we are aware, quality—in the conventional sense—goes with the blood, and a lord who is a sot takes social precedence of any of Nature's noblemen, however wise or worthy, who has no coronet. Yet, even in monarchical countries, public opinion distinguishes between the gentility that is in the name and that which is in the heart; and probably the lineal aristocracy, alike from personal tastes and public opinion, are led to guard their titled honors by the gentle quality that is respected in all circles. Of late years, especially, the English nobility have looked to education as much as to blood to keep up the honors of their pedigree; and we republicans, who are so often tempted to look upon wealth and ostentation as the means of building up a family name, may learn many a sober lesson for ourselves and our children from the good sense and industry of the dukes and earls, who are bent on retaining, by genuine usefulness, the position won centuries ago by the accident of battle or of royal favor. We are not ashamed to say that a good name is very desirable, alike for its present comfort and as a future legacy; nor can we be blind to the fact that vast numbers of families are seriously striving for a name that shall live after them. There is a growing passion for rummaging old archives to find out whether we are not actually heirs to buried dignities; and many a new crest and motto has been disinterred from the oblivious dust and consigned to a shining position upon silver spoons and carriage doors. They that are less fortunate in their hunt among the dead are the more eager to push their way to eminence among the living by accumulating wealth, by ambitious marriages, and by conspicuous establishments. But we make monstrous mistakes, and often our very ambition overlaps the mark and falls over into the dust. We too often forget that, by our laws, great establishments are sure to break down from the absence of the right of primogeniture; and he who builds an extravagant house to keep up the honor of the family, may be quite sure that when the grave closes over him, if not before, his palace or his villa will be under the auctioneer's hammer; and instead of being occupied by his favored heirs, will figure in the newspapers as a boarding-house or a water-cure.

We do not profess to despise wealth; but we are quite sure that, with it or without it, a good education, with habits of determined industry, is the best guarantee of the quality of a family. The daughters, we are aware, need money more than the sons to establish them in life; yet good manners, with a fair share of accomplishments, go as far in giving a girl a good position as coarse wealth without these refinements; and very rich girls, from the very fact of their riches, run great risks in being sought for their money, and throwing themselves away upon idlers or libertines. The families that in this country have kept the best quality through several generations have been those who did not despise the common lot, with its frugal habits, modest arts, and sterling virtues. Some country clergymen, who have had salaries that would not support one of our fast young men a single week, have reared families who have been enrolled from generation to generation among our most honored names, and for a quality which, instead of exhausting itself by its extravagance, ever renews itself by its fresh life and active service. It will be well for us to think more of this matter, and to cherish a distinction that rests not upon accidents, but upon principles; not upon chance, but upon character. Many a father might keep his health and integrity if he were more certain that a modest competence, with high character, gives a better quality than bloated wealth with coarse manners and equivocal expedients. Many a mother might save her daughters many a pang if she would measure society more by the intent of its spirit than by the extent of its display; and so, by true womanly wisdom and grace, give the blood of her offspring her own true quality, although our usages do not allow her to transmit with it her name. We sometimes wish, indeed, that mothers could give their children their names; and have shown how, in part, it can be done without changing the family surnames. But perhaps the present custom is not so unjust as may at first seem; and the mother, while unable to give her own name as the surname of her children, is at full liberty to give them their character-name (agnomen), that indicates the quality of their lives. Sure we are that the sons and daughters who are called great or good or blessed, in history and society, owe their name in the main to their mothers; and if it is a poor rule that does not work both ways, it may be that the scape-graces and tyrants of mankind have drunk in no small share of their bad quality with their mother's milk and word. The mother's spirit, however, is usually on the right side; and our good boys and girls, and men and women, are more indebted to it for their quality than the world knows or is ready to confess. The heart goes with the mother, and the mother's heart is near God.

We have thus far spoken of household names, under their chief forms, as concerning the individual and the family and the character. A few words upon the conspicuous dates in home life, which give these names their chief emphasis. The old family record is a good guide, and we may reflect with profit upon its items. The first date in a child's career is his birth, and this generally coincides with his naming, for each little comer usually finds a name waiting for him; and, by general usage, the Church stands ready to add her benediction, and to speak the given name with solemn consecration. This is a beautiful and impressive custom; and if any persons—as is the case with our Baptist friends—have scruples in using thus early the baptismal rite, let the service be called Dedication in their instance; while, for ourselves, we heartily would comply with the old way of Christendom, and thus solemnly welcome our little ones, as children of God, to the covenant promise with the parents. Great impression is made by the sacred recognition of children as within the Divine kingdom and under the blessing of the Church. In fact, the child's name has a sweet savor from the fragrance of such benediction, and when thus spoken it is marked with a new quality, and the prepossession is established on the side of faith and virtue. The fact is remembered, or should be remembered, in after-years, if the child's life is spared; and if the little one is early taken away, there is something in the rite that lifts him above neglect, and declares that these little ones are immortal creatures, and our humanity is essentially as great in an infant of a year as a sage of three-score and ten. We believe that our common social life would gain in interest and dignity if more account were made of birth and baptism, and the name were sacredly marked upon the threshold of existence. Home affections would thus more easily open into spiritual faith; and they who are thus early claimed by the Church would be led, by association and gratitude, as well as conviction, to take a stand for themselves upon religious ground.

The next conspicuous date in the household is marriage—a date which, unlike that of birth, is not an event of nature but of choice. Generally they who are born and who live to be thirty years old are expected to marry, and unless new manners change old habits the expectation will mostly be fulfilled. It is well to give marriage a religious solemnity, and save it from the too frequent frivolity that desecrates its momentous character. We have spoken already so fully of this subject as to prevent any further discussion here. We will only say that no words spoken under heaven have so much significance as those which join two names in one in a tie that only death can sever. It would be well if that tie itself were made more conspicuous and sacredly beautiful in the wedding festival, and less account were made of the table and the jewels, and more were made of the solemn and blessed relation entered into. A beautiful and impressive marriage-service is not only good for the principal parties, but for all the guests, by reminding them of what they are or ought to be. Its remembrance should be sacredly kept up in the household, without waiting for the lapse of twenty-five years to raise it to the conventional title of the silver or gold or diamond wedding.

Perhaps our new practical life may multiply sacred occasions in the family, and borrow from the Church or from the old Chivalry the custom of solemnly setting apart each child to his or her calling. We ordain preachers; and of old every knight watched his arms in church, and received a devout blessing upon his fidelity. We are not sticklers for this or that form; but we think that a more serious recognition of the dignity of every child's vocation would be useful, and a solemn entry of the name might fitly be made in the record of the family. A good name in business is surely a treasure great enough to be earnestly cherished; and as things now are, we believe that our best business men have a regard for their good name that is serious enough to be devoutly acknowledged. The sacrifices that are made to keep the name good would be incredible if not proved beyond question; and we feel quite sure of the approbation of our mercantile friends in declaring that the first time a young man puts his name to a business obligation should be a season of serious thought and devout consecration.

That odd philosopher, Auguste Comté, has sketched the outlines of a new order of sacraments, in which he goes beyond the old Catholicism; and in nine different ceremonials marks the course of each child from birth to death, and even to a name after death, when such name is won. But death, even in his calendar, writes the most decisive date; and it is only after its hand closes the earthly record that the claim to immortality can be decided. It is a thought always startling, the mere thought that we must all die; and the household record and the tomb-stone must some day testify that we have lived, and now live no more on earth. In some ages, and with some nations, death was the most prominent fact in life; and the people of Egypt thought apparently less of their houses than of their tombs. Until lately, with us Americans, the tomb was put out of sight; and before the rise of rural cemeteries, he who would meditate among the dead must traverse some neglected pasture or grope in subterranean vaults. We are glad that the last date in man's career is now saved from forgetfulness, and we look upon the new order of burial-places as most important and effective institutions in educating and perpetuating true household affections. The movement probably began with the culture of more beautiful rural tastes and the growth of more cheerful views of religion; but it has much of its permanence and power from the interest of families in perpetuating its names and associations. We probably have more beautiful cemeteries than any nation in the world; and each new village sets apart its most picturesque ground or forest for the memory of the dead. This is well, and it must do much to keep alive family feelings, and check the worldliness and irreverence too characteristic of our busy and excitable people. But those places may be perverted from their true use, and made to pamper a feeble sentimentalism or poor ostentation, instead of favoring true affections or devout sentiment. Too many monuments are tawdry show-boxes, that make no more moral or religious impression than a showy villa or a gilded saloon. Many of the ornaments and inscriptions, moreover, are either unmeaning or objectionable, and indicate family pride or fashionable conceit rather than faith and humanity. We do not complain of the money thus spent, but of the manner of spending it; and we are decided in the opinion that people of wealth should so adorn their burial-grounds as to educate and spiritualize the common eye, and make every poor man whose lost child rests in its narrow bed within the same cemetery more submissive, and devout, and wise by the teaching of that stately mausoleum. Then the beautiful will exercise, even on the brink of the grave, the blessed ministry of mercy which it has received from the ordaining hand of God; and it will there, as every where else, in its purity, share the high prerogative of bestowing freely its riches without exhausting them. The arts that are truly beautiful, like God's mercies, are not wasted by diffusion; and every new recipient finds more instead of less good in their presence because of the many who have been comforted there before. Wiser and better will every household be when its children are taught to read, in such a true and lovely temper, the names and dates of its history from the sod and the marble over the dust that returns to dust, that it may restore the spirit to the God who gave it.

Editor's Easy Chair.

WITH the present number of the Magazine begins the twentieth volume. Every cordial friend and reader has, of course, read the outside of the cover of the last number—the one hundred and fourteenth consecutive number—and has there seen the fact amply and truly stated that the volumes of the Magazine from the commencement compose a library of more than a hundred volumes of the most various and entertaining literature. For a family in the country, removed from access to great libraries, there is probably no publication in the world which comprises within the same space so much valuable and interesting matter, for all ages and classes and tastes.

It is a common error in newspapers and periodicals of all kinds to blazon their own value, but the Easy Chair sits as a calm spectator even of the whirl in which it has its own position, and speaks of the Magazine platform, upon which it stands, as if of a stranger. It would not be becoming for it to state the comparative claims of this Magazine with those of other periodicals; but it may, certainly, remark one characteristic of Harper, and that is, its constant adaptation to the demand of the time. Designed to entertain, enlighten, and genially criticize—but not to roll up its sleeves as a polemical debater in any department of difference—it has adhered to its intention with unequalled fidelity. It has sought to be a welcome friend every where—to secure its reception by the knowledge that it had a good and useful and amusing word for every body; and that it would rather talk about matters agreed upon than those involving sharp differences.

There is, certainly, always room for such a magazine. Whether there has been for this particular one may be inferred from the fact that it has secured and maintained from year to year a much larger circulation than any magazine in the world.

All hands are now piped to weigh anchor for a fresh voyage. Passengers may be very sure that if they have liked the ship hitherto they will like her none the less hereafter. May she long sail before favoring gales upon calm seas—the fortunate and triumphant Great Eastern of magazines!

The finest American days are in the autumn—in the clear, cool, bright season when thick clothes and early fires at evening are agreeable—when the woods are “russet and sere,” and the yellow leaves are gorgeous in the sunlight.

That is really our season for travel. Our summers are so intense—the heat is so furious and tropical—that the part of wisdom is to sit in the shade in a white coat and hear the locust sing that dry, creaking, fervent song, as if there were never a drop of juice in any locust since the creation.

Why do we bundle off in cars and steamers “to see the country,” “to travel for pleasure,” at such a season? What pleasure is there in it—what can there be? It is all dust, noise, cinders, glare, and vexation of spirit. But wait until the autumn—wait until the sun is tempered and the air is soft, and sweet, and invigorating; and then, if you travel through the very same region, you will see an entirely new country. For the philosophers say that we carry with us the beauty that we see.

If a man be ill in body or in mind, the landscape is always sick. If he be hurried or fretful, the landscape sulks. If he be calm and cheerful, the healthful daylight touches the hills, and woods, and waters into a profound and refreshing beauty.

There is that kind of lofty pride and reserve, both in nature and art, that they will not be seen merely because they are stared at. It is perfectly true of many—perhaps of most people—that they are really disappointed by Niagara, by Mont Blanc, by the ocean, by any great natural object. For they go to see it with the same vulgar curiosity that leads foolish people to dog the steps and haunt the house of famous men; and they do not see nor feel the greatness. There is a very plain story told of the poet Pope which forcibly illustrates this impossibility of seeing if you have merely eyes, and not a mind and reverential heart, to see with. “Well,” said an admirer, “at last I have seen the great Mr. Pope!” “Happy man!” returned the other. “And what was he doing?” “The great Mr. Pope was picking his nose,” was the melancholy reply.

So it is with pictures. The impudent people who course through the Vatican with a red guide-book in their hands, as sportsmen scour the fields, gun in hand, for game, stand before the famous works, and discover when they were painted, and read all their history, and peep at them through their closed hands, and chatter about the chiaro-oscuro, and the tone, and the rest of it; but for all that they do not see the picture. Pictures and real greatness in persons are an invisible writing, which seems a blank surface to the spectator unless he have in his heart, and therefore in his eye, that warmth of reverence, and humility, and sympathy which makes the writing legible.

Long ago, in Rome, when the Easy Chair was upon his travels, he used to pass long days in the great galleries, watching the people as well as the pictures. In some quiet corner—but all corners are quiet in Rome—sat some patient artist, working upon his slowly advancing canvas with an air of such profound satisfaction that it was inspiring to look at him. His clothes were poor and picturesque; his hair long; his whole appearance careless; but a merry forester in the great wood of the world is the young artist in Rome. It is the dream of long, doubtful years come true at last. Probably the artists pinch themselves at intervals, and say, “Rome! Rome!” to themselves. At least, other people who are not artists, but whose dreams come true in the same way, say so.

Then, as they sat, half humming old songs from all parts of the world, and their careful, dashing fingers flying or fluttering or painfully lingering upon their work, some traveler came in, with plenty of money and confidence, and rushed up to the famous works. He read, and conned, and compared. The artist saw the new-comer—saw that he owned the golden boat in which one sails round the world—saw that he ate and drank well, and followed his whims, and had nothing to do but to enjoy. But still the busy artist hummed and sketched with a glittering light of triumph in his eye—for he knew that there was one port into which the golden boat could not penetrate—one thing money could not buy; no, not though the eager traveler purchased the very pride of the gallery and carried it off to England or America. Yes, he may carry it off, hums the artist in his fancy, as Pluto carried off Proserpine, as Arethusa was ravished. He may give it the post of honor as the bridegroom places at the head of his table the bride he has bought with money; but as the bride's heart is another's, who loves her and whom she loves, so the beauty of the picture is his who feels its power.

It is the same thing in travel in the observation of nature. The pleasure of a fine scene does not depend upon your having money enough to get to it, but mind enough to enjoy it. There was a book published nearly twenty years ago intended to show people how to look at nature. But what is the use of the most perfect glass eye to the blind? People whose lives revolve in narrow circles around mean ideas—who are afraid of generous sympathies lest they shall lead to the spending of money—and of heroic thoughts lest they should involve sacrifice and loss of esteem, had better stay at home and look into their gloomy back-yards, and call them Italy and Switzerland—prairies and cataracts. In vain they will travel and stare. Let them stay at home and save money.

But if a man would really enjoy, let him discover whether he be cheerful, patient; in fact, whether he have that "quiet eye" which can alone harvest the beauties of nature, and then he may go bravely and confidently. There is a little poem of Wordsworth's, one of the sweetest of all his songs—"A Poet's Epitaph"—which contains the necessary directions for enjoying travel as well as for profitable meditation upon the departed:

"But who is he, with modest looks,
And clad in homely russet brown?
He murmurs near the running brooks
A music sweeter than their own.

"He is retired as noontide dew,
Or fountain in a noontide grove;
And you must love him, ere to you
He will seem worthy of your love.

"The outward shows of sky and earth,
Of hill and valley, he has viewed;
And impulses of deeper birth
Have come to him in solitude.

"In common things that round us lie
Some random truths he can impart—
The harvest of a quiet eye
That broods and sleeps on his own heart.

"But he is weak; both man and boy,
Hath been an idler in the land;
Contented if he might enjoy
The things that others understand."

Do people read Wordsworth now? A dozen years ago he was the favorite of thoughtful students of poetry—very much as Byron was the idol of young and passionate readers. And he will always stand in our literary history as the poet who effected the great change from the artificial to the natural style in poetry. Byron conquered Wordsworth in superficial public regard, as he did all his contemporaries; but he is being gradually displaced by a sincerer school.

It is curious to see how the same thing shows itself throughout the development of every age. The Pre-Raphaelite school in painting—the Thackeray vein in novel-writing—are illustrations of the same spirit as that of Wordsworth's appeals to the common sentiment of common life. And they are all in turn modifications of the great Protestant principle which controls modern civilization, and which asserts the essential worth and dignity of men as equal children of God.

There was a time, within the memory of living men, when Wordsworth was as little known as Shelley, but he is now canonized in eight volumes, among Moxon's greater gods. His poetry has become a part of English literature. Lines of his are household words, like lines of Shakespeare; and it is Wordsworth who has written one of the great English poems—the "Ode upon Intimations of Immortality." For sustained splendor of imagination, deep, solemn, and progressive thought, and exquisite variety of music, that poem is unsurpassed. Since Milton's "Ode upon the Nativity" there is nothing so fine, not forgetting Dryden, Pope, Collins, and the rest, who have written odes.

There was a curious debate some years since in London—nor does the Easy Chair know if it were ever finally decided—upon the question, what six English poets were entitled to statues in Westminster Abbey? or, in other words, who are the six "great" English poets?

It was very easy to begin: Chaucer, Spenser, Shakespeare, and Milton. So far the journey was very smooth. Then who? Should it be Dryden or Pope, in the eighteenth century; and who in the nineteenth? Byron! cried the men who were mature in 1825. Wordsworth! replied their children.

Of the four there can be little doubt that Wordsworth is best entitled to the honor. If the great poet be the man who conveys the most profound and universal thought in the most simple and adequate manner—whose imagination is creative and sustained—whose sympathies are as broad as nature and mankind—there is no question that Wordsworth better satisfies the conditions than any since Milton. And what a droll idea it gives of the state of the English mind forty and fifty years ago, to know that reviews which laughed at Wordsworth as an old woman were feared and respected as literary authorities. In fact nobody who has lived long enough to see a great name built up amidst ridicule and scoffing will ever regard any opinion of any review or critic upon any book or person except as the view of a fallible individual.

THAT last sentence lands us gently upon another thought, which is, the extreme absurdity of the respect paid to the modern press.

The great difference between newspapers now and when they began is, that then they were chiefly records of news read by very few; now they are chiefly records of opinions read by a great many. And if we look closely, it is not so much the opinion we fear as the fact that it is read by a great many. An author is perfectly willing that the editor should not like his book, for instance; but when the editor tells a hundred thousand people who have never seen the book that it is dreadfully stupid, they henceforward associate only stupidity with the book, and will probably never take it up to read, but rather select something else.

It therefore requires a great deal of common sense to read a newspaper properly, and to understand that it expresses only one of two things: first, the sincere opinion of the man who writes the article; or, second, what he conceives to be the public opinion. This last, of course, is a method by which you arrive at a knowledge of public opinion, provided the man who undertakes to express that opinion is really sagacious enough to know what it is. If he is not, then his article means nothing at all but a bad guess of the author's.

Consequently there are two ways of being a "successful" editor: one is, when your own honest, private opinion happens to coincide with that of many in the community; the other is, when you suppress your own views altogether, and merely repeat what you see to be the general sentiment. The first is an honest, the second is a dishonest, editor. The first is a respectable and valuable citizen; the second is a pander. He consults and gratifies the prejudices of the public, as a courtier panders to the gratification of his sovereign. And in both cases he is used, rewarded, and despised.

It is hard for a man or a cause to make head against a swift current of falsehood and abuse. An adroit writer will so easily and naturally and intentionally misrepresent the fact, and what he knows to be the fact, that the reader will accept the misrepresentation as fact, and raise eyes and hands of horror at the offender.

The Easy Chair lately witnessed an illustration of this—not in a political paper—where the coldest Jesuitical malignity misinterpreted a perfectly simple and intelligible phrase, for the purpose of casting personal odium upon the author under review. A man who would do such a thing would pick your pocket, if he were sure of not being caught. He would kick his mother, if there were nobody near; and the moment his name was known among gentlemen he would be despised by them as a sneak-thief, crawling about to filch a little piece of honest reputation from an honest man. It is a public misfortune when such men are allowed to write as if they spoke sincerely or with any intention of public instruction.

These are the considerations which should constantly check the tendency to look upon what the newspapers say as of any more consequence, in reality, than what any body says in private conversation. The difficulty of course is, that it is public conversation, and it acts to your prejudice if it defame you. But what are you going to do? Will you say and do what you do not believe that the papers may praise you? Or will you understand that your judgment is a safer rule for you than the opinion of any editor, or of any of the single individuals who altogether make up "the public?" If a man holds his comfort at the mercy of the newspapers, he is as happy as Sinbad carrying the old man of the sea. Of course he will not be so foolish as to fight with them. If you walk among snakes the only way is to wear thick boots, and let them dart and sting as they will. Don't try to knock off the head of each one. But when you have on the stout boots of an actual, not an affected, faith in the propriety of your own position, though the serpents were hydra-headed their tongues shall not harm you.

The French have a sensible proverb, On dit est menteur, which, being interpreted, means that "They say" is a liar; or "Mrs. Grundy" is a liar. The wind is not more whimsical than "the public;" and the best advice that religion and experience can give any young man is, Don't try to please others; try to please yourself.

Now a sneak-thief would lay hold of that last sentence, and say that the Easy Chair recommended young men to be selfish, self-indulgent, self-seeking, luxurious, and lazy. And yet the sneak-thief would know perfectly well while he was saying so, that the Easy Chair says "Try to please yourself" in precisely the same sense that in the parable of the Prodigal it is related that "when he came to himself, he arose," etc. Dear Sneak, does that mean that when he became selfish he repented of his wrong-doing?

It is fortunate that Sneak has no chance of interpreting the beautiful parables of the New Testament for us. It is too late. Even he can not wrest them from their simple and profound significance. Yet he doubtless tries to; and if he thought public opinion would support him in saying it, he would not hesitate to declare that there was no meaning in them at all.

This is one kind of editor, and of "successful" editor. But is this the kind of man whose word shall trouble your peace of mind? If he were honest, his censure would be an honest difference of opinion. But as it is—why, only keep your hand on your pockets.

In the autumn there are some preternaturally still, shadowed days, when the vapor is not a cloud but only a veil; when single leaves, at intervals, drop quietly to the ground, like tears that fall without sobbing; and the landscape seems to be utterly self-involved, meditating its own decay. There is a more conscious sadness in such days than in all others of the year. The trees make no effort to hold their leaves; the warm, rich softness of the air seems a mockery over the brown meadows, like a sweet south wind, full of life, and hope, and joy, blowing over the face of one who lies dying of consumption; the brook audibly trickles under the elders, and the sassafras, and the weeping willows. But the willow is the mute mourner of the whole. The eye steals away to the fields and sees the great haystack roofed for snow—sees the last stooks of cornstalks removed—the yellow pumpkins and crook-necks coming in upon the cart, the apple-trees stripped, the pasture short, and although the sun shines and the air is warm, and a late fly buzzes upon the window, there is a foreshadowing silence—the sweetness of placid and resigned decay.

In the feeling of these days is one of perfect resignation. They are as effortless as the outline of a flower. The whole landscape is so strangely still that you see it as if drowned in a deep sea of yellow light. They are like the last serene hours of a good man, who passes from life to life as a king from chamber to chamber of his palace; who lies, sweet and silent, remembering the early days, the old friends, the tender ties, the sympathies, joys, and sorrows, that have made the world dear and sacred. So seems the falling year to be inly beholding its buds and blossoms, its flowers and fruit, its manifold experience. Where are the roses now? Where the gusty days of March? the tears of April? the fervor of July?

There is a poem of Keats's—which was never published in any collected edition of his works, but which originally appeared in Leigh Hunt's "Indicator," and is reprinted, with subsequent alterations, in Milnes's Life and Remains of the poet—which perfectly expresses the weird, dreamy romance of these ghostly days. As many a lover of Keats has probably not seen the poem, the Easy Chair will copy it, to share a pleasure with his readers:

LA BELLE DAME SANS MERCI.

A BALLAD, 1819.

O what can all thee, Knight-at-arms!
Alone and palely loitering?

The sedge has withered from the lake,
And no birds sing.

O what can all thee, Knight-at-arms!
So haggard and so woe-begone?
The squirrel's granary is full,
And the harvest's done.

I see a lily on thy brow,
With anguish moist and fever dew,
And on thy cheeks a fading rose
Fast withereth too.

I met a lady in the meads,
Full beautiful—a faery's child.
Her hair was long—her foot was light,
And her eyes were wild.

I made a garland for her head,
And bracelets too, and fragrant zone;
She look'd at me, as she did love,
And made sweet moan.

I set her on my pacing steed,
And nothing else saw all day long,
For sidelong would she bend, and sing
A faery's song.

She found me roots of relish sweet,
And honey wild, and manna dew;
And sure in language strange she said—
"I love thee true."

She took me to her elfin grot,
And there she wept, and sigh'd full sore,
And there I shut her wild sad eyes
With kisses four.

And there she lulled me asleep,
And there I dream'd—ah, woe betide!
The latest dream I ever dream'd
On the cold hill's side.

I saw pale kings and princes too,
Pale warriors, death-pale were they all:
They cried, "La Belle Dame sans Merci"
Hath thee in thrall.

I saw their starved lips in the gloam,
With horrid warning gap'd wide;
And I awoke and found me here,
On the cold hill's side.

And this is why I sojourn here,
Alone and palely loitering,
Though the sedge is wither'd from the lake,
And no birds sing.

Our Foreign Bureau.

WE begin with the East; not China, but the Caucasus. Schamyl, the great, wild, free leader, and the sworn foe of Russia, has at length fallen into the hands of the Emperor Alexander. On the Koran he had given oath that he would never treat and never yield; but turban, Koran, and cimeter are weaker than the sword of the West. For months past he has been hemmed in upon his mountain fastnesses; only three hundred and fifty followers with him in the final struggle, of whom two hundred and fifty fell before the capture was made. And now the arch-enemy of Russia is journeying westward toward a palace prison in St. Petersburg.

The reader will remember, perhaps, that a son of this redoubtable chieftain, who fell into Russian hands years ago, had been educated at St. Petersburg, and held rank in the military establishment of the capital; a brave, noble-hearted fellow—so his Western friends describe him—growing up with thorough attachment to the civilization of Europe, and lamenting the impotent hostility of his father. Two years ago Schamyl made seizure of a couple of Russian princesses (Orbeliani by name), and bore them off to the mountains. The conditions of their release were, a heavy ransom and the restoration to him of his son. The Emperor acceded the ransom, and in respect to the latter condition, left the son free to act for himself. The son yielded, at length, to the father's demand; and turning his back upon the friends and the luxuries of the capital, traveled back into the rich wildernesses of the East. To the father he was still a son; but the chieftains, who swore by the Koran, looked doubtfully upon the Christian. The prince lived under espionage, brooded over the losses of Western civilization, and fell, at length, into a decline, which all the nostrums of the imaums could not stay. Schamyl appealed to Alexander for a physician of European faith, and the Emperor dispatched one for his service; too late, however; the change had broken him forever. His story has a melancholy interest just now.

But the Caucasus is not subdued, although Schamyl is taken; we are wearied, as before, with ceaseless bulletins of Caucasian battles.

Moving westward, we find some shrewd skipper gathering bones upon the heights of Balaklava, which he carries by ship-load to the port of Odessa, whereat some British news-writer excites the horror of England by declaring that the skeletons of "our brave soldiers" are being transmuted into ivory black. Of course there comes protest, and inquiry, and examination under the eye of Russian naturalists, who find the bones to be those of mules and horses only.

We see the Yankee craftsmen still toiling at the submerged ships, and the blight of the war lingering on the fields and the houses. Odessa is busy once more, and the harbor is whitened with the sails of the Mediterranean vessels that are coming in for grain. In the cafés (for there are cafés in Odessa) they are talking over the brilliant fêtes which have welcomed the heir-apparent to his majority. The programme of ceremonial (too long for rehearsal here), under twenty-six magniloquent orders of the Court Chamberlain, are in all the journals. The date of the fête is the 8th of September (Russian style), and the title of the Prince "Son Altesse Impériale Monseigneur le Césarévitch grand-duc héritier Nicolas Alexandrovitch."

A great event, and a great man (possibly) for Russia; but to our West not so much as a steam-plov, whose cost would be covered by the embroidery on the coat of the Prince.

A little sail brings us before Constantinople. There are bad times here. The old Turks, full of Mohammedan pride and energy, are questioning if the Western influences are not working too strongly upon the susceptible heart of the Sultan.

There is conspiracy to stay the insidious spread of Christian opinions. The fierce, proud Orientalism is stiffening for its last struggle (on these shores) against the trade-civilization of the West.

Of course the revolver will beat the cimeter, and the black hat will overtop the turban. Some hundreds of conspirators are just now in prison; but in the streets are thousands of fiery sympathizers with those who lie in prison. Worst of all, money is failing the appointed Father of the Faithful, and his soldiers are growing clamorous. The troops in the capital have been for months without pay; others, at a distance, have received nothing for a year past. In the neighborhood of Erzeroum the soldiers of the Prophet are in rags, having little food, and no promise of better days to come. Such men furnish capital material for conspirators to work upon.

Yet more: the head of the War Department, Rizi Pacha, declares with bitterness that all power is virtually taken from him; that troops are ordered from point to point without his cognizance; that fortifications along the western boundary and on the frontiers of Dalmatia had been abandoned in obedience to the suggestions of foreign ambassadors; that all his applications for redress are treated with contempt. It was not for personal advantage that he had consented to assume the budget of war. Allah forbid! He had sacrificed, indeed, his private fortune to the exigencies of the service; but private fortunes have an end. He had appealed to the Minister of Finance, setting before him the beggarly condition of the army; but the Minister of Finance declares the treasury to be empty, and no hope of revenue, since "Fuad Pacha, Ali Pacha, and the Minister of the Interior had collected, on their own authority, for two years to come the taxes of the empire."

How long shall Turkey stagger on under such weight of corruption?

It would seem, too, that Turkish affairs are becoming yet farther complicated by division in the Christian sentiment of the country. Hitherto we have counted all anti-Mohammedan interests united under the wing of the Greek Church; but we hear now of rebellion against the bishops, and in the island of Salonica thousands of Christians have renounced allegiance and declared for the Pope and the Church of the West. It would be odd indeed if at the time when the Holy Father is losing his best supporters in Italy he should find his last successor under the banner of the Crescent.

In Vienna—if we come westward by the Danube—we find no cheer. Brilliant court display, and brilliant equipages; fine wines at the "Archduke Charles," and good music on the Glacis; but withal a pinched exchequer, and no glory from the last war to boast of; no amnesty for consolation; no new friends among the governments of Europe to bolster the weak splendor of Hapsburg.

Yet to the credit of the Emperor it must be said that he has just now inaugurated a new scheme for the financial relief of the country, in appointing a commission of landholders, merchants, and manufacturers for a full investigation of existing sources of revenue, and for the arrangement of some effective plan by which opposing interests may, so far as possible, be conciliated, and the offensive features in the present system of taxation done away. That merchants and manufacturers should be so far recognized by an Austrian monarch as to be put upon a high court commission is certainly a promising sign.

Trieste, which through the summer was oppressed with dullness, has begun now to revive, and its little harbor is full of merchantmen; but in Venice there is dreadful stagnation. Business still; and hearts that are more fearfully still. Now it is some mother of earnest, hopeful sons, who have found their way westward, saddened by their absence, dreading risk of their betrayal, enduring espionage of the police, and perhaps her house seized, and herself driven out desolate, to wander after those sons who are enrolled in the army of Garibaldi.

Again, it is some father of young children who are born into that Austrian thralldom; he, too hopeful while the dream of liberty was brightest, has compromised himself by open expression of his hopes and by contributions in money—detected at last, and torn away from his home, to linger (no one knows how long) in the prisons of Bohemia.

These are not fancy pictures: such events are of weekly occurrence. The iron glaive of despotism felt every where along the green streets of water; their winter's delight, the Venice Opera, abandoned, because funds are lacking, or kept in reserve for some harsh trial of strength, which they hope may come speedily.

And it may come before we Westerners are looking for it. Mazzini has at length given in his adhesion to the King; his example will carry the action of thousands with him who have thus far stood aloof, and these the most desperate and daring of all.

The Pope has only to march his Swiss across the Alps and the battle will begin. Louis Napoleon and the Cardinal Antonelli (who is virtually Pope) are no longer friends. A French army, if it appears at all, will appear as umpire, and not as combatant—except, indeed, the Croats cross again their Villafranca border. No Swiss and no Parmesan hirelings can cope with Garibaldi and his men. So far all looks well for Central Italy. The bad bargain about the Dukes (made at Villafranca) falls through by reason of its own rottenness. We strongly suspect that the French Emperor knew it must; we strongly suspect that Francis-Joseph is beginning to feel himself overreached in the bargain; we fear greatly that his petulance may wreak itself upon all Venetian sympathizers with King Emanuel.

All accounts from Venice go to show this; and unless the indignation of the Austrian may send him again southward, to restore order in Bologna, there seems only faint hope of Venetian relief. Will he make the venture? Will the whining appeal of the sick Pope call out battle again? Will the liberty and nationality of Italy go down before the Vicar of Christ?

In the south there are signs of commotion; the comparatively liberal ministry with which the new Neapolitan king commenced his reign has retired. The reactionists, who are hearty sympathizers with the Pope and with Austria, are managing matters for the present in their own way. Yet all accounts agree in assuring us that there is great fermentation in the body politic, which, if Central Italy remains free, must shortly have its outburst.

A Murat conspiracy is not improbable, as drawing out the support of a large middle-class, who equally detest the imperialism of Austria and the agrarian tendencies of the Mazzini followers.

It is perfectly clear that his Catholic Majesty, now that the Swiss are gone, can do nothing in aid of the Pope. He will have quite enough employment for his trusty retainers in "keeping the peace" in Naples and Messina. Indeed nothing is more plain than that the present system of rule in both the south kingdom of Italy and in the Austrian provinces (where 100,000 men at least are necessary to man the fortifications) is entailing an expenditure upon the two despots that must ultimately break them down with bankruptcy.

How Tuscany and good Tuscans stand just now is evident enough from this spirited and dignified letter of the Prime Minister of Tuscany, addressed to a friend:

"SIR,—I thank you for the advice you give me in your yesterday's note. I am happy to assure you that, from the moment I was put at the head of the Tuscan Government, I never had one moment either of uncertainty or weakness. Uncertainty can not abide with a man who proposes to himself a complete political design, and fulfills it upon a persevering system, every part of which tends to the fulfillment of the whole. Weakness finds no room in the heart of one who asks for and accepts nothing from his country in return for the sacrifices he is ready fearlessly to make for its sake. I think I am not mistaken if I say that the cause of Italy owes the present height it has reached to the clear political programme, to the uprightness and strength of mind by which the Tuscan Government has so far distinguished itself. I feel assured, and all may feel assured, that neither this Government nor those of Modena and Bologna, nor that of the King-elect, nor the Italian people, will fail in their intent to constitute that strong kingdom which is a universal want, and which alone may enable all of us to call ourselves Italians, as Italy may only in that event be said to exist. This, which is our wish, must needs also be the wish of Europe, for Europe may never hope for peace till it becomes an acknowledged fact that 'there is an Italy.'

“RICASOLI.”

Again, the late funeral obsequies in honor of Manin, at Milan, show how staunchly the Lombards are holding by their faith. There was no great splendor of ceremony, but an earnest expression of sympathy on the part of the thousands who listened to the good abbé as he pronounced the eulogy, which augured well for Italy.

Freer and bolder and more hopeful this month than last; and freer and bolder last month than the month before; for the next months we wait, saying, Bravo! and a Dieu!

It is singular how little touched the French war-seekers are by the reported battles in China. Do they love to see their good allies across the Channel meet with military reverses? Are they seriously indifferent to an opening of Pekin and free opium ventures? Is it that they love coffee so much better than tea? Is it that they look to European ground for their career in arms and empire?

Whatever the reason, it is certain that they have listened to that sad tale of the mud forts, and the ditches, and the shores reeking with mud, and the gun-boats stranded, with very tame ears. Yet they propose to aid England with a considerable force. There are those, indeed, who say that the Mandarin should have been listened to—that the north branch of the Pei-ho should have been entered—that a householder has a right to direct by what door his invited guests shall come in—that he must ware the man-traps if he climbs over the wall. But, on the other hand, there are those who maintain that civilization has a right to push its interviews with barbarism in its own style; the king of wild men must not say to his guests, Eat this human steak, and you shall live in our town; civilization must assume something; it must carry consciousness of dignity and power, and sustain the consciousness by directness and intrepidity and resolution.

Of course if civilization sinks in the barbarian mud ditches, the affair becomes awkward; but once undertaken, the road must be made free. Give up the Pei-ho and the ditches now, and there would result a moral loss that no array of gun-ships could balance.

We talk little, however, of these things; we are busy with nearer topics. Victor Hugo (who will not come back to France till liberty comes back) sends hither a poem—published simultaneously in Paris and Brussels on the 28th of September—“La Légende des Siècles.”

It opens with the Biblical period, and under “Legend” of “Conscience” he gives us, first, the flight and harassments of Cain. God’s eye is his terror; and the first pages (we have read no more) show the poor skin-clad murderer shrinking and trembling under the gaze that pierces every concealment. Surely Cain never opened a poem before!

Its manner and measure we give in the first twenty lines:

“Lorsque, avec ses enfants vêtus de peaux de bêtes,
Echevelé, livide au milieu des tempêtes,
Cain se fut enfui de devant Jéhovah,

Comme le soir tombait, l’homme sombre arriva
Au bas d’une montagne en une grande plaine;
Sa femme fatiguée et ses fils hors d’haleine
Lui dirent: ‘Couchons-nous sur la terre, et dormons.’
Cain, ne dormant pas, songeait au pied des monts.
Ayant levé la tête, au fond des cieux funèbres,
Il vit un ciel, tout grand ouvert dans les ténèbres,
Et qui le regardait dans l’ombre fixement.
‘Je suis trop près,’ dit-il avec un tremblement.
Il réveilla ses fils dormant, sa femme lasse,
Et se remit à fuir sinistre, dans l’espace.
Il marcha trente jours, il marcha trente nuits.
Il allait, muet, pâle et, frémissant aux bruits,
Furtif, sans regarder derrière lui, sans trêve,
Sans repos, sans sommeil; il atteignit la grève
Des mers dans le pays qui fut depuis Assur.
‘Arrêtons-nous, dit-il, car cet asile est sûr.
Restons-y. Nous avons du monde atteint les bornes.’
Et, comme il s’asseyait, il vit dans les cieux mornes
L’œil à la même place au fond de l’horizon.
Alors il tressaillit en proie au noir frisson.
‘Cachez-moi!’ cria-t-il; et, le doigt sur la bouche.
Tous ses fils regardaient trembler l’aïeul farouche.
Cain dit à Jabel, père de ceux qui vont
Sous des tentes de poil dans le désert profond:
‘Etends de ce côté la toile de la tente.’
Et l’on développa la muraille flottante;
Et, quand on l’eut fixée avec des poids de plomb, ‘Vous ne voyez plus rien?’ dit Tsilla, l’enfant blond,
La fille de ses fils, douce comme l’aurore;
Et Cain répondit: ‘Je vois cet œil encore!’”

M. Villemain has just now appeared in the Sunday Courrier of Paris, discussing the old question of Press freedom; his title is, “La Press Periodique devant le Suffrage Universel,” and the base of his argument (in favor of free speech, of course) is this: that universal suffrage demands, as absolute conditions of its success, that reliable information have the utmost possible diffusion; in short, that the people receive such education from an unfettered press as shall fit them for an intelligent exercise of their power.

We need not say that this view is urged with a rare force and precision of language.

The Imperialists, who sustain existing stringency of enactment, reply, more adroitly than soundly:

What you say is well; what you propose is, indeed, the ideal toward which, under a democratic monarchy like that of France, all effort should tend. But in order to make our progress sure, and our effort consistent, we must begin by admitting the validity of the present democratic sovereignty, and accepting the decree of universal suffrage for the existing establishment.

Another newspaper article upon the same topic, which popular rumor assigns to the pen of Guizot, has also attracted much attention to the columns of the Débats.

It is not often that the loss of a child startles Paris; yet we have such a story to tell. Every day the garden of the Tuileries has its crowd of prattlers—its nurses in Breton caps. Among these the nurse and child of M. Hua, a well-known magistrate of Paris. A stranger asked to see the child (only a few months old), took the babe in her arms, and an accomplice having called the nurse’s attention away the strange woman and child disappeared.

The nurse is of course distracted; the desolate mother is affected to such a degree that fears are entertained for her life. M. Hua describes, so far as possible, the infant and the person of the kidnapper, and offers ten thousand francs for its return.

The police are all charged with the search; but, strange to say, a day or more passes, and no tidings are had. The affair assumes an air of mystery, and all manner of stories are current. Somnambulists apply for portions of the child's dress, and promise, for a reward, to discover the place of concealment. M. Hua even receives a letter which makes offer of the child's return provided certain important conditions of silence and concealment are complied with. He is asked to communicate his determination through the advertising columns of the Droit newspaper.

This he does; and the Paris world is still further mystified by the announcement that "M. Hua vouches compliance with the conditions named, and entreats instant communication."

Meantime, however, the police of Paris have information of a strange child in a retired street of the city of Orleans; it has been placed by an unknown party with a woman whose business it is to take infants in charge.

An agent of the prefecture goes down to Orleans, identifies the child (so far as he can), and communicates with the father. All Paris hears the grateful news by the evening journals; and before they are issued the infant is restored to its parents. A girl of seventeen, with her mother, are the guilty parties, and now wait their trial.

The matter is to be noted as having engrossed in such large degree the attention of the Paris journals. The suspense of the father and the agonizing grief of the mother have touched the French heart deeply. In quick sympathy of this sort hearty and full expression is very characteristic.

Some years ago, we remember, when a poor well-digger was buried alive near to Lyons, and while a company of sappers and miners, which had hurried to his relief, were prosecuting their labors, bulletins of their progress were published every two or three hours in the capital.

Madame de Girardin made most successful appeal to this French trait in her Joie fait Peur, of which we had occasion to speak in its time.

Après, this play has just now been revived at Nantes; a certain Madame Larmet personated the afflicted mother lamenting a lost son. Scarcely had Madame Larmet begun her lament than she burst into tears, and was so much overcome with apparent grief as to be incapable of going on.

The curtain fell, and the manager made his explanations, which were but indistinctly heard. A friend of the actress, however, soon made it known that Madame Larmet had only the day before received intelligence of the death of her son, and the dramatic situation of the piece revived so pointedly her own grief that she was compelled to give way in a tumult of feeling. Instantly this became known, the audience, which had been clamorous for a renewal of the play, excused the actress and insisted that no recall should be made.

Mademoiselle Vestrali (while we are upon matters theatric) has just now won conquest as a pretty Romeo, in pretty armor, with pretty voice, in Bellini's "Montagues and Capulets," at the French Opera. An operetta at the Comique, under borrowed title of "Mid-summer Night's Dream" (with Titania and Bottom and Puck left out), has had its share of admirers; while La Croix at the Porte St. Martin has given new version to the old story of Louis XI. and his superstitions and perfidies.

Leverrier has made discovery of new planets—too small to interest outsiders greatly—and M. Fournet has addressed a paper on the recent aurora borealis, and its cortège of storms, to the Academy of Sciences.

It is of interest, and its main facts worthy of record:

"His object is to compare the phenomena which accompanied it in different parts of Europe, on or about the 29th of August last, with those which were remarked during the fine aurora of Nov. 17, 1848. In the former case its influence would seem to have been felt several days before its apparition. Thus, on the 24th, a violent storm broke over Grätz, in Styria; on the following night, Port Louis, in the department of Morbihan, was visited by westerly winds with thunder, while squalls were general on the French Atlantic coast. On the 25th strong winds from the south and southwest prevailed at Lyons, carrying with them the heavy clouds which were to close the hot season by their rains. Storms ravaged the Pyrenean regions of Miranda, Tarbes, Mont-de-Marsan, and Auch on the 26th; on the same day a water-spout from the southwest spread devastation around St. André (Eure). On the 27th the wind had subsided, but the rain fell in torrents at Lyons, and there was stormy weather at Bayonne, with lightning. On the 28th M. Fournet, being at Montrotier, near Lyons, was unable to take the bearings of certain peaks in the neighborhood with his pocket-compass, and in the evening the sky was charged with electricity. During the night there was a terrible hurricane at London, the lightning having the violet hue which characterized the north and northwest border of the aurora. Storms continued to rage on that and the following day in the region of the Pyrenees, at Luz, and St. Sauveur. On the 29th there were sudden showers, with long flashes of lightning, near Lyons; there was a furious storm at Avignon; the first snows appeared on the Alps of the Grisons, and there was incessant lightning at Algiers. On the 30th it rained at Lyons; a north-wester caused a hailstorm at Fécamp, the hailstones being of the size of hazel-nuts; the 31st was squally, and the 1st of September was ushered in at Oüistrehem (Calvados) with a furious sea. All these phenomena, it must be remarked, coincided with the effects of electricity remarked on the telegraphic lines. Another circumstance of note was that the aurora seemed to shift its position in the direction of the wind, from west to east. Comparing all these phenomena with those of the aurora of Nov. 17, 1848, it appears that on the day before the general direction of the wind was west, occasionally inclining south or north. On the 17th there was rather a calm; rain and snow, however, falling incessantly at Berlin. The 18th was about the same, but winds, generally blowing from the west, and squalls commenced on the 19th and 20th, at Lyons, Havre, Margate, and Portsmouth. Violent storms raged in the Channel on the 21st, 22d, and 23d; also at Lyons, Cette, Montpellier, Toulon, and Marseilles."

Over the Channel, the British Association of Science has had its meeting at Aberdeen. Professor Owen, the retiring president, having made his little speech, gave place to Prince Albert, who had been requested to act as presiding officer for the year's meeting. British people—even to men of science—love rank very dearly, and never lose occasion to testify their admiration for it. As if such men as Sir Benjamin Brodie, and Murchison, and Professor Owen ought to be proud of having a Prince-consort to preside over them! As if Biot, and Leverrier, and Dumas were to make Prince Plon Plon chairman of their Academy of Sciences!

But Prince Albert is both prudent and shrewd; and while telling them he was in no sense a scitific man, he added, that, as husband of their queen, he thought he might be of some service to them. Whereat there was warm applause.

In return for this attention to the Prince-consort the Queen graciously invited some two hundred of the savans to come and breakfast at Balmoral. Now as Balmoral is accessible only by some thirty-five miles of coaching after leaving the railway, it made rather a serious thing of the breakfast; particularly for the plethoric and asthmatic. Howbeit they went; and the Court chronicler tells us that tents were spread upon the lawn before the castle, wherein the savans regaled themselves, and her Majesty was pleased "graciously to recognize Professor Owen."

Of course they had a good breakfast, and thought it a pretty place, and coached back to Aberdeen and to business.

Any thing more? Shall we say how many brace of partridges the Honorable Fitz Rifle has slaughtered since the 12th of August—how the grouse lie—how the salmon fishing is over—any thing of Goodwood? Any thing of poor Smethurst (of whom the story last month); granted a reprieve, but lying in prison, doubtful if it be death or life for him, suspicions of other crime astir that are taking off the edge of sympathy? How Sir John Coleridge has made a good speech on education, in which he boasted of being descended from a line of schoolmasters, which was better than a line of Lord Mayors. How Derby, late Tory premier, has evicted all his Irish tenants of Doon, because among them they conceal a murderer and defeat the law (which, if there must needs be great hereditary privilege, seems legitimate enough exercise of it). How Mr. Scott Russell and the Great Eastern Directors are making lively quarrel about the funnel casing and accident (in which Mr. Scott Russell seems to us to have rather the weaker side of the quarrel). How the "Strike" is trailing to wearisome length—in the papers, in the inclosures of unfinished buildings, and in the homes of the workmen. Meantime, China and Italy are the centres about which the heavier political talk is gravitating.

At Brussels they have just closed their national fête; at Strasburg they are building a peace-maker, in the shape of a bridge across the Rhine; in the Bois de Boulogne they are inclosing a new Jardin des Plantes; in the Bordelais they are making their wine; in Spain they are preparing for battle with the bey of Morocco; in the colleges the autumn lectures have begun; and in the Tuileries garden the scarlet geraniums are in bloom.

Editor's Drawer.

IT is hard to believe it, but the publishers state it as a fact—and have requested us to say so, with some suitable moral reflections on the occasion—that with this Number begins the TWENTIETH Volume of Harper's New Monthly Magazine.

Nineteen volumes have been issued already, each volume containing as much reading matter as is usually found in six ordinary octavo volumes of four hundred pages each—a complete library of literature and art.

If any other than the man who tends the Drawer had been called upon to make this announcement, he would speak of the unparalleled circulation which the Magazine has obtained, exceeding that of all other monthlies in the country and in the world; that there is no nook or corner in the wide land where it does not make its way; and that every body who is any body reads Harper, if he can read at all. But this is not the Drawer's way of saying things. He prefers to intimate, as he now does—most gently—that the pleasantest mode of expressing appreciation of the work is to aid in enlarging the area of its circulation. The readers of the Drawer are in good humor, and therefore are the people toward whom one looks when he asks a favor. They are the friends on whom the publishers rely to form clubs in the towns and villages all over the Union. A club of three gets the Magazine for two dollars apiece; and when the club is enlarged to ten, the "getter-up of it" gets his eleventh copy "free gratis for nothing." And the publishers hope that the good-natured Drawer readers will, before the month of January begins, send on hundreds and thousands of such clubs, that the world may be the wiser, better, and merrier, for the sake of the good things sent broadcast from these fair pages.

A LEARNED member of the bar is introduced to the readers of the Drawer with the following admirable stories of the court-room:

The rotund and learned Judge G—, of New York, who, for his rapid dispatch of business, obtained the sobriquet of Steam Judge, sitting a long time on one occasion at Chambers, hearing an elaborate argument, indicated some impatience, in his usual way, by turning his "scratch" rapidly around on his head at intervals; finally, wearied out, or otherwise anxious, he jumped up, exclaiming, "Gentlemen, gentlemen! you must excuse me one minute!" He rushed out of the room, and in going down stairs slipped, and with considerable noise bumped incontinently several steps. The alarmed counsel started out, and, peering over at him, exclaimed, "I hope your Honor is not hurt!" "No, no," he replied, somewhat testily; "my honor is safe enough, but the seat is bruised confoundedly!"

THIS able Judge presided at the remarkable and celebrated trial of M'Leod. One or two anecdotes I remember of that trial, which depend somewhat on mimicry and tone for effect.

An alibi was proven for M'Leod by two officers of the British army—one an aged half-pay officer, the other a young lieutenant. The half-pay was a silver-headed old gentleman, with sharp, "tetchy" face and shrill voice. Having clearly proved that M'Leod was at his house and spent the night on which the Caroline was burned, it became important for the State to "rile" him, and, if possible, destroy the weight of his testimony. Mr. Blank, for the State, commenced the cross-examination:

"You are an officer of the British army?"

"Yes, Sir—a retired officer."

The effect of the following questions was irresistably comic:

"How did you get into the army?"

"How did I get in!" he replied, in a tone and look of astonishment and rage. "How did I get in!" an octave higher. "How did I get in!" with a still sharper and prolonged tone.

"Yes," said Counsel. "How did you get in? Was you drafted?"

"Drafted!—drafted!" shrieked the old man, at the very top note of rage. "I throw myself on the protection of your Lordship!" turning to the Court. "No, Sir! I paid for my commission, like a gentleman!"

When the laughter following this burst subsided, Judge G—— addressed the questioning counsel the most caustic and bitter reproof I have ever heard from the lips of a Judge, and Mr. Blank asked no more questions, leaving the witness with the eloquent Willis Hall.

The Lieutenant was next put on the stand. He was a complete cockney in manners and voice. A nice frock-coat was buttoned tight around the part-ridge fullness of his "pawson;" his face was remarkably freckled, and his red hair accumulated in bushy luxuriance on one side of his head. He proved that "Mr. MacLaw'd" had spent the night of the burning of the Caroline with him, at the house of the half-pay officer; "and in the maw-ning Mr. MacLaw'd and mi-self took 'orse and rode d-o-w-n on the bee-ch aw-po-site Na-vy I-land; the rebels low-ah'd their baa-teries, and fi-aw-d — they fi-aw-d bawls; a bawl struck the sand imme-git-ly aw-posite Mr. MacLaw'd and mi-self. I imme-git-ly suggested the pro-prie-ty of re-ti-ring!"

An uncontrollable burst of laughter followed this drawing suggestion of the "im-me-git pro-prie-ty of re-ti-ring," and the Judge ordered the bailiffs to arrest the first man that should laugh again.

Speaking of Judge G——, this same case illustrated his remarkably rapid manner of doing business. It had occupied many days, and drawn from all parts of the country a large concourse, so that it was necessary to post a placard indicating the precedence of access to the court-room—first, the sheriff; then the Judge, etc. At the brilliant summing up of Willis Hall and Joshua A. Spencer a large crowd of ladies were also in attendance.

It was late in the afternoon of Saturday when Judge G—— concluded his charge to the Jury. Every one had been intensely interested in the proceedings, and thought of nothing else. As the jury retired in the keeping of a bailiff, Judge G—— called the next case on the docket. Mr. B——, of counsel (afterward Chief Justice), utterly surprised, informed the Court he had neither papers nor books in court; it was now late—

"I must then call the next case," said the Judge; and proceeded regularly through the docket, to the consternation of the surprised counsel. As he was calling the last case, Mr. B——'s clerk appeared with the desired green bag, and the Court returned to the case, swore a jury, and proceeded with business.

Do you ever hear the Georgia cracker's explanation of thunder and lightning?

I was present on an occasion when some gentlemen were discussing, in the piny woods village of C——, in Georgia, the phenomena of thunder-storms. A regular wire-grass piny woodsman, who had listened attentively to the discussion, finally interrupted: "Why, gentlemen, I can explain the whole thing. The lightning is nothing but the sciz; but when the thunder comes it consecrates the whole matter!"

He had concluded that the lightning was nothing more than the phenomena produced by throwing hot iron into water—the "sciz"—but the thunder concentrated the whole matter."

MANY years ago I went with a friend (we were making a Northern trip) into the gallery of a church in the central city of New York, where an Abolition Convention was assembled. The President was the facetious and talented Alvan Stewart. The body of the Convention was as ring-streaked and speckled as Laban's lambs, containing a strong sprinkling of black spirits and white. As we entered they were taking a contribution for the good cause.

Each donor went up to the secretary's desk and deposited his dole; and the President, with closed eyes and ludicrous large face, announced very loud, after the secretary, the name of each contributor and the amount subscribed. Presently some one sent up a little pickaninny, black as the ace of spades, and just large enough to tottle up to the chancel, with a dollar bill in his hand. He could not give his name. The secretary was nonplused about the announcement; but the President, glancing down and then shutting his eyes, shouted, "One dollar from an unknown American infant; kiss him, brother, and let him go!" At which idea the President himself, after a stolid, sober pause, shook his vast sides incontinently with laughter, and we vamosed.

PHILIP BENSON, of lower Virginia, a lawyer in embryo, wishing to obtain a license, visited the county seat to be examined by one of the judges. The old judge on whom he called was fond of good liquor, and when the young man came in excessively embarrassed, the judge wishing to reassure him, said, "Come, Mr. Benson, take a glass of brandy with me."

At any other time B.'s eyes would have sparkled equal to the brandy; but in his confusion he replied,

"No, thank you, judge; I never drink brandy."

Returning the brandy, the judge produced a bottle of Champagne and said, "Then take a glass of wine with me."

B.'s embarrassment not lessened, replied, "No, thank you, judge, I never drink wine."

Not to be defeated, the judge then said, "Well, Mr. Benson, you will certainly take a glass of water with me."

By this time B., who did not know definitely whether he was in the judge's room or on Mount Etna, in great confusion replied, "No, thank you, judge, I never drink WATER!"

The judge "gave in."

FROM Alabama an attentive correspondent writes:

In the days when the judges of the Court rode their circuits in old-fashioned gigs in South Carolina, Judge Burke and Judge Daly, who presided in adjoining districts, met once upon a road that they both had to travel for some miles, and for the purpose of having a little talk together, they each gave up their gigs to their servants and got upon the saddle horses used by them so as to be nearer to each other. In crossing a mud-hole, Judge Daly, who fell behind, received a severe kick in the ankle from the horse of Judge Burke. The pain was so great that he dismounted for the purpose of rubbing it; but in the act of getting off he saw a light-wood knot on the ground. In the agony and rage of the moment he threw it at Judge Burke's horse, but, being wild with pain, it missed the horse and struck the rider. Judge Burke, who felt the blow on his back, turned round and discovered Daly (who had not noticed where his light-wood knot struck) rubbing his shins.

"What's the matter?" exclaimed Burke; "what's the matter, Judge Daly?"

"Why," said Judge Daly, "your rascally beast nearly kicked my leg off."

"Well," exclaimed Judge Burke, in that expressive manner so peculiar to himself, "he kicked me on the back at the very same time!"

HERE is a specimen of Young America as he is to be found in Tennessee:

Hugh, commonly called "Hudy" for short, is about six years old and has been sent to school some. His progress in letters may be judged of by the following conversation between him and his father, the other day:

FATHER. "Well, my son, how are you getting along at school?"

HUGH. "Oh! very well. I've got so I can turn a somersault without putting my head on the ground, and I can stand on my head without putting my feet against a tree."

Satisfactory—no complaint against the teacher.

LITTLE IRWIN is about two years younger, and though not so far advanced in gymnastics, is well instructed in the doctrine of total depravity for a boy of his age.

For some external manifestation of the old Adam within, his mother undertook to exorcise him by the use of the rod. Little Irwin argued the case in this wise:

"Ma, you ought not to whip me, for it's the 'bad man' makes me so bad."

"Yes, my son, but I am going to whip the bad man out of you."

"No, ma, that will hurt me a heap worse than it will the old bad man."

The boy was sent to play.

AN old man and an eminent divine, at whose side generations have risen and fallen, whose head is whitened by the frosts of many winters, lingering as he yet does between the living and the dead, a memento of the past, and, as it were, alone in the present, in conversation recently with a gentleman, was found quite cast down and dejected. The suggestion was made that it would be well for him to take a respite from his official labors and go among his friends to recruit, in the hope that he would thereby be cheered and his drooping spirits revived. His response was an impressive one and full of import:

"Sir, I should have to go into the grave-yards to find them!"

AN Indian in the Cherokee nation contributes the following:

When ex-Governor Roane was a young man he was at Fayetteville during the sitting of the Circuit Court for the spring term of 1843. A case was called of Dillingham vs. May, in which the plaintiff sued for an old distillery. The senior counsel for plaintiff was old General Sneed. The General called upon young Roane to "pitch in" with him, and make the opening speech. He did so. At its conclusion, which was superior to the speeches that Washington County was accustomed to hear, one of the jury, "Thomas B——, of Arkansas," was so carried away with the eloquence displayed by the young attorney that he sprang to his feet in the middle of the courtroom, and exclaimed, "Them's my sentiments pre-zactly! You are on the right scent, for I knowed your dad before you was born!"

Dillingham gained his case.

A LOUISIANA correspondent of the Drawer comes with the following very amusing incident of being blown up:

The steamer S——, commanded by Captain S——, exploded several years since on one of our Southern rivers, with terrible effect, and burned to the water's edge. Captain S—— was blown into the air, alighting near a floating bale of cotton, upon which he floated uninjured, but much blackened and muddled. Arrived at a village several miles below, to which the news of the disaster had preceded him, he was accosted by the editor of the village paper, with whom he was well acquainted, and eager for an item.

"I say, boy! is the S—— blown up?"

"Yes."

"Was Captain S—— killed?"

"No; I am Captain S——."

"The thunder you are! How high was you blown?"

"High enough to think of every mean thing I ever did in my life before I came down."

The editor started on a run for his office; the paper about going to press, and not wishing to omit the item of intelligence for the next issue, two weeks off, wrote as follows:

"The steamer S—— has burst her boiler, we learn from Captain S——, who says he was blown up long enough to think of every mean thing he ever did in his life before he lit. We suppose he was up about three months."

The next issue apologized for the above thus:

"We meant to say the boat was three months old, and not the Captain; who is, of course, worse nor what we said in our last paper."

OLD KENTUCKY is always good for good stories; like these, for example, which come to the Drawer from Frankfort:

Some years ago, at a large barbecue, gotten up in honor of a political triumph, the dining-table was adorned with a monster pound-cake, composed of saw-dust, and sufficient flour, and perhaps other things, to give it a proper consistency and color. The company, knowing that it was intended for show only, the cake was untouched during the sumptuous feast.

After the crowd had nearly all dispersed, and the table was pretty well cleared of eatables, old Jimmy Jones, who had been delayed, arrived upon the ground late and hungry. Seeing but little else, he pitched boldly and without ceremony into the big cake. He put a large slice in his bosom, and with another in his hand started for home. Just as he had taken his first bite he was met by a friend, who cried out, "Halloo! Uncle Jimmy, what have you got there?"

"It's pound-cake; but, I believe, if wasn't for the 'name of the thing,' I would as soon have a piece of good corn bread!"

THERE formerly lived in this place an old negro known by the name of "Bull Bob." His ingenious contrivances for obtaining lucre, on a small scale, would rival those of the most celebrated swindlers. Though grave, and very polite in manner and in the forms of speech, yet his wit was marked with malice and sarcasm.

One of Bob's arraignments was for theft of a chicken. He was defended by his wealthy young master, Winston Jones, in his maiden speech, he having just commenced the practice of law. The effort was a good one; but Bob, perhaps, did not like it, for the reason that it did not acquit him.

JUDGE. "The Court sentences the prisoner to receive twenty lashes."

BULL BOB. "I thank you, Massa Judge; I thank you, Sir; I thank you."

JUDGE. "What are you thanking me for, Bob?"

BULL BOB. "Why, I was a-fearing that my character and Massa William's pleadin' would 'ave hung me!"

THE preamble is better than the story that follows. It comes from Texas:

My rib and I came to Crockett, Texas, about eighteen years ago, at a period of which we now speak as "The Dark Ages." Our county was then very sparsely populated, but the residents generally were about as queer a kettle of fish as can be found any where. There was no money, or almost none, among us; any one that was the lucky owner of six bits was a real whale; but as for eating, we lived like fighting-cocks: plenty of good beef and pork at one to two cents a pound; a venison ham 15 to 25 cents; young wild turkeys (delicious), fixed up ready for cooking, at 12½ cents each; eggs at 5 cents a dozen, and butter 6½ to 10 cents a pound; no money asked in exchange, an order on the store for dry goods was estimated as a full quid pro quo. Our circulating medium was principally notes promising to pay good second-rate cows and calves on demand. My vocation was, and still is, selling rags and other odds, ends, and variorum; also groceries, which, according to the Texas nomenclature of that day, consisted of sugar, coffee, gunpowder, domestics, nails, and brogans!—these were strictly cash articles. During my first business season I sold one and a half pair of blankets and six yards of Kentucky jeans, being the sum total of woolen goods sold by me in that time. But we did not stand much in need of them, as the winter of 1841 and '42 was remarkably mild, the peach-tree leaves hanging on until the spring, when they were pushed off by the young ones popping out. What a change has come over us in this region! We are becoming as luxurious in our habits and tastes as the upper-tendom of the Fifth Avenue. Our gals must have their silks and satins, their hoops and high-heeled kids; and their mothers dip Garrett's Scotch snuff, and use store tea and white sugar; while we, their daddies and husbands, indulge in Champagne and Longworth's Catawba, chew silver-foil tobacco, and smoke Habanas at sixty dollars a thousand. But what a digression I have made! Now for my story:

Coffee is the greatest luxury an old Texan can think of; he drinks it half a dozen times a day; would not give a fig for either cream or sugar in it, but he wants it strong enough to float an iron wedge! In 1843 I had about half a sack—all there was within thirty miles, probably—and I was keeping it religiously for my customers—those by whom I lived. I was one day in the act of pouring a dollar's-worth, just weighed out of the scale into a pillow-slip, when I stepped as jovial "a broth of a boy" as you would meet in a summer day's travel; however, he was too fond of "red-eye" and sitch like decoctions for me to enroll him on my list of customers. I was too poor to indulge in such benevolence. His name was, and is, Shirley Goodwin—and I am glad to say he is yet with us. He addressed me, as he entered,

"Mr. C——, I want a dollar's-worth of coffee."

I replied, "You can't have it."

"Why? Is not my money as good as any other's?"

I told him, "No; I must keep my coffee for my customers."

"But, Mr. C——," he replied, "it is not my fault that I am not one of your customers; I would have been one cheerfully, but you wouldn't let me."

That answer took me. Of course all I could say was, "Shirley, open your slip; the coffee must come!"

A FRIEND sends us one more incident of the Mexican War, and he vouches for its literal truth:

Immediately following the capture of the City of Mexico by the Americans under General Scott, the Mexicans commenced murdering the officers and soldiers by shooting them from the house-tops as they passed along the streets.

To put a stop to this barbarous custom, General Scott issued orders to enter and sack all houses from which these shots were fired. A day or two after this order, an officer, passing along the streets, saw a "son of the green isle" very deliberately walking up and down in front of some houses, apparently amusing himself by examining the architecture of the Mexicans. When the officer approached, the following dialogue took place:

OFFICER. "What are you doing there, Sir? You will be shot from some of these houses."

SOLDIER. "Arrah! now be aisy, Lieutenant; that's jist what I'm aafter. There's twinty of the boys waiting for thim to shoot me."

It is needless to say that it had not occurred to Pat that his share of the plunder would be very small, or that he was sacrificing himself "for the benefit of his friends," as the politicians say.

"Not many years since," writes a new correspondent, "I happened to be a passenger in a vessel bound from the Island of Sumatra to Boston. The day we left port we had purchased boat-loads of fruit and vegetables; and finding we could get fowls at a very moderate price, we took as many as we could put into the coops. We had a negro on board, who performed the double duty of cook and steward, an ingenious fellow. He could dish up and disguise porpoise, with various condiments, till a person of strong imagination would at once pronounce it 'beef à la mode.'"

"But the hash he manufactured! Ah, that was hash!—a quantity of either salt beef, porpoise, or salt pork, with some ship's-biscuit well soaked, flavored with a little beef-skimmings, and seasoned with pepper—the whole finely chopped, and served up hot—ah! 'there was richness,' genius, talent, ingenuity!

"In the cook's own expressive language, 'Salt beef is nuthin' to cook, salt pork is nuthin', beans is nuthin'; but when I frowes myself into de hash, I'm dere—you'd better believe I's sum'!

"But with all his matchless skill in cookery he had his little failings. In the graphic language of the mate, 'he could lie the legs off an iron pot, and steal the ears off a jackass.' We had fowls roasted twice a week for the cabin table; and for two weeks they had appeared nicely cooked, minus hearts, livers, and gizzards. Now our worthy Captain had a weakness for giblets, and when he found there were none with the fowls his anger was roused.

"Steward, steward! where's the giblets?" he cried.

"Giblets," replied the steward, hesitating and stammering; 'why, Cap'n, dem—dem—dem are fowls what you bought on the coast didn't have none!'

"Didn't have any?" asked the Captain; are you sure?"

"Yes, Cap'n, I'se sartin sure; I done killed 'em and cooked 'em myself!"

"This was too much. We had heard of a no-haired horse, of calves with five legs and three heads, of Barnum-mermaids, and many other very curious things; but of a fowl minus heart, liver, and gizzard—never! Oh, such a shout as we raised! The Captain, who, indignant at the steward's answer, had risen to his feet, now yelled with laughter. He laughed so heartily that his strength gradually left him, and he sank down on the transom perfectly exhausted; the rest of us roared till we rolled from our chairs, the tears running down our cheeks. And there stood the negro, evidently saying something, we could not hear what—for his voice could not be distinguished above the din—but we saw his lips moving, and his hands in an imploring attitude.

"After quiet was restored, the Captain, with as serious a face as he could put on, said, 'Steward, now recollect, from this time henceforth, as long as you are aboard this ship, I wish you to be very careful to see that all the fowls that are cooked for this cabin have giblets.' And he did."

"A FEW years ago, in this goodly State (Ohio), there lived on a small stream called 'Duck Creek' a local preacher of the Methodist Church, by the name of Jacob Smith. His educational advantages had been somewhat slender; so that often in his preaching he 'murdered the King's English' by wholesale. On one occasion he was preaching in his own neighborhood, in 'Smith's Meeting-house.' During the sermon some of the young Smiths indulged in bad behavior. He paused, drew himself up to his full height, and pointing his long, hard finger at them, exclaimed,

"What! will you cut up here in Smith's old meetin'-house, when there lies your grandmother (pointing through the window to the grave-yard), what is the offspring of us all?"

COUNSELOR R——, who was afterward appointed to the bench of the Supreme Court in the — State, is a lawyer of extensive legal attainments, and in accepting the ermine forsook a very large and lucrative practice. He has, however, the reputation of being the longest winded counsel and most prosy advocate that ever tried a case in these parts. His jury arguments rarely fell short of seven hours in length, and his examinations of witnesses were tedious beyond conception. The following "veritable fact" is told of him as illustrating his style in this behalf:

At court, not long since, Mr. R—— was engaged in the trial of a cause where the opposite side had attempted to prove the alleged signature of Ebenezer Carleton a forgery. An expert had sworn that in his opinion it was not the handwriting of Ebenezer Carleton, and was turned over to Counselor R——, who cross-examined him in this wise:

"Mr. Witness, look at this signature again; look particularly at the letter E. Now tell the Court and jury what you see in the first hair-line of this letter that makes you think it is not a genuine signature."

This question having been answered as well as it could be, Mr. R—— continued,

"Now look at the turn at the top of the E, and tell us how that differs from the turn of an E in the genuine signature."

And so he went on, examining the witness as to the up-strokes, the down-strokes, the loop, and the turns of this letter E, for nearly an hour, till the patience of the Court was pretty well exhausted.

"Mr. R——," said the Judge, "are you not making this examination rather tedious?"

"Perhaps so. May it please your Honor, the witness may now pass on to the letter b."

A TENNESSEE correspondent says that "William H. Polk, the brother of the late President, was, until a few days prior to our recent elections, an independent candidate for Congress. It seems that Mr. Thomas (the successor of George W. Jones) habitually in their discussions charged Polk with inconsistency. He said on one occasion to Mr. Polk, 'Sir, in 1850-'51 you were a Compromise man; since that time you have been a fire-eater; and you were again a quasi American; and then again you were "soft" on the "nigger question;" and now, Sir, how are you to-day, Mr. Polk?' In an instant Polk was on his feet, and, with a bow and his hand extended, replied, 'Pretty well, I thank you, Colonel Thomas. How do you do yourself?'"

A GEORGIA contributor says:

I believe that the Drawer has some acquaintance with Judge —, of — County, Georgia. He lives about twenty-five miles south of —, in this State, at a quiet country retreat, where his friends always receive a hearty welcome and unbounded hospitality. The Judge is very Democratic, both in politics and religion, and especially so in the latter. Several years ago he was in attendance on the Superior Court. The Presbyterians of the place, headed by their zealous and energetic minister, were at that time actively engaged in an effort to build a new house of worship. The Reverend Mr. Collins was zealously enlisted in the good cause, and never let an opportunity slip without presenting his subscription-list to all whom he might meet. One day, when court adjourned, as Judge — was passing out of the court-house door, the reverend gentleman touched the Judge on the shoulder and asked him to step aside with him a moment, when the following colloquy took place:

"This is Judge —, I believe," said Mr. Collins.

"It is," said the Judge.

"We are engaged," said Mr. C., "in endeavoring to build us a new house of worship. Perhaps this (handing the Judge his subscription-list) will inform you my object better than I can tell you."

Here the Judge looked very professional, took out his spectacles, examined the heading of the list very critically, and for a moment seemed engaged in profound thought, then turning to the expectant parson, the Judge, with a sly twinkle of the eye and the blandest smile imaginable, remarked, "that will bind them, Sir—that will bind them: no doubt about it—that will bind them."

This took the reverend gentleman a little aback. But rallying again, he renewed the attack in the following style:

"But, Judge, you don't understand me; I want you to help us. We are going to raise—"

"Ah!" said the Judge. "You are going to have a raising—a house raising are you? Well, just let me know when it is, and I will send up three or four hands with pleasure."

Here Mr. C.'s countenance exhibited a good deal of disgust, and he appeared to be perfectly bewildered at what seemed the Judge's stupidity. "Why," said he, "Judge, it's a brick house we want."

"A brick house, is it?" said the Judge; "a brick house? Won't a log house do as well? Several years ago we built a log house in our community for religious purposes—some cut the logs—some hewed them—some split the boards—some raised the house—and some covered it—and the Lord has never made any complaint against it yet. If you'll build a log house and the Lord complains, I'll head your subscription-list for a brick one."

The parson gave in, and left.

IN Duxbury, Massachusetts, lived Bill Hoebay, as he was called, the ugliest-looking loafer that the town ever had. Bill got awakened in a time of great religious excitement, and one day, at a crowded meeting, when the people were standing around the windows unable to get in the house, Bill was telling his experience.

"My friends," said Bill, "for fifty years I have carried the devil on my shoulders." At this a voice in the window cried out,

"If he had looked you in the face he would have dropped off in a hurry!"

Bill was bothered, and reserved his speech for another occasion.

THE Navy is not as liberal in its contributions to the Drawer as the other arm of the service; but this is good:

The Ohio lay at anchor in Gibraltar Bay, and a heavy blow coming on, we lost one of our anchors. After the gale subsided we raised the anchor, but found it broken, one of the flukes being gone. Not having a spare one, the Commodore procured one of the British officer in command of the Navy Yard there. We took the old stock and went ashore in the Navy Yard to put it on. Weaver was one of the gang.

The sloop of war Wasp, that was captured from us by the Poitiers seventy-four gun ship, lay alongside of the wharf, and the English officers were sauntering about looking at us Yankees work. Frank Lyons, one of our men, although an Englishman, never missed an opportunity of giving them a rub; in fact, he disliked his countrymen so much that we surmised that he, like Barrington, left his country for his country's good. Frank sings out to Weaver, in a tone loud enough to attract the attention of the British officers, "Weaver, do you know what little old craft that is laying alongside the wharf?"

Weaver saw in an instant what Frank was driving at, and sings out, "Why, to be sure I do. That's our old sloop, the Wasp. It took a British line-of-battle ship to capture her."

The officers appreciated the joke and roared with laughter.

THE thermometer story in the October number recalls an incident of still earlier date in the annals of Indiana legislation. My old friend Johnson W——, then barely of age, had been elected to represent the county of D—— in the Legislature which was about to meet at Vincennes in 1819. But let him tell his own story:

"When I got near Vincennes I began to think what a sorry figure I, a green country lad, would cut in an assembly of the wisdom of the State, and it required all my resolution to keep me from turning back. Somehow or other I managed to get through the swearing-in process, and sneaked away to a seat, from which I hardly ventured to look up until the House adjourned for dinner. On returning to my hotel I was rather gratified to find that I was to have as a room-mate a brother member, who, as he had made at least six speeches during the forenoon session, I naturally regarded as one of the great men of the House. After dinner he came up to our joint room, and carefully closing the door, pulled out of his pocket an enormous, old-fashioned, bull's-eye watch, and handed it to me with this remark:

"Uncle Jake told me, just as I was starting, that I ought to hev a watch, and loaned me this, but I don't know how to screw the thing up; do you?"

"I walked into the legislative hall that afternoon with the most unlimited confidence in my ability to discharge all duties incumbent on me as a legislator."

PAGE C—— was pretty extensively known in the olden time as one of the hardest of the hard—not a court passed without half a dozen indictments against him for assault and battery. He had just been tried and fined heavily, and was standing in a meditative mood upon the upper step of the court-house door. One step below him stood a stranger whom Page had never before seen, and who certainly had given him no cause of offense. Without a word Page struck the unsuspecting and astonished individual a "sockdollager," and of course tumbled him headlong down the flight of steps. The grand jury was still in session, and within an hour another indictment was returned, a plea of guilty entered, and a fine assessed and paid. As Page walked up town from the court-house he was asked what motive he had in striking the man.

"Well, the fact was," said he, "he stood so fair I couldn't help it."

A CORRESPONDENT in Savannah says: "A legal firm of this city had occasion to write a dum to a countryman, and concluded their letter as follows: 'Yr. Obt. Svt., BAILEY & LE ROY.' In due course of mail came the answer, addressed on the envelope 'To Messrs. Yr. Obt. Svt., Bailey & Le Roy.'

"This, however, is hardly equal to another, who, having some business with a Justice of the Peace, addressed his letter to 'John Doe, A Squire, Box Ville, Ga.'

"If any of your readers have any thing drollier than these I hope they will send them to you."

WE seldom find so coarse a bit of humor in the Drawer as the following; but its very breadth will excuse it.

There lives in Halifax, Virginia, a character whom we shall call John C., who has a remarkable facility in making verses. He calls himself a "versatile genius," and asserts that he can convince any body, by a three-hours' talk, that Burns is "nowhere" in comparison with himself. As for Shakspeare, Byron, etc., he can't imagine how they came to be so much "augmented" (meaning overrated, I suppose) by the world. A few nights ago I heard him relate the following "scrape" with a good deal of humor, and with an affectation of propriety of language which should be heard to be appreciated:

"Well, you say you never hearn tell of that composition of mine that I call 'Cooner's Funeral Sermon?' Well, then, I'll relate it to you; but I must first give you a pre-face to it by way of explaining of it.

"You see there used to be a long, yaller, free nigger, named Isaac Cooner, that lived up on Wimbush's pond, and I had a right smart debt of vengeance agin him, which was this: You see I had hired him to ditch out my spring branch, jist to erritate the land, which was too mushy and damp-like, and he cheated me 'bout it, but I didn't say nothing 'bout it to nobody, but jist nourished it to myself easy and quiet. Well, some time after that I was riding 'long the road, and I met his mother and a yaller gal—must a been his sister, I reckon—a cryin' and lookin' mighty down in the mouth. They didn't know me, and I asked 'em what was the matter, when they up and told me Isaac Cooner was dead, and they'd jist been to the Court-house to git a preacher to bury him, but couldn't find none no-whar. Well, thinks I, here's a good chance to pay off my debt of vengeance; so I puts on a long face, and begins to snuffle, and tells 'em I reckoned I could do it for 'em; but I didn't belong to the same sex, for I was a Methodist. You see I knowed they was Methodists, but I jist put on so to fool 'em. Well, they said, mighty peart, they was Methodists too, and I'd suit 'em mighty well if I'd only do it. Well, at last I 'lowed I'd go and preach the funeral at 11 o'clock, and left 'em. When I got to the house thar was about twenty or thirty free niggers thar, and I rode up and tied my horse to an old apple-tree jist outside of the door. They was mighty glad to see me, and had every thing ready, and I made 'em put the table close by the front door, and then commenced. Well, I read a chapter in Job, and sung a tune, and looked round to see if my horse was convenient, and then begun the sermon. Says I:

"When Death it comes it does not flatter—
See how it's stretched that long mulatto;
There he is, and there he lies;
No one laughs, and no one cries.
He was a rogue and liar from his birth,
A useless wretch upon the earth;
The shoats and lambs that he has taken,
Corn and wheat and good old bacon,
Collected together now and sold,
Would amount to more than his weight in gold.
But now he lies as cold as krout,
It's the duty of all of us here to shout
That we've got rid of Isaac Cooner,
And wish he'd a gone a great sight sooner.
The neighbors' turkeys, ducks, and geese,
And hen-roosts now may have some peace.
No more we'll hear the midnight squalling,
And the owners running out and bawling;
And him a taking to his scrapers,
For he's now in — a cutting capers;
How long he'll stay, and how he'll fare,
There's none that know, and few that care."

"Well, soon as I commenced you never see such a wonderfied-looking set of niggers in your life. They was too much astonished to do a thing; and as soon as I got through I busted out o' the door, and the way I made that old horse use his pins was just about right. As soon as I cut grit they all started too, and let loose two big bull-dogs they had chained; and the last I heard of them they was all a hol-lerin', 'Sick him! sick him! si-i-i-ck him!'"

An attentive correspondent in the South says: "I send you the following copy of a will for the Editor's Drawer. It may amuse you and your readers, as it did me. Be assured it is a faithful copy; but I hope not a good specimen of our will-writers:

FOR GLORY AND FAME.

BY HENRY GATLEY, U.S.A.

For glory and fame—for glory and fame,
Toiling with aching hands and brain;
For only a name—for only a name,
Risking all a bauble to gain.

For station and wealth—for station and wealth,
Living a life of strife and pain;
Our pleasure and health—our pleasure and health
Ventured and lost for worldly gain.

For temporal show—for temporal show,
Forgetting our Father in heaven above
Most surely must know—ah! surely must know
How little our fellow-men we love.

And what do we gain?—oh! what do we gain—
E'en though our ends are all attained—
But envy and pain? for envy and pain
Is all that ever the worldly gained.

'Tis better indeed—much better indeed,
If talent and strength to us are given,
With many a deed, the unfortunate need,
To scatter the way that leads to heaven.

For glory and fame—for glory and fame
Harden the heart and rack the brain;
And only a name—yea, only a name
Has cost the world a world of pain.

For glory and fame—for glory and fame,
Strong men crippled and brave men slain;
For only a name—for only a name,
Widows and orphans weeping in vain.

For station and wealth—for station and wealth,
Robbing the poor and crushing the weak;
Their pleasure and health—their pleasure and health
Stealing from those who are lowly and meek.

Ah! what shall it profit a man though he gain
Titles, and wealth, and honor, and fame,
If when in his costly tomb he's lain
The poor pass by and wail the strain,
"He bartered his soul for only a name."

A GENUINE letter, addressed to a very respectable lady, well known to some of our readers, has been placed in the Drawer for publication. The writer is evidently not a reader, and will never see his epistle in print:

"A long stand of respect Most Dier Madam not only presenting you with my Respects but my love at the same time. Circumstances alters cases dier Madam I am once more plased in a situation in life to seek the Charmes of the fair sex being once rejected is no damp to my feelings being a free born Republican I grant the same liberty to others that is to do as I think best that I take myself Believing as I always have that you are a lady that is willing to Divide the sorrows of life what you think of me is best know to yourself? it is not worth while to go through a lengthy Catalogue at this time as my request is a short one and easy grantd without the ingruy of any one I frankly ask the privilage of your Company if it is for one time only to Converse with you upon whatever Subject we may deem suitable as I Can better talk than write so in Conclusion I will say that if it should be your good pleasure to grant my request drop me a line to that effect and on the Contrary drop me a line if you should grant my request you will also have the goodness to state the time and plase where I can find you as I am not certain where you live if you would permit me to dictate this part of the matter I would prfur Receiving your Company by wating on you to or from some Meeting in the neighborhood as I would not like for the world to get wise too fast as I have plased it in your power to dispose of a letter from me in the way you thought best please give it a fair investigation and do so again as I guarantee to every one the liberty that I take my self that is to do as I think best I would say in Conclusion that if my desires and requests are Complyd with I can place any lady in easy and Comfortable situation but happiness is not mine to give but Can only say my best indeavour to permote both as I fear that I have already said too much I will conclude by subscribing my self your most sincer friend."

A CORRESPONDENT, on whose word we are willing to rely, writes to us of the marvelous intelligence of one of the good citizens of Boston town, the Athens of America, and the knowingest place in all creation. He says:

"I was walking with a friend in the old graveyard on Copp's Hill. We passed from grave to grave. I was looking for the old ones—he, for the new. At length I saw an old brown stone, nearly sunk into the ground, and stooped down to decipher its inscription, and, after pulling the grass away, made out that it was the grave of a woman that died A.D. 1623. Without looking up, I made the remark that she must have died at some other place, for I thought Boston was not settled at that time; for I believed the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth in 1618 or '20. Which was it?"

"I am not sure," said he. "Let me see"—scratching his head—"who was it that headed the Pilgrims when they landed at Plymouth? Was it Lord Cornwallis?"

"No," said I, "I think not."

"Yes, I am sure it was," said he; "for I remember reading all about it."

"I was fairly struck dumb at hearing such a remark from an American citizen, with Bunker Hill Monument staring us full in the face. There was no excuse for such ignorance. The man had lived in Boston for twenty years, kept a store in a good street, owned a house, in which he lived, worth at least ten thousand dollars. This was all said in sober earnest; and I have no doubt the gentleman thought himself more intelligent than any man west of New England."

"In June, 1856, when Willie was not four years old, his oldest brother died, whose family pet-name was 'Tip.' In the following August Willie's mother was confined to her bed by sickness.

"Ma," asked Willie, standing by her bedside, 'are you going to die?'

"I do not know, Willie," replied his mother; "it is hard to answer that question."

"If you do die, ma," said Willie, 'please give my love to Tip!'

"VISITING the Alms-house the other day, in company with a friend, whose son, a bright little fellow of five years old, accompanied us, we discoursed by the way of paupers, and the best mode of treating them.

"Charley listened attentively for some time, then asked, 'Papa, what is a pauper?'

"Why, my son, a pauper is a poor person without friends; one who has no papa to take care of him."

"Charley looked serious for a time, then cried out merrily, 'Oh, yes, papa, I know; you're a pauper—grandpap's dead!'

"I HAVE three boys: Bob, sixteen, Harry, twelve, and Toby, as we call him for short, four years old. Bob not appearing in proper time for breakfast, mother directed Harry to call him forthwith. Not caring to climb the stairway, Harry employed his baby brother to call Bob.

"Trotting down stairs beside his elder brother, Toby looks up and says, 'Bob, hadn't you better give me a penny for bringing you down stairs? Harry gave me one for coming up after you.'"

"THE following is a copy, verbatim et literatim, of a letter to a fascinating young lady of this city (Louisville), who spent the previous summer in the country, and added another to her numerous victims. She laughs over the Drawer, and is willing to show her partiality to you by permitting you to read her lover's letter:

"G—— Ky. April 14th dear miss, I adress the opportunity to inform you that I am well hoping these few lines will find you enjoying the Same state of health an on married it is actually the fact I love you So well that I cannot rest I am always Studying about you it dos me no good at all I have been studying about you ever sense last July if you aint married ore abot to marry I want you to answer this letter. I dont want you to take it as a insult for what I say comes from the veary botom of my heart. I love you beter than any other woman in the world non excepted. I drempt the other night that I an you was married an when I woked an found it was a dream it grieved me woss an woss, my love is Round like some golden ring so is my love to you my friend

BUT the Kentucky letter is not equal to the following, from Tennessee:

"——, Feb. 14, '58.

"MY DEAREST MATTIE,—If you but knew the palpitations of this heart as it beats fondly for the associations which have so often shown me the delights of being in cultivated society! But, alas! sad indeed is the change which has attended me since I abandoned the numerous blandishments of a happy home, in search of that most precious of all jewels (an education). I said most precious of all jewels. This I should surely qualify. I do not include the being whom God has created as the sole associate in time of grief and sadness (a wife); but I mean of those which he may possess from industry and energetic continuity. Surely I could not compare any of man's attainments to the most glorious and wonderful of Divine mechanism! But, I say, if you but knew for one moment what revolves in this mind (though I confess it weak and illy stored), you would not have the least disposition to censure me for thus troubling you in your pleasant ovation of happiness and joy.

"The glorious bird, the pride of godlike Jove, as he sits on his imperial throne, would never have known the delights and pleasures of sailing magnificently in heaven's ethereal azure vault were he not to risk himself on the powers of his pinions, and firmly meet the raging and convulsions of the elements. So I feel with regard to this venture. If I succeed, I am amply paid; if not, I can, like the 'gallant Hector,'

"Proclaim to kings in royal state, That though I perish, yet I perish great!"

or, at least, in a great pursuit. Dr. Franklin says that we should temper our exertions in proportion to the value of the goal of our desires. Then indeed I should, to do justice in this, rival at least the beauties of Virgil, and should in no degree fall behind the immortal Shakespeare or Byron. But I have already been too lengthy. I will then wish you an unending chain of happiness, and await an answer with anxiety. Please don't disappoint. Truly yours."

SCOTT tells a story of a gentleman who, irritated at some misconduct of his servant, said, "John, either you or I must quit the house!" "Vera weel, Sir," said John; "where will your honor be ganging to?"

HOLIDAYS IN COSTA RICA.

BY THOMAS FRANCIS MEAGHER.

II.—SAN JOSÉ.

EARTHQUAKES are opposed to lofty pretensions. These occur pretty often in the valley of San José. There were three during our stay—one for each month. But it is only once or twice in a century, perhaps, they do any mischief. The last of the mischievous earthquakes occurred in 1841, when 961 houses were ruined outright, 1004 damaged considerably, and 22 people were killed. Were the houses of San José taller than they are, however, a fatal fit of the shakes might prove with them an event of more frequent occurrence. They are but one story high. The few—the half-dozen or so—that depart from this rule, are nervous exceptions, and look like awkward intruders. Jogging along in our high-peaked saddles to the Hotel de Costa Rica,

THE EASTER PROCESSION.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1859, by Harper and Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

VOL. XX.—No. 116.—K

the evening of our arrival, we felt ourselves looking over the roofs, the houses are so prudently low. It was a Liliputian city, it seemed to us, and we, the Gullivers in red flannel-shirts, riding it down.

For the most part built of adobe—the brick dried in the sun—and, whitewashed from head to foot, San José looks clean and bright. If it has none of the sombre picturesqueness peculiar to most of the Spanish cities of Central and South America, neither has it any of their peculiar odor, and little of the refuse with which they teem. It is but eighty-five years old.

At the intersections of the principal streets, there are handsome lamp-posts of cast iron. These have been imported from England. But, as yet, they burn no gas in San José. The Municipality illuminates with wick and oil, and sparingly with that. The houses have chimneys, moreover, and glass in their windows. This is not usually the case with

SAN JOSÉ.

Spanish-American houses. The reason is obvious. No one wants a fire in the Dog-days—no one shuts himself up in a Conservatory when he wants a mouthful of air. But San José stands 4000 feet above the sea, and from the mountains of San Miguel and the volcano of Irazu, between which it lies, there comes many a cold wind even in the brightness of the summer.

The Municipal Council of San José consists of three Chief-magistrates, and two Syndic procuradores. These officers are elected annually by the property-holders of the city, and are presided over by the Governor of the Province. They employ a Secretary and a Door-keeper, and hold their meetings once a month. Should circumstances require it, an extraordinary session may be called at any moment. The duties of the Council consist in the framing of all necessary local regulations, the designation of the citizens liable to serve in the Militia, the collection and disbursement of the Municipal taxes, the assessment of the expenses of each canton or district within the Province, the superintendence of the rudimentary Public schools, the agricultural interests, trade and manufactures. The Council is, also, empowered to negotiate loans, on the credit of the Municipal revenues, for the promotion of Public works. These revenues are derived from various sources—partly from the Tobacco and other Custom-house duties—principally from the license-tax imposed upon shopkeepers and traders generally.

The Police are picturesque. A little after sunset, they are mustered in the Plaza and told off for duty. With a carbine slung across the shoulder, a short brass-hilted sword and cartouche-box, a torn straw-hat, and an old blanket, full of holes, as a uniform, they patrol the silent city until daybreak, calling the hours, whistling the alert every half-hour, and, as their dreary vigils terminate, offering up the oracion del sereno—Ave Maria Purissima!—in the most dismal recitative.

They are faithful creatures, however, those ragged Policemen of San José. They are dutiful, vigilant and brave, though a stranger now and then may come across one of them snoring on the steps of a door-way, as we did occasionally in our surveys of the city by moonlight. The first time this occurred to us, the poor fellow was bundled up under the heel of an enormous boot, the original of which stands eight feet high in Chatham Street. The copy, at the corner of the Calle de la Puebla in San José, was furnished by an accomplished Filibuster to Mons. Eugénie, the French boot-maker, whose portentous sign it is. The artist was a prisoner of war. But even so, in captivity and defeat he proclaimed his principles. He stuck a spur with an immense rowel into the heel of the gigantic boot, and gave three cheers for General Walker and the Lone Star!

But there is no need of the Police—none whatever. Costa Rica is the most temperate and peaceful of countries, and San José is the most temperate and peaceful of cities. One might be provoked into saying it was stupidly well-behaved and insipidly sensible. The chiffonnier would have little to do there. The lawyer from the vicinity of the Tombs would fare no better. The entire rascality of the exemplary place is not worth an affidavit. Cock-fighting is the only dissipation the people indulge in, and that on Feasts of Obligation and Sundays exclusively.

Being one of the Institutions of the country, it would have never done for Don Ramon and Don Francisco to have overlooked or shunned the Cock-pit. Martyrs to the love of knowledge, they visited it with the purest motives, urged by a curiosity as disinterested as that which might have tempted a perfect stranger—an Ancient Briton for instance—to drop into the Roman amphitheatre in the days of the Thracian prize-fights.

Passing a rude door-way, they came upon an elderly gentleman with a rusty mustache. He was sitting in a chair scooped out of a block of mahogany, and held in his left hand a pack of small printed cards, the tickets of admission to the rascally arena. Having paid him two rials, he drew aside a torn pink calico curtain, and with a gracious entren ustedes Señores, bowed, stroked his mustache, and resumed his collection of rials. A second after, the Martyrs found themselves in a windy wooden building, which seemed to them, for all the world, like a cow-shed that had been converted into something resembling a circus.

It was Whitsunday. The place was crowded. All classes of Society were represented there. The merchant and the peddler—Colonels with blazing epaulets and half-naked privates—doctors, lawyers, Government clerks, fathers of families, genteel gentlemen with ample waistcoats and gray heads, youths of eighteen and less—the latter peppered with the spiciest pertness, and boiling all over with a maddening avidity for pesos and cuartas.

The benches of the theatre rise one above another, forming a square, within which, on the moist clay floor, inclosed by a slight wooden barrier eighteen inches high, is the fatal ring. In a nook, to the right of the pink calico curtain, stands a small table, upon which the knives, the twine for fastening them, the stone and oil for sharpening them, the fine-toothed saw for cutting the gaffs, and all the other exquisite odds and ends, devised for the deadly equipment of the gladiators, are laid out. The knives used in this butchery, are sharp as lancets and curved like cimeters. While the lists are being arranged, and the armorers are busy lacing on the gyves and weapons of the combatants, and many an ounce of precious metal is risked on their chances of life and death, the gladiators pertinaciously keep crowing with all their might, and in the glossiest feather saucily strut about the ring as far as their hempen garters will permit them.

Don Ramon and his friend remarked, the moment they entered, that the betting was high and brisk. Gold pieces changed hands with a dazzling rapidity. The Costa Ricans are proverbial for their economy and caution. Outside the Cock-pit they never spend a medio—not so much as half a dime—if they can help it. Inside this charmed circle, they are the most prodigal of spendthrifts. One sallow lad particularly struck them. He had neither shoes nor stockings—not so much as a scrap of raw ox-hide to the sole of his foot. But had every pimple on his face been a ruby—and his face was a nursery of pimples—he could not have been more bold and lavish with his purse. It came, however, to a crisis with him. Stretching across Don Ramon to take the bet of another infatuated sportsman in broad-cloth and embroidered linen, he staked a fistful of gold on a red cock of the most seductive points and perfectly irresistible spunk. It was all he had in the world. There was a fluttering of cropped wings, a shaking of scarlet crests, a cross-fire of murderous glances, a sudden spring, a bitter tussle, fuss and feathers, a pool of blood, and the fistful of gold—all that the sallow-skinned pimple-faced prodigal had in the world—was gone!

A ruthless, senseless, ignoble game, it is fast going out of fashion. There was a time, and that not more than five or six years ago, when the President and the whole of his Cabinet were to be seen in the Cock-pit. But it is seldom, if ever, that a distinguished politician, much less a statesman, even on the eve of an election, is discovered there now. Neither the mind, nor the manhood, nor the heart of the people will suffer when it has been utterly abolished.

The morning after our arrival, we called on the Bishop of San José. His residence is an humble one. Two workmen, tip-toe on ladders, were repairing the plaster over the door-way just as we reached it. Stepping across a perfect morass of mortar, we entered the zaguan. An aged gentleman softly approached us before we had time to call the Portero and send in our cards.

Tall, thin, sharp-featured, with a yellowish brown skin and long spare fingers, his eye was keen, his step firm, his voice distinct and full. He wore a pectoral gold cross and purple silk cassock. The latter had a waterish look. The purple had been diluted into pink. A velvet cap of the same weak color in great measure concealed his hair, which was short, and flat, and seemed as though it had been dashed with damp white pepper. It was the venerable Anselmo Lorenté, the Bishop of San José.

A door stood open on the left of the zaguan. The Bishop pointed to it. He did so with a sweet smile and graciousness. Bowing to him respectfully, we passed into a dull saloon.

The walls were covered with a winterish paper, and would have been woefully bare were it not for three paintings which hung from the slim cornice opposite the windows looking into the street. One of these paintings—a likeness of Pius the Ninth—was really a treasure. A superb souvenir of Rome, it had all the softness, the calmness, the exquisite minuteness of finish which characterize the works of Carlo Dolce. The likeness of Anselmo Lorenté looked raw and miserable beside it. The third painting represented the ascension of a devout Prelate in full pontificals from the grave. For so glaring an outrage on canvas, it would have been a just chastisement had the Painter gone down while the Prelate went up.

Between the two windows facing these paintings, there stood a table of dark mahogany. It was covered with faded red moreen, books, pieces of sealing-wax, quills and papers. An arm-chair stood behind the table. Behind the arm-chair there stood a screen, and from this a canopy projected. Arm-chair, screen and canopy, every thing was covered with faded red moreen. There was neither carpeting nor matting on the floor. The boards, however, were warmly coated with dust, the accumulation of months of domestic repose.

Having read the letters we had handed him on entering, the Bishop rose from the sofa—a sad piece of furniture it was—and cordially welcomed us to San José. The cordiality of the welcome was tempered with dignity. It was the subdued cordiality of age.

Just then there was a tap at the door. The Bishop was called out for a moment. During his absence, a monk of the Reformed Order of St. Francis entered the room. He was from Quito. Heavily clothed in a drab gown and cloak, drab hood and trowsers, all cut out of a wool and cotton mixture manufactured in the Andes of Ecuador, with his cropped head, a face the color of pale butter, and a pair of dark-blue spectacles—behind which his large black eyes rolled incessantly—he was, in truth, a strange apparition. The Archbishop of Ecuador being dead, and the Archbishop of Panama being absent from that city on a visitation of his diocese, the pious brother of St. Francis had journeyed to Costa Rica to be ordained.

The Bishop, resuming his seat on the sofa, presented his case of cigarettos—it was a dainty little case made of colored straw—and invited us to smoke. The holy hobgoblin from Quito taking the mecha from the table, where it lay coiled up in the inkstand, succeeded, after a number of failures, in striking a light. Whereupon he knelt and extended the mecha to the Bishop. The Bishop having lit his cigaretto, the good monk kissed the episcopal ring, and rising with a profound obeisance, solemnly extinguished the fire. Shortly after, having silently glared at us through his purple spectacles, he bent the knee again, kissed the episcopal ring once more, and with head cast down, tucking his drab gown about him, retreated with a confused modesty from the room.

In the midst of fragrant clouds, Señor Lorenté pleasantly conversed with us. He spoke about the country, its drawbacks, its resources and its prospects, and in a few bright sentences, enunciated with considerable animation, gave us the principal points of its political history.

It was a deep source of regret to him that the churches of San José contained little to interest the stranger. They had no works of art, no paintings, no sculpture, and very few ornaments. The few they possessed were of the humblest description. The Spaniards had concentrated in Guatemala the entire wealth of the Central American church, and, up to this, Costa Rica had been too poor to enrich her altars. In Cartago, however, there were some old and valuable paintings, two or three fine images, shrines, reliquaries, and vestments of costly material and curious workmanship. From the churches, Señor Lorenté passed to the Indians of the country. His statements and surmises relative to the Guatusos of the valley of Frio—a race living absolutely secluded and permitting no stranger whatever to set foot within their mysterious domain—were deeply interesting. Every syllable he let fall upon this subject was eagerly caught up.

In the end, he referred us to the History of Guatemala by the Archbishop, Francisco de Paula García Pelaez. There was a learned and profound chapter in it devoted to the Guatusos. We should read it. He would give us a copy of the work. It would be a pledge to us of his regard, and of his anxiety to aid us in our laudable researches. He was delighted to find we had been educated by the Jesuits. They were the nobility, the flower, the chivalry of the Church. Her bravest soldiers, they had been her sublimest martyrs. Wherever they were, there was civilization, erudition, eloquence, a disciplined society, an elevated faith, and the loftiest example of magnanimity. It would be well for Costa Rica were they established in the country. But there was an ignorant prejudice against them, and his efforts to obtain admission and a recognized standing for them in the Republic, had proved unavailing so far.

As we rose to take leave, the Bishop opened the door leading into the zaguan, and calling to a young student who was reading in the piazza of the court-yard, desired him to take the History of Guatemala from the library, and accompany us with it to the Hotel. We begged him not to trouble the young student. We could easily take the books ourselves. But the gracious good Bishop would have his own way. His consideration for us was relentless. And so, we returned to our quarters, followed by the History of Guatemala, in three volumes, and a modest youth in a clerical cloak, and a brown felt hat of the California pattern.

Anselmo Lorenté is the first Bishop of Costa Rica, the country not having been erected into a separate Diocese until August, 1850. Previous to that, it was subordinate to the Bishopric of Nicaragua. Astaburuaga speaks of Señor Lorenté as a zealous, prudent, illustrious man, who does honor to the Church. The Roman Catholic religion is declared by law to be the religion of the country. The Constitution guarantees it the protection of the Government, at the same time it tolerates every other persuasion. By the Concordat ratified with the Court of Rome, October, 1852, tithes were done away with, an allowance to the Diocese of $10,000 per annum being substituted out of the National Treasury.

But it was with no affected modesty the Bishop spoke to us of the impoverished condition of the churches of San José. For Spanish-American churches, they are strikingly destitute of ornaments and treasures. The blank exterior, to say the least of it, is an honest index to the bleak interior. That of San Juan de Dios, however, of which Mr. Francis Kurtze, an enterprising and accomplished German, is the architect, will be a grand exception. The walls are high and massive. The decorations are chaste and solid. Corinthian pillars support the roof inside. Gardens, stocked with fragrant shrubs and fruit trees and tastefully laid out, inclose the graceful and imposing edifice.

The Cathedral of San José stands on the east side of the Plaza. It is built of lava-stone. Three lofty door-ways—twisted pilasters flanking them and intervening, a series of plain pilasters springing from a moulding above the door-ways and supporting the plainest architrave—these are the only noticeable features of the façade. The elevation of the tower is little more than thirty feet. A wooden structure—something like a block-house—stands upon these thirty feet of masonry, and from a beam, close under its pointed roof, there pendulates a monstrous bell.

N.B.—There is little music in that monstrous bell.

The same, however, may be said of all the bells, profane and sacred, in San José. At times—when they ring out all together—the tumult is provocative of something the reverse of prayer. A city swarming with tinkers, and the tinkers hard at work, would be quite as melodious, and just as endurable, as the unaccustomed ear finds San José to be at such times. But it is harsh to say so. Were the people of San José wealthy enough to have them, there would resound this day, throughout the valley of the Rio Torres and the Rio Maria Aguilar, bells as sonorous as the silver Susanne of Erfurt, or mighty in their tones as those which, thundering forth suddenly, saved the Roman-walled city of the Yonne from the ravages of Clothair.

The interior of the Cathedral has a striking and fine appearance. Out of the simplest materials—having neither gold nor porphyry, nor Byzantine pavements, nor stained glass to help them—the people of San José have built a temple not unworthy of the Faith of which it is the attestation. Branching off into arches, graceful shafts of the hardest wood which the forests of Costa Rica yield—wood such as that of the quiebrahacha, which signifies the axe-breaker—support the roof, dividing the building into three broad aisles, the main aisle, or, to speak more properly, the nave, being 35 feet in breadth and 300 feet in length. The walls are white. These lofty shafts of quiebrahacha have white veins running through them. But the arches in which they terminate, as well as the steep-slanting roof inside, are painted in arabesque, and this gives to the whole interior a rich and curious aspect. Handsome chandeliers descend from the roof by chains of burnished metal. Supported on pillars painted in imitation of Sienna marble, stretching across the nave, the organ-gallery rises above the High-altar, a few feet behind it. A screen of lattice-work conceals the organist and choir. It is delicately constructed and painted white. The organ, also, is painted white. But it has silver pipes in front, and carvings richly gilt. The choir for the Dean and Chapter occupies the eastern extremity of the nave, the stalls, fashioned of the costliest mahogany by Guatemalian workmen, being on a level with the platform on which the High-altar stands.

Besides the Cathedral, there are two other churches in San José. There is the church of Our Lady of Mercy, and there is the church of Our Lady of Carmel. They are the Penitents of Architecture. No structures could possibly look more modest, sorrowfully chaste, and humble. Walls of adobe, roofs of rough red tiles, floors of hardened clay, all cracked and gritty, belfries which seem to be but the skeletons of belfries—nothing could be poorer. In Holy Week, however, they wear a bright appearance. All their poverty and coldness—all their simplicity and inane sadness—all their silent miseries seem to vanish. They are warm, fragrant, florid. The nakedness of the walls disappears under folds of lace, and silks, and foliage. Palm-trees supplant, as it were, the sterile trunks which support the roofs. A pyramid appears where the High-altar stood, and over the crimson cloth, with which this pyramid from base to topmost point is draped, net-work and needle-work of elaborate contrivance and mellowed hue is thrown. The armoirs of San José fly open to the claims of the Mercedes and Carmen at such times as these. The steps of the pyramid sparkle with a thousand wax-lights burning in silver candlesticks, in translucent globes of clouded glass, in plated branches, in cups of brass and alabaster. Between the lights are flowers, shrubs, herbs and flowers—herbs, shrubs and flowers, such as a soil like that of Costa Rica alone can yield. Nature in her affluence here more than compensates for the poverty of the people, and with overflowing horns assists them in their pious observances, becoming to them a beautiful and lavish Hand-Maid, as she who poured the ointment of spike-nard on the Divine head in the house at Bethany.

In the church of the Mercedes there was a representation of the Garden of Gethsemane. A space, eight feet square, on the left of the nave close to the porch, was marked off with branches of palm bent and woven into fences. The flowers of the palm fell in expanding showers, or, fountain-like, displayed their chaste splendors in widening and descending circles within the Garden. Palm-leaves lay thick upon the ground, interspersed with the berries, the leaves, and blossoms of the brightest evergreens. All over this were strewn the sweetest flowers—flowers of the richest tint—flowers of the rarest form—the lobelia with its crimson and orange petals, the pink lily, and the canary-colored plumeria—vases and bowls of china filled with earth in which young shoots of rice had root—porcelain dishes in which were ripening grains of corn and aromatic herbs—oranges, wild grapes from the valley of Ujarras, the alligator pear, pine-apples, granadillas and sweet lemons. In the midst of all these offerings—in the midst of all this bounteousness and beauty, and all this wealth and sweetness of the earth—against a broken tree there knelt an image of the Christ of Gethsemane, overspread with a purple robe, blood oozing from the forehead, and the pale features stamped with an expression of anguish, which none, the most idle or irreverent, could witness without emotion. Inside the porch of the little church and outside, soldiers stood on guard with arms reversed. All day long, the National Flag at half-mast overhung the Palace of the Government, the Cuartel del Artilleria, and the Barracks in the Plaza. The shops, the billiard-rooms, the cafés, the public offices, all were closed. No one was within. Every one was out. Out in the best attire. Out at sunrise—the livelong day—the livelong night. The livelong night visiting the churches, going through the devotion of the Stations, carrying lanterns, and humming their Paters and Aves through the streets. The next day—Good Friday—there was the same monotonous rolling of the drums, the drums being muffled as on the day preceding—the same display of drooping flags—the same passing to and fro of veiled faces, and graceful heads enveloped in silken shawls—the same harsh creaking of wooden rattles instead of bells—the same profusion of lights, and flowers, and fruits throughout the churches—the same pervading buzz of piety—the same solemn Holiday in all respects as Holy Thursday was, but quieter, perhaps, and somewhat more impressive from the great Sacrifice it recalled, and the mournfulness which in the hush of all profane business, the reversed arms of the soldiers, the deserted aspect of the houses, and the deepening shadows of San Miguel and Irazu seemed specially to mark the day.

When evening came, the procession which commemorates the interment of Christ, moved slowly and darkly from the great door-way of the Cathedral, and, descending into the Plaza, entered and passed through the adjoining streets. The acéras or side-walks of these streets were planted with wild canes, round which the leaves of the palm and wreaths of flowers were woven, the carriage-way being strewn with the sempreviva, the finer branches of the uruca, and the wondrous and beauteous manitas of the guarumo. Curtains of white muslin, festooned with crape or ribbons of black silk and satin, overhung the balconies of the houses along the line of the procession, and at the intersection of the streets were catafalques covered with black embroidered cloth, strewn with flowers, laden with fruit, and luminous with colored lamps and cups of silver. The pioneers of the procession were Brothers of Charity—Los Hermanos de la Caridad—clothed in long white woolen garments, shapeless and loose as bed-gowns, with white or checkered cotton handkerchiefs, tied with a pig-tail knot, about their heads. These Brothers carried the various insignia of the Crucifixion. The two first balanced a pair of green ladders upon their shoulders. One bore a crown of thorns on a breakfast tray, another a sponge in a stained napkin, the third an iron hammer and three nails. Then came a swarm of boys with extinguished candles. After them, three young men in ecclesiastical costume appeared, the one in the middle bearing a tall slender silver crucifix—the crucifix being shrouded in black velvet—the other two holding aloft the thinnest candlesticks, the yellow tapers in which burned with an ashy flame, melting excessively as they feebly gleamed. Close behind the candlesticks and crucifix there walked four priests abreast, each one in soutaine, black cap and surplice. There was a black hood drawn over the black cap, while a black train, the dorsal development of the hood, streamed along the leaf-strewn pavement a yard or two behind. They were the heralds of a large black silk banner which had a red cross blazoned on it, and was borne erect by a sickly gentleman in deep mourning. Then came another swarm of boys, clearing the road for a full-length figure of St. John, the Evangelist, which, in a complete suit of variegated vestments, and with the right hand pressed upon the region of the heart, was shouldered along by four young gentlemen, all bare-headed and in full evening-dress.

A figure of Mary Magdalene followed that of the Evangelist. It was radiant with robes of white satin and luxuriant tresses of black hair, and the noble beauty of the face was heightened by an expression of intense contrition. As works of art, these figures are more than admirable. They are exquisite and wonderful. Guatemala, where they have been wrought, has reason to be proud of them.

But one, loftier far and statelier than those preceding it, approached. Lifted bayonets were gleaming to the right and left of it, thrubles were rolling up their fragrant clouds around it, pretty children in white frocks, and fresh as rosebuds, were throwing flowers in front of it all over the leafy pavement. It was the Mater Dolorosa. Sumptuously robed, the costliest lace and purple velvet, pearls of the largest size, opals and other precious stones, were lavished on it. From the queenly head there issued rays of silver which flashed as though they were spears of crystal. The black velvet train, descending from the figure, was borne by a priest. Behind him, carrying long wax candles, were many of the first ladies of the city, all dressed in black silk or satin, their heads concealed in rich mantillas, and these, too, black as funeral palls could be.

MATER DOLOROSA.

Some of them were young, tenderly graceful, and of a pearly beauty. The matrons, though slim and parched, were dignified and saintly.

All this, however, was but the prelude to the absorbing feature of the pageant. This was an immense sarcophagus of glass, upheld by some twenty of the most respectable citizens of San José, whose step had all the emphasis and grandeur of practiced soldiers. Acolytes bearing inverted torches, and smoking censers, and palm-branches covered with crape, went before, flanked, and followed it. And as it was borne along, the spectators at the door-ways, in the balconies, at the windows, on the side-walks, uncovered their heads and knelt. Within the transparent tomb were folds of the finest linen—snowy folds strewn with roses—a face streaming with blood, a crown of thorns, and the outline of a prostrate image. The image was that of The Crucified of Calvary. As it passed, no one spoke. There was not a whisper even. The swelling and subsiding music of the military band—heading the column of troops with which, colors furled and arms reversed, the procession closed—alone disturbed, at that solemn moment, the peacefulness of San José.

A few hours later, there was a very different scene. It was the dawn of Easter Sunday. The clouds lay full and low upon the mountains. San Miguel was a pile of clouds. The dark green base of Irazu alone was visible. The plantations and potreritos were overwhelmed with clouds. It was a chaos of clouds all round. Nothing else was distinguishable. Nothing—unless, indeed, the lamp at the corner of the Calle del Artilleria, the light from which sputtered through the thick smoke with which the glass was blurred. But in the midst of this chaos of clouds, the bells of the Cathedral, the Mercedas and the Carmen, suddenly broke loose. Briskly, wildly, violently they rang out! Again and again rang out! Again and again, until the riotous air seemed to flash with the strokes! Again and again, until the drowsy earth seemed to reel and quiver!

Then came the rumbling of drums, and the shrill choring of fighting-cocks, and the yelping of dogs, and the moaning of the cattle in the suburbs. In less than twenty minutes every house in San José was pouring out its inmates—pouring them out in ponchas and mantillas, in shawls, velvet-collared cloaks and shirt-sleeves—down upon the Plaza. And there—as the clouds lifted, and the mountains began to show themselves, and the sun streamed over the broken crest of Irazu—a startling spectacle broke upon the view.

The Plaza was full of people. The spacious esplanade and steps of the Cathedral were thronged to overflowing. The balconies and windows of the houses overlooking the Plaza—the balconies and windows of the houses converging on the Plaza—all sparkled and rustled with spectators. Every one was excited—every one was chattering—every one was smoking—every one was laughing—every one was on tip-toe—every one was impatient, fidgety and nervous. There was something in the wind!

High above the crowd—in the centre of the Plaza—were four lines of gleaming steel. The troops had formed a hollow square, and within this square, overtopping the lifted bayonets by twenty feet at least, there stood a monstrous gibbet. Fastened together with thongs of raw hide and pieces of old rope, the limbs of this gibbet were gaunt and ghastly enough to scare the boldest malefactor. From the cross-beam there dangled a foul bundle of old clothes. There was a red night-cap—a yellow flannel waistcoat, striped with black, the arms outstretched—a pair of torn brown breeches and musty boots, the latter crumpled at the toes and woefully wasted at the heels. Night-cap, boots and waistcoat, all were stuffed with Roman candles, squibs and crackers, while the breeches were burdened with a bomb-shell made of the toughest paste-board and swollen with combustibles. It was the effigy of Judas Iscariot! There—in the dewy dawn, with the faint soft light of the Easter morn playing on the night-cap, in the full strained view of thousands—the simulacrum of the traitor dangled, slowly turning, half-way round at times, as a puff from the mountains strayed against and elbowed it ignominiously aside.

The trumpet having sounded, a barefooted Corporal stepped from the ranks. Erect, emotionless, with cold solemnity he approached the gibbet, carrying a long spare sugar-cane, at the end of which was a tuft of lighted tow. As he neared the gibbet, the hubbub of the multitude subsided. A profound calm set in. The boys themselves—the gamins of San José—frenzied with fun and mischief as they were—huddled together and held their breath a moment. Step by step, gravely measuring his way, the Corporal still kept on, until, at last, he came abruptly to a halt right under the cross-beam. The sugar-cane was lifted. It touched the left heel of the scoundrel overhead. In the twinkling of an eye, there was a terrific explosion! The boot flew in shreds—flames leaped from the stomach—the bomb-shell burst and split the brown breeches into a shower of rags and soot—rockets whizzed from the ribs—the outstretched arms vanished from their sockets in a gust of sulphur—the red night-cap shot up clean out of sight, and, a few seconds after, plopped down in cinders over the sign-board of the Restaurant next door to the Barracks—all this in less than two minutes, amidst the crashing of drums, the excruciating screams of the boys, the crowing of cocks and the yelping of dogs, the tittering of the modest signoritas and signoras, the gabbling of parrots, a tempestuous flight of stones, and the hootings, maldiciones and uproarious merriment of soldiers and civilians, priests, paupers, and patricians.

When the smoke cleared off, the back-bone was all that remained of the exploded ruffian. And that—being of iron—continued to dangle at the end of the rope until the gibbet was lowered. In half an hour, the Plaza had resumed its decorum, loneliness, and silence.

Leaving the Bishop's residence, the morning after our arrival in San José, we asked one of the two workmen who were plastering the wall, the way to the building in which the Hall of Congress and the bureaux of the Ministers of State are situated. Wiping the trowel through his apron, he gave us the direction with a graceful flourish of the implement.

"But you're not going there," he said—"it's a great way off—an immense distance!"

Somewhat surprised to hear this, but nowise deterred, we determined to try it. The experiment satisfied us that the Casa del Gobierno was little more than three blocks, or two minutes' walk, from the Episcopal residence. Judged, however, by his own estimate of distances, the discouraging plasterer did not exaggerate. Three blocks were to him, in truth, an immense stretch to attempt on foot, and were the votes of the citizens of San José demanded on the question, an overwhelming majority, no doubt, would be found to concur with him.

They take no exercise in San José. Pensive and listless—profoundly tranquil—they remain burrowed in-doors all day. The twilight fails to bring them out. The moon influences the sea, but San José sleeps beneath it, insensible to its witchery. Nor has the sun more power. The green sugar-patches—away up the slopes of San Miguel—are glistening in the light long before the doors are opened.

"People are rather lazy in San José," I ventured to observe, one morning, to an intelligent young Costa Rican, as we passed through the vacant streets of the Campo de Martí, a beautiful broad plain outside the city.

"No, Señor, may it please you, they are not lazy," he replied; "but not having any thing very particular to do at this hour, they stay in bed."

And it is the truth. The people of San José are not lazy whenever there is the least necessity for them to be active. It is the extreme quietude of their little city, in the mornings especially, which would induce the contrary impression.

Passing the wide-arched gate-way of the Palace of the Government—of which the reader has here a correct outline copied from a photographic impression taken by Mr. T. C. Rhodes, an American resident of San José—the visitor finds himself in a spacious hall. A step or two brings him to a quadrangular court-yard floored with red brick. A gallery, ten feet in width, supported by a series of columns and arches and furnished with a pretty balustrade of bronzed iron, projects on three sides, fifteen feet above the brick flooring. The wall, fronting the entrance-hall, is unbroken. The roof of the building extends some twelve feet beyond the walls inclosing the court, and this again is supported by another series of columns and arches, precisely similar to that which supports the gallery. We have, thus, two tiers of picturesque arcades opening on the court-yard. Walls, columns, arches, all are painted white. The flooring of red brick is kept perfectly clean. The exterior is colored in imitation of blue granite, and, though modeled by a German, presents a cheerful Italian aspect in harmony with the serene and glowing sky which canopies the valley of San José. A tranquil tone of simplicity, good taste, strict order and dignified modesty pervades the whole. A fountain in the centre of the court-yard, softening with its perpetual showers the heated atmosphere which the walls inclose, would leave nothing else to be desired. With this, the Palace of the Costa Rican Government, in an architectural point of view, would be complete.

The glass folding-door of the bureau of the Minister of State opens on the upper arcade. So does that of the Minister of Justice, and that, also, of the Minister of Foreign Affairs. Immediately off the lower arcade, or corridor, are the offices of the Intendencia, the tribunal before which all known violators of the Revenue laws are cited to appear. The Secretary of Congress, moreover, has his office in this quarter of the building. Passing along the gallery with the bronzed iron balustrade, from the bureau of the Minister of Justice, we entered one of the two small galleries which overlook the floor of the Hall of Congress.

It is a superb apartment. The proportions are imposing. The length is eighty feet, the width thirty, the height forty. The walls are white as cream. Slightly arched, the ceiling is divided by heavy gilt mouldings into panels. These are deeply-set and crusted with golden filigree-work. The lofty windows, opening on the court-yard, sixteen feet in height, are curtained with crimson silk-damask. Between them are costly mirrors festooned with silk—blue, red, and white—the colors of the Republic. The President's chair is solidly gilt and cushioned with crimson velvet. A canopy of crimson satin shadows it, and a little above it appear the Arms of Costa Rica, wrought in gold and silver thread on a field of purple velvet. With their feet buried in a luxurious carpet, the chairs of the Members of the Costa Rican Congress are ranged against the wall, to the right and left of the canopy and throne, while the stained glass, with which the doors and windows of this Hall are set, subdues the glare of the golden ceiling, the white walls, the crimson drapery, and all the splendors of paint and gilding imprisoned in it. Shortly after our arrival at the Capital, this Hall was the scene of a grand entertainment.

Returning late one evening to the Hotel, our Dutch servant, Charlemagne, with a smile heightened and diffused by the grease which pervaded his face, handed us a note in an envelope. Both were of cream-colored paper. Both had narrow crimson borders. The envelope was addressed to

*Señores Don
Ramon Paez y Sr. Mars.*

This was in writing. Opening the note, we found the following invitation neatly printed in Spanish—

The undersigned, at the special desire of his Excellency, the President of the Republic, request the pleasure of your company at a Ball to be given, in honor of Señor Don Felix Belly, on Wednesday evening, at eight o'clock, in the Palace of the Government.

Vicente Herrera—Juan B. Bonilla.

P.S.—Signora Salvadora Gutierrez de Bonilla and Signora Mercedes Ramirez de Hiné will receive the Ladies.

Approaching the Palace, we found it all illuminated. Small colored lamps shone every where. In the niches either side the gate-way, along the window-sills of the façade, within the court-yard, along the balustrade of the upper corridor, from every projecting scroll and plinth, from the parapets themselves, above, below, in and out, all round, these colored lamps shone every where. There were sentries at the outer gate. There were sentries on the steps of the Hall itself. In compliment to Señor Don Felix Belly, the Guard was composed exclusively of Sergeants. They appeared in full uniform—dark blue coatee, red worsted epaulets, cap with yellow band, trowsers and pipe-clayed cross-belts. The cut and color of the trowsers in every instance had been determined by the fancy, the negligence, or the fortune of the wearer. Within the walls was a brilliant crowd. Every one of note in San José was there. Distinguished foreigners were, also, there.

President Mora—a dumpy, sleek, dark-featured gentleman, in a canary-colored embroidered waistcoat, his hair brushed stiff up from his forehead—sat the whole of the night in the towering gilt chair, under the crimson silk-damask canopy. From head to foot, his Excellency was one compact smile, cosily framed. In the gallery, opposite to that in which the Military Band was stationed—with a camp cloak thrown across his shoulders, the broad shirt-collar negligently thrown open at the neck, the swarthy mottled face reddening in the blaze of the chandeliers, his wild black eye flashing upon the rustling scene below—was General Maxime Jerez, of Nicaragua. General Joaquin Mora stood near him, his tranquil pale face, shrewd cold eye and staid address, contrasting strongly with the impetuous and generous nature betrayed in the features of the Nicaraguan soldier. Moping about the principal door of the Ball-room—holding his hands before him as though he were holding a muff—was Señor Calvo, the Minister of State. Señor Calvo is an elderly gentleman with very short legs. A yellowish brown face, a very flat mouth and a very flat nose, give him the appearance of a Japanese priest. An impassive Indian from the village of Quircôt, as Minister of State he is singularly useful. All the mistakes of the Government are remorselessly saddled on him. Reconciled to the weight, and capable of patiently carrying it to the end of his days however much it augments, no President ever thinks of removing him. This is the fifth-and-twentieth year in which he has acted as Beast of Burden, and Minister of State. His employers devoutly wish that he and they may live a thousand years! Sliding through the mazes of the dance—having a pleasant word for every one, smiling through his small compressed eyes, and with ever so many little ingenuities rendering himself universally popular—was Señor Toledo, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the best educated Member of the Cabinet, by profession an expert physician, and an acute politician by trade. General Cañas, also, was present. And so was General Castro, an ex-President of the Republic, and one of the most genial, liberal, and accomplished gentlemen in Costa Rica. And there was Colonel George Cauty—a square-built, sailor-looking, sprightly fellow, with a deep-set cunning eye and a sharply-pointed small nose, light of foot, steaming and blossoming all over—in an extremely short-skirted blue frock, immense epaulets and tricolor sash, quadrilling and waltzing with exhaustless agility. And, last of all, there was the closely-shaved head and the finikin figure, the spy-glass and spider-like legs of M. Felix Belly himself, with the Zouave at his elbow, in his prodigious red breeches, prim and smug, looking as though he were planted upon the column in the Place Vendôme, and had all its bronze and brazen glories radiating through him. This Zouave had hired himself for four years to the Government of Costa Rica at the breaking out of the war with the Filibusters, and had fought all through it. He was very ugly, very gorgeous, highly-peppered and pompous. At the time of the Ball he was detailed as interpreter, outrider, Red-Breeches-in-Waiting to M. Felix Belly, and seemed proud of the business.

A long white building, two stories high, with a heavy balcony overlooking the Plaza and a rugged roof of red tiles slanting three or four feet beyond the front wall, the Infantry Barracks flank the Cathedral on the right. The balcony is broken by a broad and lofty gate-way, rudely arched, outside which a disheveled sentinel, carelessly balancing his musket, night and day saunters up and down. Sentinels lounge along the balcony, also, while a small black field-piece looks out from under a shed of iron-work in the centre of the barrack-square, and, with its green wheels furrowing the gravel, ponderously keeps the peace. Inside the walls are dormitories, store-rooms, rows of wooden pegs hung with hats and belts, musket-racks, stretchers, frying-pans, iron-hooped buckets, and the rest of the furniture one usually finds in Barracks the world over. But every thing looks very faded, very dusty, very primitive and cheap. The white ant has been busy with the wood-work, giving it the appearance of incurable decay. Were it not for the Sala des Banderas, the Infantry Barracks of San José would be destitute of interest.

In this apartment are deposited several relics and trophies of the Filibuster war. A large glass-case, handsomely gilt and paneled, elevated a few feet from the floor, contains the torn and sooty remnants of the Flag which flew from Fort Castillo while the Costa Ricans held it. On one of the panels, in golden letters, is this inscription—

On the 15th of July, 1857, the National Flag which floated above the walls of Fort Castillo during the siege, together with the names of the Superior officers who defended it so brilliantly, were deposited in this urn, by order of his Excellency, the President of the Republic, Don José Rafael Mora. Eternal honor to the Heroes who defended the Castle of San Juan!

On the opposite panel is the following inscription—

On the 15th of February, 1857, four hundred Filibusters, under the command of the so-called Colonel Titus, attacked the Castle of San Carlos, which was in a dilapidated state and garrisoned only by thirty-seven men. But animated by the brave Colonel, Don George F. Cauty, and the worthy Commandant of the Fort, Lieutenant Colonel, Faustine Montes de Oca, the little garrison heroically resisted the enemy until the 19th of the same month, on which day, seventy-seven Riflemen, under the command of Captain Jesus Alvarado, and Don Joaquín Ortiz, who had been sent to the relief of the Fort by the General-in-chief, Don José Joaquín Mora, fell upon the Filibusters with so much bravery, that they dispersed them in an instant, compelling them to throw away their clothes, so that they might fly with greater ease. This brilliant feat of arms, planned so admirably by our General, decided the happy issue of the Holy War which was sustained by the Republics of Central America against their invaders.

The Artillery Barracks face the Calle de Artilleria two blocks above the Casa de Gobierno. They form a quadrangular court, in which two hundred men, perhaps, might be drilled conveniently. Four square towers—one at each angle—defend the premises. Nine-pounders protrude from them, and the walls are perforated for muskets. Under a slovenly shed occupying one side of the barrack-yard, jumbled together and scantily covered with matting, are two eighteen-pounders, two nines, and two sixes. The eighteens were cast in England, shipped round Cape Horn, and dragged up from Punta Arenas by a herd of bullocks. The morning we visited these Barracks, on being shown to the officers' day-room, we found there an emaciated German on a crutch, tuning a broken harp, and one of the Chaplains attached to the Costa Rican Army in Nicaragua, the Padre Francisco Calvo, who wore the Cross of Honor pinned to the breast of his soutaine. The Padre is devoted to the Army. He has a soldierly appearance, and his propensities and tastes seem better suited for the camp than the cloister. As we entered, he had a puro between his rosy lips, and was chatting to a young officer decorated with a red ribbon, the inscription in gold letters upon which, announced him one of the Conquerors of Santa Rosa, the scene of the first, as it was the most damaging, defeat incurred by the Filibusters in their Nicaraguan enterprise.

Leaving the Artillery Barracks, and galloping for a mile and a half over a splendid road—a broad avenue, solidly constructed, drained by deep trenches running parallel with it, and shaded by lofty fences of cactus and erithryna, behind which thousands of coffee-trees breathe their perfume—we found ourselves at the Campo de Martí, a perfectly level plain, some hundred acres in extent, carpeted with the softest grass, intersected with lines of young fig-trees, and in every feature displaying the studied neatness and subdued elegance of a Pleasure Park in England. Inclosed by haciendas, orange-groves, plantations and potreros, the Mountains of San Miguel shelter it on the South. In the opposite direction, the white walls of Heredia glitter against the brown slopes of Barba. Beyond that huge volcano, the fires of which have been extinguished in a lake of unknown depth, the blue peaks of Poaz sparkle in the morning and evening sunlight. There are villas, too, close at hand, such as the charming one of which we have a penciling here.

It is called the Labyrinth. There is a roomy house and a luxuriant garden. Behind the garden, a sparkling fountain throws its waters into three reservoirs faced with brick and fine cement. These serve as baths—one for gentlemen, nine feet deep—another for ladies, seven feet deep—the third for children, three feet deep. Walls of a moral height surround them, and they have shady corridors in which the bathers lay aside and renew their toilets. The pathway leading to the baths is cool and fragrant, hedged with rose-trees and sweet lemons. Further back is the coffee-mill, and the patio in which they clean and dress the coffee. The farm-yard is stocked with farming implements of the best description, and a stud of handsome horses occupy a range of open stalls. This house, this garden, these baths, these horses, all belong to the Señora Fernandez, whose wealth is but a tribute to her goodness, her gracefulness and beauty.

Between the Labyrinth and the Campo lies the Protestant Burial-ground. It covers about a quarter of an acre, is walled in snugly, and has an iron-barred gate to it. A lozenge-shaped metal plate, screwed to the wicket, bears the following inscription—

THIS CEMETERY WAS GRANTED BY THE GOVERNMENT IN FEBRUARY 1850

AT THE REQUEST OF

SEÑOR DON FREDERICK CHATFIELD,
Chargé-d'-Affaires of her Britannic Majesty.

For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth. And though after my skin worms destroy my body, yet in my flesh shall I see God. Whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another, though my reins be consumed within me.

A little nearer to the Campo is the old Catholic Burial-ground. Bones have been lying there for more than two hundred years. The earlier inscriptions on the vaults and head-stones have been blotted out. The graves themselves have been blotted out. You look through the bars of the gate-way—clumsy bars honey-combed with rust—and all you see is a green mass of vegetation. Listening breathlessly for a while, you are sure to hear the rustling of the lizard, or some other reptile, in the depths of that dead sea. Four years ago, when the cholera swept the country, the neighboring victims of the plague—and they were counted by the thousand—were buried there. Since then the Cemetery has been closed. It is forbidden ground. And so, undisturbed, the green vegetation deepens, and the nameless graves are blotted out. A new Burial-ground has been opened for the Catholics elsewhere.

The Campo de Marté is to San José what the Bois de Boulogne is to Paris. It is the scene of the fashionable equestrianism of the Capital, the resort of carriages, and, once or twice a year, the arena in which military encampments and reviews take place. On these occasions the troops appear in uniform. The rest of the year, clean shirts on Sundays and Feasts of Obligation seem to be the only regulation in force, so far as costume is concerned. The officers, however, are handsomely uniformed. In their blue frocks faced with red, their shakos and red pompons, they present an appearance not inferior to that of French Lieutenants of the Line, and at the Military Mass, on Sundays, the little garrison of San José, occupying the nave of the Cathedral, forms a striking picture. The double line of bayonets quivers with the light reflected from the Altar, the lamps and chandeliers, the windows of the aisles, and the tall white shafts which support the roof. The Band, stationed in the chancel, accompanies the solemn service with martial hymns. The officers stand beside the men—the epaulets and crimson sashes of the former relieving the camisas of the latter—and as the Host is elevated, the sacred building vibrates with pealing trumpets and the ring of saluting arms.

Every Sunday evening, also, the Band plays in front of the President's private residence. Situated in the Calle del Presidente, a little off the Plaza, this house is a model of Republican modesty. The narrow street darkened with listening groups—the lanterns at the music-desks piercing the shadows with the thinnest rays—groups of señoritas whispering at the door-ways, the faint smoke of their cigarettos gliding dreamily from their lips—a lean sentinel leaning against the door-post of the President's house, No. 12, rubbing one bare foot against the other—the whitewashed hall behind him, with a yellow candle in a glass case, suspended from the ceiling, winking at the brown balusters of the staircase—an officer in white trowsers and gold-laced cap lifting his spurred heels up the steps of the door-way, and slipping into the street again, having satisfied himself that all was right—these were the incidents I noticed the first Sunday evening I loitered in the Calle del Presidente, arm in arm with Don Ramon, listening to the Band.

The Theatre, too, is open on Sunday evening. Adorned with a Grecian front, this pretty edifice occupies an area sixty or seventy feet square. The street-door opens into a vestibule lighted by a large Chinese lantern, underneath which, on the nights of performance, half a dozen bare-footed soldiers are seated on a bench. There are two tiers of boxes. Under the lower tier are three rows of benches, and these are shut off from the parquette by horizontal bars of iron, which give the inclosure the appearance of a semi-subterranean cage for wild curiosities. The object of this arrangement I was unable to ascertain. Probably it is owing to an apprehension that the poorer people might grow savage if brought into contact with the civilization of the parquette. The night we were there the house was crowded. The boxes rustled with silk. There was a profusion of pearls, and clusters of teeth which rivaled them in whiteness, and masses of luxuriant black hair, and a plump array of arms laden with chains and bands of gold, and eyes of sparkling jet, and coronals and festoons of luscious flowers, and the airiest network floating about the daintiest heads. It was a Gala-night. The play was El Poeta y la Beneficiada. In a box decorated with the National colors, directly facing the stage, sat President Mora. To the right and left of his Excellency sat the Minister of Foreign Affairs, General Joaquin Mora, Señor Escalante, the Vice-President of the Republic, and M. Felix Belly, the champion, upon paper, of the Latin Race generally. The performers hailing from Cadiz and other parts of Spain, rendered the humor of Don Manuel Breton de los Herreros with a graceful vivacity. But the orchestra was fearful. Eight fiddlers, a drummer, and two trumpeters, all in a row, tortured us mercilessly whenever the curtain went down. The scenery was just as unpleasant. No two wings were alike, and fully one half the performance passed off in a parlor, upon which the sky-light and stairs of a garret obtruded. The drop-scene, however, representing Minerva instructing the Muses, displayed considerable taste, effectiveness of touch, and brilliant coloring. Between the acts, the occupants of the boxes promenaded the galinero or lobby of the Theatre, smoking their puros and cigarettos. The Ladies indulged in this refreshment as well as the Gentlemen. Lemonades, also, were handed round, and the cigarettos gave way to almond cakes, ices, and other delicacies. The President, mingling unaffectedly with the crowd, was voluble and radiant. M. Felix Belly, exquisitely booted and gloved, bowed himself constantly into profuse perspirations.

Having introduced the President—an efficient magistrate, a man of clear strong intellect, energy, and enlightenment, under whose administration Costa Rica has been blessed with a social and material development unknown to her before, and has achieved a sound national reputation, which it would be well for her sister Republics to strive for and deserve—a few words here, explanatory of the political system of the country, will not be inappropriate.*

The Constitution, under which it was reorganized in 1848, declares the Republic of Costa Rica to be a sovereign State, free and independent, and prescribes for it a popular government, representative, elective, and responsible. Asserting the inviolability of property, the liberty of the press, personal security, the equality of all citizens before the law, and vesting the Supreme Power in three distinct bodies—the Legislative, the Executive, the Judicial—it prohibits slavery, privileged classes, primogeniture, the violation of correspondence, and rigorously restricts the punishment of death. The Legislative power resides in a Congress of one Chamber of twelve members, over which the Vice-President of the Republic presides. To exercise the electoral franchise, a citizen must be twenty-five years old—be the father of a family or the head of a house—and own real estate to the value of $1000. Neither the President, Vice-President, nor any Member of the Cabinet can vote. All those officers, as well as the Judgeships of the Supreme Court, are incompatible with a Representative position. To be a Member of Congress, the citizen must be twenty-five years old, own real estate to the value of $3000, or be a Professor of some recognized science. Congress appoints the Judges, prorogues its own sessions, and names for the Recess a permanent Commission, consisting of the Vice-President of the Republic and four of its Members. The passage of a law requires the approval of a Congressional majority after three days' discussion, or the lapse of three days, and the sanction of the Executive. The President and Vice-President are elected, for a term of six years, by the electoral assemblies of cantons or counties. To hold either of these offices, the citizen must be thirty years old, own property to the value of $10,000, and be or have been married. Hospitality is prescribed as a duty by the Constitution, and citizenship is forfeited by ingratitude to parents, the abandonment of wife or children, and the neglect of the obligations due to the family and homestead. The Judicial power is vested in a Supreme Court, and other tribunals created by law. The first consists of a Regent, five Judges, and an Attorney-General. These officers—with the exception of the latter, who is elected for six years—hold their commissions during good behavior; but neither the former nor the latter can be suspended unless upon impeachment, nor can they be deposed except by a formal Judicial sentence. The Republic is divided into five Provinces. The Provinces are subdivided into Cantons, and these again into Districts. The Provinces have their Governors and Military Commandants. The two last-named divisions have their Political Chiefs and Alcaldes. As to the Educational system, there is a free school in every town. In San José there is a college for the education of masters, a Lyceum, and a University. Elementary and superior instruction are thus guaranteed by the Government, as well as by private enterprise; and if, as Astaburraga remarks, Costa Rica does not as yet exhibit a more flourishing state of public education, she has, at all events, established the basis of a system which will improve and extend in proportion as the country materially advances.

Considered in an architectural point of view, the University of St. Thomas must be set down as the finest building in San José. But in point of size, the Hospital exceeds it. There is, in truth, very little need of such an institution in the Arcadian valley of San José. But a charitable association—El Junta de Caridad—thought well of having one, so that no epidemic should suddenly strike the people and find them unprepared, or the poor be without a home and kindly treatment when sickness deprived them of their bread. Hence arose the Hospital of San Juan de Dios. The expense of its erection was defrayed from a fund in the hands of the Junta, and by a trifling percentage on wills. The same means maintain it. The incidental expenses are few. The Medical Superintendent, Dr. John Hogan, formerly of Philadelphia, gives his valuable services gratuitously.

The situation of the Hospital is unhealthy. It is built in a hollow immediately off the road to the Campo de Martí. The ground, on which it stands, was a marsh five years ago. The Doctor frequently shot snipe there. Consisting of a centre and two wings, the entire length of the building is one hundred and fifty feet. The wings—each of them—are one hundred feet square. The left wing contains the sick and insane of both sexes. The right wing is temporarily used as a prison. Of this portion of the Hospital the inmates are less than a handful, and, generally speaking, their offenses are venial. The yawning sentinel, in charge of them, lazily scraping the tiled floor with his bayonet, seemed to think he might well be dispensed with.

In my visit to the Hospital, I had the advantage of being accompanied by Dr. Hogan. In the Male Ward there were eight cases under treatment. Two of them were cases of severe gun-shot wounds. The sufferers were Costa Rican soldiers who had fought under General Cañas at San Jorge, on Lake Nicaragua. Opposite them lay three of Walker's men, suffering acutely from ulcers, the result of bad living, exposure and neglect. One of them told me he was from New York. He was fearfully emaciated and spoke with a painful effort. The second—a sprightly fellow, full of pluck and humor—told me he was from Louisville. The third hailed from Quebec. A bright-eyed, fair-skinned, gentle boy, the tears started from my very heart as he whispered the story of his adventures to me.

His father and mother were Irish-born. He himself was born in Canada. His father died while he was at his mother's breast. When she was strong enough to do so, and had scraped together a little money, his mother shifted to Chicago. There she took in washing, and was getting on very well, when, all of a sudden, he took it into his head to join the Filibusters, having heard they were carrying all before them. Somehow or other he contrived to get to New York. There he joined the Filibusters as an emigrant. He did so, believing that was all he had to do to get the best of living and lots of the richest land. He was not a day in Nicaragua before he wished he was home again with his poor, sick, lonesome mother. But it was too late—too late for him to do otherwise than make the most of his wild prank—too late for him to do any thing else than rough it good-humoredly, and fight it out as manfully as he could. He would not be eighteen till June, and yet he had been in every battle the Filibusters fought, from the burning of Granada down to the last attempt of the Allies against Rivas. After the surrender of General Walker to Captain Davis, of the St. Mary's, he was taken ill at Punta Arenas, on the Pacific, whither he had been brought as prisoner-of-war, with several of his comrades. Struck down with fever there, General Cañas gave orders to have him sent to the Hospital at San José. It was a year ago, but he had not been out nor up from the day he entered it. He would give his life to hear from his poor mother. He had not heard from her since he joined the Filibusters. She knew nothing of his leaving, nor had he written to her all the time he had been away. This was cruel of him. So he said. And with this he hid his face in his hands, and burst out crying. I did my best to comfort him, telling him I should take steps to let his mother know where he was, and that he was getting on well, and might soon be with her. This seemed to soothe him, and, stretching out his thin white hand, he thanked me with fervent words. The next mail to the United States brought a notice from me, which appeared in one of the New York papers, giving the particulars I have mentioned. Nothing came of it however. No mother appeared to claim the sick boy in the Hospital of San José.

In the Lunatic department of the Hospital there were two women and two men. The two women were crazy on the subject of religion. One of them had covered the walls of the room, in which they were confined, with the strangest hieroglyphics—with death-heads and cross-bones—with skeletons—with horned devils and instruments of torture. These disordered fancies were portrayed in charcoal, and, as we entered, the bewildered artist was absorbed in the contemplation of her performances. The other woman was sitting upon a table—her feet bent under her—the stormiest picture of desolation. She had the one story for every ear that hearkened to her. It was that of a beautiful pure child, who, on passing through a dark street one evening, was presented by two abandoned women with an ear of corn. This she took from them and brought home. The child, the frenzied creature said, had ever since been under the spell of these bad women, and it was this which worried her. As she repeated the story to us—she tells it every day and every hour—the tears started from her blood-shot eyes, the clasped hands dropped with the weight of death upon her knees, her head fell upon her breast, and, shaking it from side to side in the vehemence of her grief, the long, black, disordered hair swept over her shoulders to her naked feet.

Leaving her, the Keeper opened the door of another room. It was a wilderness of a room. There was no ceiling to it. The cobwebbed rafters were exposed. The tiles, with which it had been floored, were torn up. Many of them were broken. The clay underneath the tiles was, also, torn up. The plastering on the walls was all in flakes. The window-panes had been smashed. Large splinters of glass lay strewn about the plowed-up floor. Every thing within there was defaced. Every thing bore the stamp of exhausted riotousness and irreparable ruin. Crouching in a corner—naked to the waist—the paltry covering he had suffered to remain upon his wasted limbs, flapping in frowsy rags about him—eying us with the timidity of a worried rabbit—eying us stealthily from behind a heap of earth and broken tiles—was a boy with sunken jaws, shuddering from head to foot, jabbering violently, and frothing at the mouth. This poor wretch was little more than eighteen years of age. He had been one of the garrison of Fort Castillo. On the approach of Colonel Frank Anderson, December, 1858, he was seized with spasms, and from that day to this he has been a ghastly lunatic. The shouts of the Filibusters ring incessantly in his ears. Armed to the teeth—gliding like panthers through the chapparal—they are ever making toward him. He leaps from them, shrieks, writhes, foams, tears his tangled hair, harrows the walls and floor with his nails, digs up the earth, as though he were a hyena tugging at buried carrion, and so hacks and wastes himself to death.

The fourth case was somewhat an amusing one, and from the agonies of that terror-stricken creature it was a relief to follow for a moment the mild vagaries of one, whose only uneasiness was an impression, that a multitude of turkey-buzzards were after him, and that all he wanted was a hat. The turkey-buzzards kept him perpetually busy. He never ceased hooting at them, pelting them with bits of plaster, rushing into them, dispersing them in desperate style, and, having put them to flight, pursuing them round and round the room. Had he a hat, he would be in glorious humor. It was impossible, however, to satisfy him in this respect. He tore up every hat he laid his hand upon.

LUNATICS.

Having seen all that was to be seen in San José—having lounged often enough through the billiard-rooms and lager-bier saloons, of which there are half a dozen in the little city, within musket-shot of one another, and visited the Mint, where we learned something of the mineral resources of the country—having made the acquaintance of several of the friendliest and brightest people there—having talked politics by the hour, over bottles of Bourbon, with a sprightly wise Philadelphian who is fixed there for better or for worse, but rather for the better, his two-storied house in the Calle de la Artilleria being spacious, and his cacao plantation close to La Muelle being in the most promising condition—having breakfasted with the Minister of Foreign Affairs, where we had the pleasure of meeting at an overflowing table an accomplished and genial family—having dined in company with a large party of Germans at the house of a wealthy hospitable representative of the Brod and vintage of the Rhine—having spent more than one delightful evening in a generous English home, over the gayety, good-heart, and luxury of which a black cloud has lowered since, for she who was the favored and bounteous mistress of that home lies in the Serapiqui, lost there on her way to see once more her old home in the oak-crowned isle—having, over and over again, ridden out with General Castro, whose graceful attentions to us were unremitting, and on his plantation of Pacifica, the finest in the country, in the midst of the perfume of 150,000 coffee-trees, and flower and fruit gardens surfeited with sweetness, and all the luxuries of a Farm in the Tropics, having dreamed away many an hour that is still a fragrant and radiant vision with me—having seen and done all this, we, the distinguished strangers from New York, betook ourselves to Cartago, the ancient Capital of Costa Rica, concerning which, the volcano that frowns above it and the valleys that girdle it with beauty and glory, another paper, the last of this Holiday series, will appear next month.

A LAY OF THE DANUBE.

I.—THE WISSEHRÄD.

PILGRIM of the imperial Danube, pause 'neath yonder height,
Where a crumbling castle standeth draped in sunset-light,
Like a hoary king, stout-hearted, who his throne doth fill,
Though with age he tremble, totter—clad in shining purple still!

Climb those towers, and mark the river rolling calm and wide,
Till the frowning mountain-giants dare defy his tide!
Mark how he through flinty columns cuts a pathway free,
Dashes rightward, leftward, forward—throbbing, panting, toward the sea!

On those banks the angry nations gathered them of old,
Northern hordes and southern legions joined their battles bold,
Till the dark cold waves were flowing red and warm with blood—
Hideous Hun and haughty Roman, how they choked the crimson flood!

There, the sweet old rhymers tell us, Etzel held his court,
When he made, at Chrimhild's suing, feast for high disport,
Bidding fair her royal brothers from the distant Rhine—Ah, ill-fated Nibelungen! wherefore did ye not divine

That an injured, vengeful woman, though her message fell Loving as became a sister, could not mean you well!
All in vain the pitying mermaids warned them hence to fly;
There betrayed, the homelorn heroes died as heroes still should die!

'Neath the very towers thou scalest, now the spoil of fate,
Once a noble Magyar monarch kept his kingly state,
Great Corvinus, who Mohammed's flooding hosts could stem,
He by Rome's throned bishop counted worthiest Stephen's diadem.

There below, within the valley, lay his gallant men,
Resting from their hard-earned triumphs o'er the Saracen;
And a strange wild tale is told us from that gray old time,
Ever still of love and sorrow—wouldst thou learn it, hear my rhyme!

II.—THE MAGYAR MAID.

'Twas a day when autumn-hazes floated soft and still,
Lighter than Titania's vesture, over sky and hill;
And the sun, flushed as a lover, left the earth so fair,
With his golden smiles of promise filling all the rosy air.

On the further bank a maiden stood at that sweet hour,
Pouring o'er the bleaching linen fast the needful shower;
Humbly born this duty proved her, yet if queen might wear
On her brow such regal beauty, crown were never wanting there.

Now upon the turf she resteth, by the night-wind fanned,
Holding still the dripping pitcher with a careless hand,
More like some immortal keeper of a fountain-head,
Such as antique sculptures show us, than a simple mortal maid.

Yet the fires of shifting passion burn in her dark eye,
 And her lip now smiles, now trembles, all too humanly;
 Toward the camp her face still turneth through that changeful cheer,
 And the anxious glance she sendeth now is longing, now is fear.

So she leaned till twilight faded, and the moon's broad beam,
 Slanting o'er the hills, with silver bridged the quivering stream;
 Yet she leaned, all breathless watching, till a shadow ran,
 Swifter than the winged arrow, full across that shining span.

Sudden o'er those pallid features shot a passing glow,
 Faint as Borealis-flashes cast on Northern snow,
 Then a cold and stiffening tremor shook the lovely form,
 And her head fell like the lily 'neath the chariot of the storm.

Noiseless as the downy-breasted swan might touch the bank,
 Came a lightly-burdened shallop 'gainst the rushes dank;
 To her feet the maiden started as a soldier sprung
 From the bark, in warrior-mantle, and his arms about her flung!

One bright smile of love, all trusting, on her lips there lay
 Like a sunbeam, then grew colder till it died away,
 And a cloud of doubt spread slowly o'er her forehead wide,
 While beneath, from lids uplifted, shot the lightning-flash of pride.

Night's thin curtain from the lover could not hide such change:
 Low he questioned, "My beloved, wherefore art thou strange?
 Hath false friend or envious rival whispered cause of fear?
 By Saint Stephen, but the traitor shall aby his rashness dear!"

Silent, and as one who gathers strength for utmost need,
 For a moment stood the maiden, till her drooping head
 Rested meek upon his shoulder—then with rapid gest
 Back she threw the shrouding mantle—and the monarch stood confessed!

Swift as ever slid the wild bird from the fowler's hand,
 Through his clasping arms she glided, darted toward the strand,
 And ere he, abashed, bewildered, of her thought was ware,
 Deep beneath the rolling river plunged her shame and her despair!

Headlong the remorseful lover follows down the wave,
 Catches at the floating raiment, but he can not save!
 For the hero, conscience-stricken, weakens to a child;
 On the bank once more he standeth, pale and anguish-wild!

Well, oh king, thy heart might fail thee! never, from that night,
 Cold and mute a spectral shadow ceased to haunt thy sight!
 Blood of Paynim, tears repentant, all in vain they flowed!
 Still the dread, reproachful vision, unappeased, before thee stood!

Even yet, the reapers tell us, may that maid be seen,
 When the tender autumn cometh, folding mists between;
 From the parting flood she rises ere the stars are bright,
 And her phantom-web outstretches far, to bleach beneath their light.

Then a tall and helmed soldier draweth to her side,
 And the trembling shade doth speed her 'neath the wave to hide!
 When the lingering years, they tell us, to a thousand run,
 Only shall the lovers rest from the long, long penance done!

A LETTER from the country—an invitation from my old friend, Colonel Manley. He wishes me to spend a month with him—six months—a year; in short, to take up my abode with him for life, if I could consent to so great a sacrifice.

Sacrifice! He must be poking fun at me. Does he imagine it is a sacrifice to leave the city with the opening of spring? to miss the dawdlings at the club-house, the yawnings at the opera, the dinings out, the evening parties? Faugh! Has he forgotten that I am no longer a boy? Well, never mind that. The old Hall is roomy, I know, but not so large as the heart of its owner. I will accept the invitation as freely as it was given. I will be with him too, sooner than he has bargained for. I will start to-morrow.

And I was as good as my word.

The next morning I was in the cars sweeping westward toward the blue mountains of Virginia, my mind occupied with mingling thoughts of the past and future. At thirty-five a man has accomplished half the journey of life, and begins to look back as frequently as he looks forward. I was thinking of myself—what else has a bachelor to think of? Besides, the country I was about to visit was the land of my birth—my boyhood's home—the theatre of youthful joys and follies. Under such circumstances it is quite natural that one's reflections should take an egotistical turn.

At the very outset of life I was left to my own guidance with a fair education, a good constitution, and a moderate competence. Since then I have "followed the devices and desires of my own heart;" or, to use a more accurate expression, "of my own head." I gave myself to books and travel; coquetted with all the Muses; sometimes with a success that might have flattered another to more persevering effort. But it was contrary to my theory as well as my nature to devote myself to a specialité, so that I have been content to pass in society for a very accomplished person without attempting to scratch my autograph upon the rolls of Fame. If I have never followed any productive business, I have eschewed extravagance, so that my estate is unimpaired. If I have devoted myself at times to social life, I have carefully avoided excess, so that my constitution is sound, and, when not too closely occupied in literary pursuits, even robust. I have fixed my residence in a city, because one finds there ampler opportunity for the cultivation of elegant tastes, and, to be frank, a larger theatre for the display of accomplishment. I have shunned matrimony—why, it is nobody's business to know; yet one whose daily walk leads him through two or three miles of dry-goods and fancy stores may well be prudent.

I have sometimes flattered myself that I had mastered the art of living. Perhaps I have. When we feel satisfied that we have solved a problem, it possesses no further interest for us. This may account for the dull shadows of ennui that of late have so frequently darkened my sunshine—for the gradual drying up of the springs of enjoyment within and around me. Within the last year, too, I have lost a front tooth, and the hair about my temples has begun to grizzle. Ah me! There may yet be something more in life than my experience has taught; and I have begun even to hope that there may be some flaw in my theory, for with the first mild breath of spring I have been yearning continually for the country, and dreaming of those pleasant days when the true and tender impulses of the heart withered not under the cold tyranny of Reason.

Five hours of railway travel brought us to the mountains, and on landing from the train I had my luggage transferred immediately to the coach that was to carry me to the village of Hard-scrabble—the seat of justice and chief town of my native county. The team was slow, the roads rough, and the driver a loutish negro, as spiritless as his horses. But as the distance was only eight miles, and I was the only passenger, I bore it all philosophically. About midway of our journey my Jehu turned the horses' heads into a fence corner, and, without leaving his box, commenced hallooing at a dilapidated barn that stood at a considerable distance from the road. Having used his voice to no purpose for some time, he concluded to get down and go over to the barn himself. After a while he came back, accompanied by a hatless companion of his own race, who had, apparently, been just roused from his siesta in a straw-rick, as his eyes looked swelled and his wool well dredged with chaff. Each of these worthies was loaded with a dozen ears of corn, which were presently deposited under the noses of the horses. The four-legged brutes commenced munching their bait with an appetite, while the bipeds retired to a seat on the top rail of the next panel, lit their pipes, and discussed the affairs of the neighborhood at their leisure. This performance lasted for an hour by the watch, when we again got under way, and in the course of time hauled up in front of the village tavern and stage-office.

Although I was still five miles from the place of my destination, I did not regret to learn that this was the terminus of the stage line. I knew the road to Rockston when I was a boy, had often walked it, and could do it again. So leaving my baggage at the tavern, I started off, right glad of an opportunity to stretch my cramped legs.

As I trudged along many familiar scenes met my eye, just as I had known them in boyhood. At some points I was bewildered with changes: a forest cleared out, a thicket grown up, an alteration in the location of the road. Once I thought I had lost my way, but was soon reassured by the appearance of an unwhite-washed, untidy, weather-boarded building which I recognized as the country store, at the cross roads, not more than a mile from Colonel Manley's. A couple of sleepy horses at the venerable rack, half a dozen coatless loafers on the dry-goods boxes at the door, indicated the character of the place without a sign-board.

Notwithstanding my vivacity at the outset I had begun to feel leg weary, and was glad of an apology to rest. A mingled odor of dry goods and groceries saluted my nose on entering; near the stove that of whisky and tobacco predominated. The civil clerk offered a seat, and then turned to wait on a rustic customer, whom he adroitly plied with inducements to purchase certain ten-cent calicoes of lively patterns.

"Fifteen yards?" says old Homespun, thoughtfully. "It takes a sight of truck to reach round wimmen nowadays."

"But think of the price! Only ten cents for such goods as this! Less than cost, I assure you."

"A dollar fifty," said Homespun, soliloquizing.

"What's a dollar fifty to spend on such a wife as you have got?"

"She's a middlin' solid chunk of a woman," replied the farmer; "gits stouter every year."

"Just look at these colors."

"It'll fade."

"If you stand as long as these colors you'll be a rich man, I'll warrant that."

"Wheat is ninety cents. I'll think of it."

"Better let me put it up for you now. Several of the neighbors want it. Mrs. Colonel Manley admired it very much—wants to get it for her daughter."

"Well," said Homespun, drawing out his leather purse and then putting it back, "I reckon I'll take jist a sample of it, to see if the old woman likes it, and then she can try if it'll wash."

The clerk tears off a sample, treats his customer to a drink of whisky, throws his jug-laden saddle-bags across his horse, and wishes him a good evening.

If the daily exercise of tact, self-control under the most trying circumstances, universal politeness and good-humor, is calculated to improve the manners, surely a country store is the best school in the world for a young man.

Attracted by the click of the glasses, a fellow who had been dawdling about the door approached the counter. His physique resembled that of a dog that had been drowned for a week.

"Well, Squirms is lected," said he, addressing himself in a general way to the clerk, myself, and the bottle, with the apparent hope that one of us would respond. "We had hard work," he continued, "but the Dimocracy has carried every thing—Wigs and Know-nothin's hain't got no show now."

As there was no reply the swelled dog reluctantly walked away.

I turned to the clerk. "Your friend seems to take a deep interest in public affairs."

"He is excusable," replied the clerk, "since he has no business of his own to attend to. Last fall he was sold out by the sheriff; his wife and children are on the county. A week ago he was tried for trading with negroes, and only discharged for want of legal evidence. But he's one of our leading men in primary meetings, nominating conventions, etc. Perhaps you'll drink something, Sir?"

I thought I would relish a glass of toddy—my legs felt a little stiff. The pleasant gurgle of the liquid from the bottle caught the attentive ear of the statesman, and he again approached.

"What's your idee of the chances for the next Presidency?"

This, addressed directly to myself, was a poser. To acknowledge that I had no idee whatever on the subject might have lowered me in the esteem of the questioner. I therefore put my finger solemnly on the side of my nose, elevated my eyebrows, winked, and nodded toward the bottle, "Drink something?"

This solution of the momentous question appeared to be satisfactory in the highest degree. The face of the patriot burned with a lurid joy as he filled his tumbler to the brim. "Here's luck!" and in a twinkling the whisky was not. He made a sham motion toward the water pitcher, which resulted in nothing. Then leaning over as near as he could get to me he said, in an emphatic whisper, "The South is in danger—look out for squalls—you mind me."

I replied by a look of astonishment bordering on terror.

"They're a-scheming and a-conning to rob us of our property," he went on with increasing emphasis. "But never mind." (Here his voice grew familiar, and he made several efforts to put his arm around me, which movements I delicately eluded.) "But," he continued, smacking his lips and screwing his features into an expression of ineffable diplomacy, "never mind, wait 'till we git Cuby, then it'll be all right."

It was near sunset when I got to Rockston. The old house with its queer hipped roof and outside chimneys, drawn in sharp outline on the glowing west, presented a picture of unmistakable respectability which the most elaborate modern cottage or costly villa strives in vain to emulate. The very dilapidation visible in its out-buildings and surroundings was more suggestive of easy, self-satisfied consequence than want of thrift or taste; while the sleek and elegant forms of the thorough-bred stock in the barn-yard, the shining faces of the negroes about the quarter, the tall grove that surrounded the dwelling, the huge pear-tree bending under its load of luscious winter fruitage—a flock of roosting turkeys—all characterized the abode of old-fashioned abundance and hospitality.

I stood leaning against the gate-post enjoying this scene until the red in the west gave place to the sheen of firelight through the windows of the old mansion. This reminded me that the evening air was frosty, and as the excitement of my walk had worn off I was chilled to the bone.

There was a warm hearth within, however, and a warmer welcome. The Colonel and his wife met me at the door, and there was a broad and genial sincerity in their greeting which took possession of the heart, as it were, by a coup-de-main—throwing into the shade the more pretentious and studied courtliness of cities.

I was warmed before I approached the fire—at home ere I was seated. The table stood ready set out in the middle of the room; but a sudden movement of the smiling mistress arrested the servant who was bringing in tea: as she bustled out with jingling keys I easily foresaw that some extra dishes were to be ordered. The wide hearth glowed with hickory coals, yet fresh logs must be heaped on, and fresh chips to expedite the blaze, until the very walls trembled with the roaring fire. For one moderate, middle-sized individual this seemed superlative.

There was comfort and supper enough for twenty. The Colonel was fond of politics and moral philosophy. He was stuffed full of talk, having his whole winter's reading undigested, and he evidently hailed me as an object whereon he might wreak himself. I, reckless of sanitary rules and diatetics; took double vengeance on the hot batter-cakes and stewed chicken. (Mrs. M. can, by a culinary process known to herself, make an old hen as tender as a spring pullet.)

"Things are getting into a devil of a condition," said the Colonel, throwing himself back in his chair with the air of a man who has uttered an incontrovertible truth.

"What's the matter?" replied I, buttering four more hot ones.

"What's the matter! why, look at the country, Sir; look at the government; look at every thing."

"Things look very well about here," I answered. "Another breast of chicken — thank you, madam."

He continued, "I begin to fear our whole system is based upon a fallacy. In the general mankind is—"

"I beg leave to differ with you," said I, "mankind is not."

The Colonel looked puzzled for a moment; then smiled, and said,

"I perceive you don't take much interest in politics."

I detected a shade of disappointment in his face as he said it.

"Pardon my levity, Colonel; but good cheer and the sight of old friends have gladdened my heart, and have incapacitated me from taking a grave view of affairs, either public or private. I must acknowledge, however, that of late years I have troubled myself very little about the government, believing that, in ordinary times, that citizen best serves the State who manages his own business best."

"Suppose George Washington had held such an opinion?"

"Ah! those were not ordinary times. When the Union cracks open, for example, and another Quintus Curtius is wanted, just let them call on me."

"That savors too much of ambition. The true patriot serves his country, oftentimes, even without the hope of glory or reward."

"Then I certainly met one back here at the cross-roads this evening—a fellow that looked like a boiled dog."

The Colonel reddened. "That worthless scoundrel is the person we suspect of stealing Mrs. Manley's turkeys last Christmas."

"I suspect," said the good dame, "that Mr. Berkeley is tired after his long journey, and would like to go to bed."

The suggestion chimed in with my feelings precisely; and ere long I had snuffed out my tallow dip and rolled into a high feather-bed with a delicious sense of weariness that I had not enjoyed for years.

"Dreams, call in the morning. Days of my youth, I will remember you to-morrow. For the present, good-night!"

My awakening was greeted with pleasing and familiar sights and sounds. The sun, like a hidden archer, was shooting his level beams from behind a pointed hill, glancing through the leafless tree-tops; reddening the distant summits, while the shadowed meadows were lightly veiled with a blue transparent mist. The whole plantation was astir, and I lost no time in getting out to see the fun. The turkeys had come down from their roost, while two rival cocks were strutting and gobbling—emulous in puffing and absurdity—reminding one for all the world of a couple of oratorical demagogues before the people.

As in company with some thirty or forty feathered bipeds I stood admiring this droll exhibition, I observed a negroling, accompanied by a brace of dogs, edging up toward me, his countenance evidencing a mixture of shyness and curiosity. By a sudden movement I cornered him between the porch and the house. Finding there was no escape, he stood for a moment in amazed uncertainty, then mustered pluck to inquire his fate.

"You gwine to cut my head off, Sir?"

I assured him that I had no such intention at this time. His face shone with satisfaction; and feeling secure of his own safety, he undertook to inform me of the worthy character of his companions.

"Dese is good dogs, Sir; dey don't suck aigs."

I was much gratified to hear it, but intimated that one of them had a bad countenance.

"Dat's Cæsar, Sir. He did used to suck 'em, but dey done burnt his mouf wid a hot aig, and he don't do it no more."

Upon this I promised that the dogs might go unhanged as long as they behaved themselves, and the party then ran away shouting and yelping for very joy. The delicious freshness of the air induced me to continue my walk toward a large pasture field beyond the barn, where, gathered upon a rocky knoll, I observed a fine flock of ewes with their new-born lambs. Although no sentimentalist, I could not but pause to admire this gentle family. To the political economist a sight of the South Downs, in their unshorn comeliness, might have suggested good mutton and woolen factories. To the speculative philanthropist, the model of a community opposed to war—of a society based on innocence and love.

Alas for seraphic philanthropy, and the pretty gamboling lambkins—to a certainty you will all be shorn and roasted in the end!

I found more entertainment in considering the subject artistically—in the picturesque beauty of the attitudes and groupings; or physiognomically—in the varied expressions of the sheepish faces, ranging from poetic meekness and innocence, through every intermediate phase, to the most ludicrous silliness. It is a vulgar error to suppose that one sheep's head is like another, yet it is an error into which many of our celebrated animal painters have fallen. In expending their skill upon the anatomy, drawing attitudes, the peculiar texture of the covering of hair, wool, or feathers, they have done much that is essential; but not all, if they have in so doing neglected the individual and characteristic expression of the animal's face. To the accurate observer there is nothing mysterious in the readiness with which a lamb recognizes its mother; nor does he find it difficult to believe that the Laplander, who has more rein-deer than he can count, will yet immediately detect the absence of one familiar face from the herd. Give a man a microscope, and a motive, and I believe he could seat himself by an ant-hill, and in the course of time make the personal acquaintance of every individual in the community.

A sudden movement among my sheep caused me to turn; and the world thereby lost a lecture on bestial physiognomies.

At my elbow stood the cause of the disturbance—the negro whelp and his dogs. I felt vexed at the interruption, and ordered him off. Instead of obeying, he began another eulogy on the character of his playmates, earnestly setting forth their spotless innocence in regard to sheep-killing, and extolling their prowess against cats, pigs, and ground-squirrels. When he had talked himself into a hard knot, I repeated the order with a menacing look and gesture.

True enough, there stood a ewe with rueful face and distended udders beside its helpless weakling. It was curious to observe the simple arts of the poor creature to attract the lamb’s attention to its natural food. In vain she bleated and gently pushed it with her foot. Nature’s first instinct was wanting or dormant, and the little one refused to take hold. I called the attention of one of the farm hands to her case. He immediately took her, relieved her swelled teats of their superabundance; and then opening the lamb’s mouth with his finger, filled it with the fragrant milk. The little creature swallowed again and again, and at length revived sufficiently to make a successful effort to help himself. In a few minutes he got upon his legs, and trotted after his joyful mother to rejoin the flock.

The jingling of a bell at the mansion announced breakfast, and a cheerful hour in the frosty air had made the sound a most welcome one.

After breakfast the Colonel formally introduced me to Bias, his swarthy seneschal, and put the house and estate at my disposal. There was a saddle horse for my especial service; a buggy for a drive; a fowling-piece to shoot black-birds (no other game being in season); and, finally, the library, with nothing in it of a later date than Scott's novels, if we except agricultural periodicals and newspapers.

Then for the programme of the day. The Colonel was a man of business. Although he kept an overseer he was in person chief manager of the estate. He took breakfast at seven, dined at one, supped at seven P.M., and went to bed at eight, except when he had company. In addition to his private affairs, he held public offices of trust and dignity that occupied his time. He was a Justice of the Peace and President of the Agricultural Society. To-day he had business on the farm and in town. They were planting corn, and it was law day. Would I ride with him? "Remember at Rockston you are in Liberty Hall?"

I respectfully declined the ride, the buggy, the gun, the library. In short, I determined to pass the day according to a fancy of my own. It should be a day of strolling idleness among scenes that had been familiar in boyhood.

I set out, therefore, with a sketch-book in one pocket and a volume of Thomson's "Seasons" in the other, careful to balance the skirts of my coat. Having fetched a compass, avoiding the barn-yard, I crossed an open field, and entered a romantic forest much broken with ledges of limestone rock and briery thickets. Here, in a secluded nook, I seated myself, and gave memory the reins. Vaguely and reluctantly at first the shadows came forth from the great cemetery of the Past, until called and quickened by some familiar sight or sound. The form and color of the ferns and lichens about the rocks—the tapping of the woodpecker on the hollow trunk—the bark of the squirrel—the very smell of the dried leaves, had its associations. Soon by-gone scenes, time-dimmed and distant, were seen life-like and near, while faces of the dead and forgotten crowded around me warm with the smiles of by-gone love and friendship.

"Gillian is dead, God rest her bier;
How I loved her twenty years syne!
Marion is married—while I sit here Alone and merry."

"Merry!"—no, not merry, Mr. Thackeray. Confound those worthless dogs! And you here again, you imp of Satan! How dare you follow me around in this way?

"Master," cried the imp, stammering and trembling, "I seed you gwine to de woods, and I thought you gwine to hunt ground-squirrels, and I fotch de dogs."

"Away with you, pestiferous varlet!" cried I, whipping out my penknife and rushing at him. "I'll cut you into forty thousand giblets!"

The imp fled through the bushes like a rabbit with the dogs after him. I followed, shouting, threatening, and pelting them with stones, until they disappeared over the brow of a hill in the direction of the house.

Resuming my walk, I passed through the wood, and on its further border paused to note a group of hen-houses prettily located among the trees. I was the more pleased to perceive that the tenants of these rustic dwellings were of the old-fashioned breeds; that the lord of the hamlet had the chivalric bearing and elegant form of the game cock. How his crimson coronet and brilliant plumage recalled the joy and pride of my boyhood! What dauntless courage in his clear eye! what proud defiance in his clarion notes! yet with what knightly courtesy

"He chucketh when he hathe a corn y-found!"

The very type of the ancient gentleman whose decadence poets profess to lament, yet which all join to expedite. How much the displacing of this noble bird from his rightful and accustomed walks, and his substitution by that ungainly mass of cowardice, greediness, and feathers, the Shanghai, may have had to do with the deterioration of society, I will not venture to suppose. But when we remember the men of light and leading who once trod the walks of our Republic, and then consider those who occupy their places, one may be excused for looking into the poultry-yard and speculating on the different breeds of chickens.

While I was pondering on these things a negro woman, somewhat advanced in years, approached, and saluting me politely went on to look into the hen-houses, opening and shutting the doors and moving the water-pans in a manner that convinced me she had come rather upon an errand of curiosity than of business. Indeed I was not sure but that the sight of a stranger loitering about the chicken-yard might have excited some uneasiness in her mind, and, to dispel any possible suspicion, I called her to me and questioned her in regard to the modes of raising fowls, the proprietor of the great house that stood near, the estate she belonged to, etc., upon all which subjects her answers were respectful but curt. But when I told her my name her quiet manner was changed instantly to one of excited and voluble pleasure.

"Why, Mass Berkeley, is this you? Laus a-mercy, Sir, I'se Harry's wife—you 'members Harry—I must run and tell him."

And she did run. It was now my turn to be surprised. "How does this woman know me? Who is Harry? Whence this flattering welcome? She possibly mistakes me for another, yet she seems familiar with my name!"

While I stood thus puzzling my brain the good woman returned with her man, a stout negro with bald forehead and grizzled hair, apparently about sixty years of age. As I looked up he exclaimed,

"Lord be praised, Mass Berkeley. It is you,

THE HEN-HOUSE.

THE GRANDCHILD.

sure enough. I didn't believe Melindy." And the good old soul saluted me as if he were a Roman bowing before a patron saint. Ah! that face shining with gratitude—that voice husky with emotion—made all clear in a moment. I remembered Harry and the circumstances of our first acquaintance.

"How long has it been, Harry?"

"Four-and-twenty years, Master. I have taken account of it year by year."

"Four-and-twenty years! Can it be possible?" So we went to their cabin, where presently a dozen or more children and grandchildren dropped in by twos and threes. These, as they were successively presented, made obeisance and retreated into nooks and corners, where, with stretched eyes and hanging lips, they stared at me reverentially, as though I were a tutelary divinity.

"Twenty-four years ago," I repeated, mentally. "Since that time how many loves have grown cold—how many friendships perished—how many pearls cast before swine—how many hundreds of dollars worse than wasted—yet in the ruder soil of this faithful heart my childish hand had planted the seed of gratitude, which, like Jack the Giant-killer's bean, grew and grew and grew, until the plant seemed out of all proportion to the root from whence it sprung, or to the earth that sustained it.

On a cold drizzling morning, twenty-four years ago last Christmas, I was making my way through the village of Hardscrabble with a light heart and a Christmas quarter in my pocket, mentally rejoicing in the number of cakes, marbles, and fire-crackers that would presently come into my possession. As I passed the county jail I was arrested by the sound of a melancholy and not unmusical voice singing a Methodist hymn; and on looking up I saw the face of a negro man at the window peering wistfully through the heavy grating as he sung. When I stopped the music ceased, and the prisoner gave me a cheerful greeting.

"Merry Christmas! young master."

THE PRISONER.

"The same to you, uncle. You seem to be having a good time, though you are locked up."

"I sings, master, 'cause I'se so lonesome."

Now I thought of all the merry-makings that were going on in the neighborhood—the fiddling, dancing, fat turkeys, and good things that were in store for white and black; and then I looked at the cold gray stone walls, and the deep interior gloom behind the grim grated windows, and thought the poor soul might well feel lonesome.

"Well, uncle, it's best to keep up your spirits any way, and I'm sure you'll soon be out. But maybe you can play the fiddle, or can read, to pass away the time. I could get you a book, or borrow Nace Coleman's fiddle for you."

"Bless your good little heart, young master, I can't play on nothing, and have no larnin' of any kind. I can only sing two tunes I larned at camp-meeting, and whistle two or three jigs. The most I longs for is a pipe and some tobacco."

I was thrilled with a sudden joy, and hurrying as fast as I could walk to the store, I invested my quarter in a pipe and tobacco. Returning to the jail immediately, I halloosed to recall my new acquaintance to the window, from which he had retired.

"Here's your pipe and tobacco," said I, holding up the package.

"For me! young master?" exclaimed the negro, with grateful surprise. "Why, God bless the boy, has he spent his Christmas-money for the poor nigger?"

"I can get more if I want it," replied I, sturdily, although I was not so sure of it.

I tied the bundle to my little cane, and passed it up to the dusky hand that was stretched out to receive it, then hurried away in confusion to escape the thanks and blessings that were showered down from the prisoner's window.

For many days after I passed and repassed the jail on my way to and from school, never failing to exchange greetings with my grateful protégé, who always signaled my appearance by puffing a great cloud of smoke through the bars, to let me see that my present was well enjoyed. I do not remember that I ever inquired the cause of his imprisonment, or learned why he was released. Missing him from his accustomed place, I took it for granted that he had gone back to his people, and in a few weeks the whole affair had faded from my active memory.

Not so with Harry. In the following month of June I was agreeably surprised by a visit from him with a remembrance in the shape of a pair of young squirrels. So it continued, season after season, and year after year. Sometimes it was a dozen apples, a hatful of nuts, a superb water-melon, a brace of partridges—in short, anything and every thing that his simplicity suggested, and that his humble means could command.

At length it seemed to me these grateful returns had so far exceeded the original obligation that, on receiving my accustomed present one day, I insisted on his acceptance of some remuneration. His look of wounded sensibility told me of my error before he spoke.

"Young master, I did not think you was a gwine to treat me so. You is gettin' proud now, since you growin' up to be sich a proper young man."

I protested against being thought proud, yielded my point, and peace was made.

The years of study and of travel, of calm thought and stirring adventure, that had passed since then had so nearly obliterated these little incidents from my memory that I recalled them with some difficulty; while in the monotonous and uneventful life of the negro "the time when Mass Berkeley spent his Christmas-money to get him pipe and tobacco" still loomed up as a prominent landmark.

Before taking leave, I was anxious to mark this visit by some especial compliment and gratification to my ancient friend. It was high noon. The morning's stroll had sharpened my appetite. I had remarked on the hearth a suspicious-looking heap of cinders, to which Madam Harry had occasionally paid some attention.

"Harry," said I, "I have not tasted ash-cake and buttermilk for twenty years."

Harry snickered outright. "Why, master, ef there is any thing Melinda can't be beat it—it's ash-cake."

The pleased alacrity with which the lunch was served showed that I had hit the nail on the head. I did not fail to point the compliment by doing the ash-cake justice, and then resumed my walk, feeling fresher in mind and body than I had done for many a day.

Through field and forest, glade and thicket, I rambled on dreamily, unconscious of the passage of time, until at length I was aroused from my reveries by the sound of a horse's hoofs rapidly approaching. I was in the midst of a dense wood, near a private road, which was apparently but little used. The sun was declining in the west. The dinner-hour was long past. My entertainers would be vexed. But I had no time to dwell on the subject, for the next moment a spirited black horse dashed by at full gallop.

The rider was an uncommonly pretty young girl—at least so she appeared to me, as I caught a glimpse of her face beneath the plumed riding-hat. She rode with the grace and confidence of an accomplished horsewoman; her figure, seen to advantage in the close-fitting habit, was strikingly elegant; while a profusion of flaxen ringlets fell upon her shoulders and floated in the breeze.

This much I noted during the fifteen seconds she was in sight. The adventure was decidedly emotional, driving the sheep and all the other rural pictures out of my head. Oh! the vanity of getting wisdom, and the absurdity of consorting with owlish Professors, if a man of my age is liable to be thus flustered at the sight of a country lass riding through the woods! She rides well—but let her go; she looks as if she were fully able to take care of herself. What is she to me? By-the-way, what an admirable sight a fine horse is, especially when excited and moving rapidly! Ah! here comes a woodman with an axe on his shoulder; and, as I live, another old acquaintance!

"Hallo, Gabriel!"

"Sarv'nt, master!" said Gabriel, lifting his hat.

"Gabriel, what young lady was that who rode by just now?"

"Didn't see her, Sir. I jest been choppin' a little wood up here on de hill, and as it's nigh sundown I'm a gwine home to supper."

"Look at me, Gabriel: do you know who I am?"

Gabriel did as he was ordered; but presently shook his head. "Please God, master, your face looks kind'a like somebody I knowed, but I can't member 'zactly wha' to place you."

"Don't you remember Robert Berkeley?"

"Don't tell me dis is Mass Robert Berkeley!" cried Gabriel, with a grin.

"The very same," I answered, while fumbling in my pocket for a quarter.

"Why, master, I never would have knowed you; you begins to look middlin' old."

"The devil I do!" I replied, withdrawing my hand and buttoning up my pocket.

As I started up the road I turned and halloed, "Gabriel, do you remember the time Colonel Manley caught you in his hen-house?"

"Go 'long, Mass Robert! Who'd a thought you 'member dem foolish stories."

"Look middlin' old," do I? you anointed old chicken thief!"

As the sun was nearing the horizon I quickened my pace, and in the course of half an hour the chimneys of Rockston were visible, gilded by the rays of the setting sun.

MISCHIEF.

Passing by the quarter I was startled by an outbreak of unearthly yells, accompanied by vociferous scolding, sounding thwacks, barking of dogs, and loud guffaws of Ethiopian laughter; a mingled din, that startled the turkeys on their roost. A single glance sufficed to elucidate the whole matter. A half-drowned kitten escaping from the wash-tub; a stout matron, with the whelp's head under her arm, administering the condign with a heavy hand; attendant negroes and dogs laughing and barking their respective sentiments of approbation or disapproval of the proceeding.

THE CONDIGN.

One deeply versed in the mysteries of the human heart says that men, in spite of a Christian education, are very prone to feel a secret satisfaction in the misfortunes of others. I regret that candor obliges me to plead guilty to the charge in this instance. I left my youthful friend and follower to the tender mercies of the oppressor, and made my way quietly to the mansion.

As I entered the Hall, with the consciousness that my day's tramp was concluded, a sense of fatigue took complete possession of me. The parlor-door stood ajar, the room was untenanted, and the twilight glow of a sunken hickory-fire diffused an air of comfort through it that was irresistible. I entered; and throwing myself upon an inviting lounge, was soon in full enjoyment of the most delightful of sentimental luxuries—the dreams of evening twilight.

Pleasantly I reviewed the events of the day, with alternate smiles and soberness, following up their connections with the olden times; but most of all the fair lady of the forest haunted my thoughts with her weird beauty and dashing horsemanship. Now this unwonted freak of fancy puzzled me, for I had never been a recluse from society, and many a year had passed since the casual view of a pretty face could disturb the regularity of my pulse; whence, then, this vague and dreamy interest in a stranger, seen but for a moment, like a shooting star? Yet in that moment some rusted chord was struck, the sound whereof my dull ear has not caught; some gentle memory disturbed, not yet awakened quite to consciousness. Ah, faithless heart!—was it not Ellen Manley she was like? That sweet, laughter-loving face, those sunny curls, that form of grace. I have the secret now! Strange that I should have hesitated. Just so she looked when I rode beside her through these same groves, walked with her in these sunny lanes, worshiped her in this old Hall, and once—once only—on her red lips pressed the sweet seal of love:—ye gods and goddesses, I believe it was on this very sofa!

But time, and books, and travel, and society; the world, with its reasonings, and theories, and babblings! Has such trash then so nearly obliterated the golden dreams of my youth? Ah! sweet Ellen, had pride been less obdurate, or love more steadfast, a different life might have been yours and mine!

Ellen and myself were near the same age. When we were about sixteen we loved each other dearly, and were engaged. I sent her bouquets, wrote verses in her album, and gave her a gold ring with our names engraved on the inside; and she knitted me a purse of blue silk, and gave me one of her silken tresses tied with a blue ribbon. And when we got to this point, as a matter of course we quarreled. She returned my ring, which I pounded into little bits, and sent back to her; she threw them in the fire, and sent me a small paper of ashes, which I was given to understand was the remains of the ring. In a towering fury I took the flaxen tress with the blue love-knot her fairy hand had tied, and having frizzled it on a shovel, sent it to her reeking. Back came the tattered leaf from her album, with my tender verses interlined with a ludicrous parody. Who ever had the last word in a quarrel with a woman? I gave it up, and got drunk. In a short time my guardian, fearing that I was getting into bad habits, sent me away to college. Ellen went to Washington, caught a handsome beau, a captain in the army, who married her and took her to a post on the Western frontier. I have never seen her since. I hear that she is a happy wife and mother—may Heaven bless her!—and that her Captain is now a Colonel—may he soon become a General for her sake! She was not my first love, by half a dozen at least; nor my last, by a score. Yet now as I recall her she was the sweetest of them all—so beautiful, so enthusiastic, so artless, so sincere. Ah! could those days but come again, and I had the choosing, how gladly would I turn my back on the great world, with its gilded allurements, and seek the better part—a life-long companionship with a loving heart like hers! In dreams they say that Reason sleeps, while Fancy, ever watchful to escape her cruel mistress, slips her fetters, spreads her triumphant wings, and bears us, unresisting, where she lists.

Lights—voices! I started up in confusion. Good Heaven! is this a vision? My early love come back? Ellen Manley! A burst of laughter was the response my exclamation elicited. The Colonel stepped forward.

"You've had a good nap after your walk, Mr. Berkeley. This is my daughter Alice, the youngest-born of our house—our baby, as we still call her. She was an infant when you left us."

"Mr. Berkeley," exclaimed the old lady, "I fear you missed your dinner to-day. To be sure we had but little to tempt you: vegetables are so scarce at this season."

"Mrs. Manley," quoth the Colonel, "I'll guarantee that Bob Berkeley never sat down to a finer dinner than you had to-day. Such a ham, such a turkey, such a pudding!"

Mrs. Manley modestly confessed that the pudding was a success, and remarked that she had put away a piece of it for me.

"Cold pudding for supper!" cried the Colonel.

"By no means," replied the lady, with spirit. "I had it kept warm, and the turkey too. If the gentleman has missed his dinner, it will probably not be amiss at supper."

I must have appeared very silly meanwhile; for instead of taking part in the conversation, I only rubbed my eyes and stared at the lovely vision.

The frolicsome curls were tucked up daintily, and the riding-habit exchanged for a simple gown of black silk. Dimpled smiles played amidst the roses in her cheeks as she spoke.

"I think I passed you in the wood this evening, Sir?"

"Ellen—" I stammered. "Pardon me—Miss—Miss—"

"Alice," she suggested, with a pretty blush.

Mrs. Manley spoke up:

"Mr. Berkeley forgets that his old flame, Ellen, is a fine motherly woman of thirty-five, with a son who expects to go to West Point next year."

This was the bucket of water that brought me to my senses. We laughed, and went in to supper. I then related the adventures of the day, not forgetting a description of my dinner, which caused a deal of merriment.

"Ah!" said the Colonel, "if you are fond of rambling over the country, either on foot or on horseback, this young lady will be your companion. It is her delight."

Mrs. Manley took this opportunity to express a hope that her daughter would lay aside certain wild, rustic ways she had acquired, and deport herself with a dignity and gravity befitting the occasion and company.

Bless the good lady! does she think I am a bugbear to frighten the girls? I'll take good care that Miss Alice shall not find my society a restraint.

We are to ride to-morrow morning.

Good-night, and pleasant dreams!

A PIPE OF TOBACCO.

"WHEN all things were made, none was made better than this," said that stout old seaman, Salvation Yeo, handing a roll of brown leaf to the good knight Sir Amyas Leigh, "to be a lone man's companion, a bachelor's friend, a hungry man's food, a sad man's cordial, a wakeful man's sleep, and a chilly man's fire, Sir; while for stanching of wounds, purging of rheum, and settling of the stomach, there's no herb like unto it under the canopy of heaven." To the truth of which catalogue of good qualities many a mariner of the present day would, without hesitation, make oath.

Tobacco, this "precious stinke," as his vindictive majesty, King James, called it in his "Counterblast," first became known to Europeans shortly after the discovery of the American Continent. All its present popular uses were known to the natives of North and South America probably ages before Columbus was born, or Sir Walter Raleigh smoked his silver pipe as he sat to see his friend Essex put to death. When the Spaniards landed in Paraguay, in 1503, the natives came forth to oppose them, "beating drums, throwing water, and chewing tobacco and spirting the juice from their mouths upon the invaders—the last a means of offense and defense which must have painfully surprised the Spanish, if the Indians had at all acquired the skill of aim which is said to have been attained within this century by some of our Western friends. Columbus, on his second voyage, noticed that the natives of Tobago reduced their leaf to a powder, which "they take through a cane half a cubit long, one end of which they place in the nose, and the other upon the powder, and so draw it up, which purges them very much." And Oviedo speaks of smoking tobacco as one of the "evil customs" of the Hispaniolans of that day—"very pernicious, and used to produce insensibility." They set fire to the dried leaves, placed upon the ground, and inhaled the smoke through a hollow forked stick, of which the forks were placed in the nostrils, and the other end held over the burning mass. Thus the smoke was drawn into the lungs, and it is not surprising that, as Oviedo says, "they presently became stupefied." But our old friend, Salvation Yeo, as also Mr. Lionel Wafer, surgeon to Dampier, gives another account, according to which the Indians, "when they will deliberate upon war or policy, sit round in the hut of the chief; where being placed, enter to them a small boy with a cigarro of the bigness of a rolling-pin, and puffs the smoke thereof into the face of each warrior, from the eldest to the youngest; while they, putting their hands funnel-wise round their mouths, draw into the sinuosities of the brain that more than Delphic vapor of prophecy; which boy presently falls down in a swoon, and being dragged out by the heels and laid by to sober, enter another to puff at the sacred cigarro, till he is dragged out likewise; and so on till the tobacco is finished, and the seed of wisdom has sprouted in every soul into the tree of meditation, bearing the flowers of eloquence, and in due time the fruit of valiant action." Even pipes were known to the Brazilians; and of the Mexicans it is related by the chaplain of Cortéz that King Montezuma had his pipe brought to him, with much ceremony, when he had dined and washed his mouth with scented water. One of the rhymsters of those days says of Cortéz and his troop:

"They, in the palace of great Montezume,
Were entertained with this celestial fume."

The Indians were so fond of the intoxication of smoking, and so constant in their devotion, that they even reckoned time by the pipeful, and were accustomed to say, "I was one pipe" (of time) "about it." It is to be supposed that their huts were in smell not very savory, and probably old Giralamo Benzoni exaggerates but little when he relates: "I have entered the house of an Indian who had taken this herb, and immediately perceiving the sharp, fetid smell of this truly diabolical and stinking smoke, I was obliged to go away in haste."

Various attempts have been made to prove that the ancients had a knowledge of the tobacco plant, and a tradition of the Greek Church even has it that Noah was overcome by tobacco, and not wine, on his deliverance from the ark; but it is proved conclusively that to our own America is the Old World indebted for this invaluable weed; of which it may not be amiss here to state that upward of 2,000,000 tons are now grown and consumed annually in the world, which, at the low rate of five cents per pound, equals in value the entire wheat crop of the United States; while, though the plant has been known to the civilized world not yet three centuries, the duties on its importation into Great Britain bring that Government in no less a sum than $28,000,000 per annum, France deriving even a greater revenue from the same source. The city of Vienna alone consumes annually no less than 52,000,000 cigars, and the consumption of Great Britain, notwithstanding a tax of seventeen cents per pound, amounted in 1851 to over one pound per head for the whole population!

Raleigh's tobacco-box is yet preserved in the Leeds Museum. It is thirteen inches high, and seven across, and will hold a pound of tobacco. It has the initials W. R. within the lid. But before pipes and tobacco-boxes were invented in England cigars were smoked by those few who indulged themselves in the fragrant weed. They talked in those days of "drinking" tobacco—a term which was used for nearly a century, probably because smoking took place generally in public houses. Aubrey relates that in the early days of pipes the gentry had theirs made of silver, which material is still used in Japan, while the common people "made use of a walnut-shell and a strawe," which primitive utensil was handed from man to man round the table. At that time tobacco was an expensive luxury. It sold for its weight in silver; and when the farmers went to town to lay in their stock for smoking, they "culled their newest and biggest shillings to lay in the scales against the tobacco," while many of the gentry smoked away one-third of their income.

Not only was it long the fashion to swallow the smoke, and then expel it through the nose—a pitch of enjoyment now only attained by old soldiers and sailors and the Portuguese nation generally—but there were various exquisite ways of puffing, and the hangers-on of society and captains of the Bobadil sort made a profession of the art of smoking, and publicly inducted country gentlemen into the mysteries of the "Cuban ebullition, Euripus, the whiffle," etc.

TOBACCO-DRINKERS.

"If there be any such generous spirit that is truly enamored of these good faculties, may it please him but by a note of his hand to specify the place where he uses to eat and to lie, and the most sweet attendance with tobacco and pipes of the best sort shall be ministered."

"I warrant you make chimneys of your faces!" exclaims an irate lady in one of Beaumont and Fletcher's plays; and a gentleman observes, sneeringly, "'S'heart! he can not put the smoke through his nose!" The bucks of those days sallied out to court their sweet-hearts attended by a pipe and a boy to trim it, and said their fine speeches between the whiffs.

Like coffee and tea, tobacco was no sooner introduced than the faculty seized upon it as a valuable addition to their pharmacopœia. Spenser speaks of the curative powers of "divine tobacco;" Lilly, the Euphuist, writes,

"Gather me balme and cooling violets,
And of our holy herb nicotian," to cure a wounded hand; Henry Butler, in a curious little volume, called "Dyet's Dry Dinner," treats of its great virtues as a digestive power:

"Fruit, herbs, flesh, fish, white-meats, spice, sauce, and all, Concoct are by tobacco's cordial."

"It cureth any grieve, dolour, imposthume, or obstruction, proceeding of colde or winde, especially in the head or breast. The fume taken in a pipe is good against rumes, catarrhs, hoarseness, ache in the head, stomake, lungs, breast; also in want of meate, drinke, sleepe, or reste."

"What is a more noble medicine, or more readie at hand, than tobacco?" asks Edmund Gardiner, in his "Triall of Tobacco" (1610); and in a broadside published 1670, entitled "Nicotianæ Encomium, or the Golden Leaf Tobacco displayed in its sovereignty and singular vertues," the author chants its praises more loudly yet:

EARLY TOBACCO SYMPOSIUM.

"If the grand bugbear toad, the plague, ye fear,
Lo! under God your antidote is here.
Ye hot, ye cold, ye rheumatic, draw nigh;
In this rich leafe a sovereign dose doth lie.
We'll cure ye all: physick ye need not want,
Here 'tis, i' th' gummy entralls of a plant."

But the herbe sacrée (holy herb), herbe propre à tous maux (herb fit for all diseases), panacée antarctique (southern all-heal), by which and sundry other names tobacco was known in its early and medicinal days, soon gave way to less eulogistic epithets, applied by those who thought its influences pernicious. The battle, which began nearly two centuries ago, rages still, and many "eminent hands" may be found on either side. Spenser declaims about "divine tobacco;" but Stowe speaks of "the weed so much abused to God's dishonor." One old poetaster sings:

"Much victuals serves for gluttony, to fatten men like swine,
But he's a frugal man indeed that with a leaf can dine,
And needs no napkins for his hands his fingers' ends to wipe,
But keeps his kitchen in a box, and roast meat in a pipe."

To which another replies:

"In a tobacco shop (resembling Hell, Fire, stink, and smoke must be where devils dwell)
He sits, you can not see his face for vapor, Offering to Pluto with a tallow taper."

Bishop Earle says, sarcastically: "The tobacco-seller is the only man who finds good in it, which others brag of, but do not; for it is meat, drink, and clothes to him. His shop is the rendezvous of spitting, where men dialogue with their noses, and their communication is smoak." Against which one of the wits apostrophized the weed:

"Nature's idea, Physicke's rare perfection,
Cold rheumes expeller, and the wit's direction;
O had the gods known thy immortal smack,
The heavens ere this time had been colored black."

SIR WALTER RALEIGH SMOKED THUS.

William Penn strongly disliked tobacco, and loudly expressed his annoyance when in company where it was used. Stopping at Burlington once to see some old friends, they chanced to be smoking when he was announced, and hastily concealed their pipes. Perceiving the smoke as he entered the room, and also that the pipes had been hid, he said, pleasantly, "Well, friends, I am glad that you are at last ashamed of your old practice." "Not entirely," replied Samuel Jennings, a Quaker wit; "but we preferred laying down our pipes to the danger of offending a weak brother."

Charles II. forbade the members of the University of Cambridge to "wear perriwigs, smoke tobacco, and read the sermons they delivered." Peter Campbell, a Derbyshire gentleman, in 1616, bequeathing his goods to his son Roger, willed that if at any time his brothers or sisters "fynd him takeing of tobacco," he shall forfeit all "or their full vauel." As poor Roger had five brothers and three sisters he must have had a hard time with his pipe. Aubrey, writing in 1680, says: "Within these thirty-five years it was considered scandalous for a divine to take tobacco;" but Lilly, the astrologer, speaks of William Brendon, vicar of Thornton in 1633, as a profound divine, but so given over to tobacco that when he had none he would cut the bell-ropes of his church and smoke them.

Cromwell believed, with James I., that growing tobacco in England was "thereby to misuse and misemploy the soil of the kingdom," and sent his troopers to trample down the growing crops wherever they found them. But the soldiers smoked at the Lord Protector's magnificent funeral, and thus wreaked a poetic vengeance on him who had deprived them of a loved pleasure. M. de Rochefort, who traveled in England in 1672, relates that "it was then the custom, when the children went to school, to carry in their satchels, with their books, a pipe of tobacco, which the mothers took care to fill early in the morning, it serving them instead of a breakfast; and that at the accustomed hour every one laid aside his book to light his pipe, the master smoking with them, and teaching them how to hold their pipes and draw in the tobacco, thus accustoming them to it from their youths, believing it absolutely necessary for a man's health." To this extreme, at any rate, we have not yet come.

We do not propose to take sides in the tobacco controversy; but can not refrain from the remark that, while the anti-tobaccoists have been in general violent and often unmeasured in their denunciations, as indeed is shown in our quotations, the smokers have replied in temperate language, which contrasts them favorably with their opponents.

"Shun these pipe-pageants; for there seldome come Tobacco-factors to Elysium!"

exclaims an ardent tobacco-hater. And another:

"Tobacco's an outlandish weed,
Doth in the land strange wonders breed;
It taints the breath, the blood it dries,
It burns the head, it blinds the eyes;
It dries the lungs, scourgeth the lights,
It 'numbs the soul, it dulls the sprites;
It brings a man into a maze,
And makes him sit for others' gaze."

Sylvester, the translator of Du Bartas, and a favorite poet of James I., sought to gratify that royal tobacco-hater by a poem which has the strange title: "Tobacco battered, and the pipes shattered (about their ears that idly idolize so base and barbarous a weed; or, at least wise overlove so loathsome a vanitie) by a volley of holy shot thundered from Mount Helicon;" in which he thus condemns all smokers to Tophet:

OLD PRINT OF A TOBACCONIST'S INTERIOR.

"For hell hath smoke
 Impenitent Tobacconists to choake,
 Though never dead; there shall they have their fill.
 In heaven is none, but light and glory still."

But brave old George Wither wrote, in the face of King James's "Counterblast:"

"Why should we so much despise
 So good and wholesome an exercise
 As, early and late, to meditate?
 Thus think, and drink tobacco.

"The earthen pipe, so lily white,
 Shows that thou art a mortal wight;
 Even such—and gone with a small touch:
 Thus think, and drink tobacco.

"And when the smoke ascends on high,
 Think on the worldly vanity
 Of worldly stuff—'tis gone with a puff:
 Thus think, and drink tobacco.

"And when the pipe is foul within,
 Think how the soul's defiled with sin—
 To purge with fire it doth require:
 Thus think, and drink tobacco.

"Lastly, the ashes left behind
 May daily shew, to move the mind,
 That to ashes and dust return we must:
 Thus think, and drink tobacco."

But the smoker's enemies did not content themselves with vituperation. Ingenious and arithmetical minds entered into elaborate calculations of the waste of money by tobacco; thus one Lawrence Spooner reckoned that the tobacco used by a thousand families cost per annum no less than $4500. This, he says, "if improved thriftily, in twenty years would amount to more than $600,000" to divide among the smokers and their heirs. We remember to have seen some years ago an equally elaborate and interesting computation of the yearly waste accruing from the wearing of useless buttons on the backs of gentlemen's coats.

Persecutions followed. First came

"A gentleman called King James,
 In quilted doublet and great trunk breeches,
 Who held in abhorrence tobacco and witches."

He imposed the first tax on tobacco; in Russia smoking was punished by amputation of the nose; in the Swiss Canton of Berne the offense ranked next to adultery, and even so late as the middle of the last century a special court tried delinquent puffers; Amurath IV. of Turkey, and the great Gehan-Geer joined in the crusade; and finally, Innocent XII., in 1690, solemnly excommunicated all who should take snuff or tobacco in church. Meantime, conscious of their innocence and their rights, the smokers placidly kept their pipes alight, and at intervals came forth with some such piece of quaint morality as this, supposed to be from the pen of Dr. Henry Aldrich:

"Sweet smoking pipe; bright glowing stove,
 Companion still of my retreat,
 Thou dost my gloomy thoughts remove,
 And purge my brain with gentle heat.

"Tobacco, charmer of my mind,
 When, like the meteor's transient gleam,
 Thy substance gone to air, I find,
 I think, alas, my life's the same!

"What else but lighted dust am I?
 Thou show'st me what my fate will be;
 And when thy sinking ashes die,
 I learn that I must end like thee."

Dean Aldrich was a great smoker, and it is related of him that a student of Oxford, knowing his devotion tobaccoward, once made a bet that however early or at whatever time the Doctor was visited in his sanctum, he would be found smoking. The bet was taken, the visit made at a very unseasonable hour, and its cause frankly announced. "Your friend has lost," said the Dean, good-naturedly; "I am not smoking—only filling my pipe."

But many great names are cited on the side of tobacco. Pope and Swift took snuff; Addison, Congreve, Prior, Steele, smoked, and were none the worse. Hobbes of Malmesbury kept his pipe alight to the age of ninety-two; Doctor Parr smoked immoderately—often twenty pipes in the course of an evening—but remained a smoker till the ripe age of seventy-eight; Sir Isaac Newton was a desperate lover of his pipe, and lost his sweet-heart through absently using her finger as a tobacco stopper; and Frederick the Great was a royal lover of the weed, in which taste, by-the-way, Mr. Carlyle, his latest and ablest biographer, emulates him! Of literary men some have refrained. Goethe, Heine, and Balzac abominated smoke; their subtle spirits could not bear its gross influences. Dumas, who does almost every thing else, if we may believe his own accounts, does not use tobacco. On the other side, however, are found Sir Walter Scott, at one time an immoderate smoker, and always a lover of his cigar; Campbell, Moore, Byron; and of living celebrities, Tennyson, Thackeray, and Bulwer, have all chanted the praises of the Indian weed. Lamb loved his pipe, and was not particular as to the quality of his tobacco. Puffing once the coarsest weed from a long clay pipe in company with Doctor Parr, who used only the finest, the Doctor asked in astonishment how he acquired this "prodigious power?" "By toiling after it," replied Elia, "as some men toil after virtue." The filthy habit of chewing tobacco numbers fewer great men among its devotees, and we shall mention only—as an early chewer—General Monk, in whose time it was customary for gentlemen who chewed to carry about with them a small silver hand-spittoon, used as shown in our illustration—taken from a contemporary print.

The early tobacco-sellers set off their wares with many quaint conceits and riddles, which, doubtless, amused the tranquil mind of their customers. On one side of the wrapper of a tobacco parcel was printed:

"What though I have a nauseous breath,
Yet many a one will me commend;
I am beloved after death,
And serviceable unto my friend."

Which inscrutable riddle is duly explained on the reverse side:

"This is tobacco, after being cut and dry'd, being dead, becometh serviceable."

Another and more ingenious conceit was thus unfolded:

"To three-fourths of a cross, add a circle complete;
Let two semicircles a perpendicular meet;
Next add a triangle that stands on two feet;
Then two semicircles, and a circle complete."

To elucidate which it requires that the name of the herb be written down in Roman capitals.

A man named Farr had a tobacco-shop on Fish-Hill, London, and attracted custom from his older rival opposite by this tempting sign:

"THE BEST TOBACCO BY FARR."

The sailors who patronized that region, and were then, as now, a credulous folk, went over in a body; but were reclaimed by a new sign over the old shop:

"FAR BETTER TOBACCO THAN THE BEST TOBACCO BY FARR."

In 1748 a Spanish vessel was captured and brought into New York. Part of her cargo consisted of fine paper copies of recent Papal bulls, and this paper was bought by an enterprising Yankee, who, not having the fear of the Pope before his eyes, printed on the backs "Choice Pennsylvania tobacco," and used the bulls as wrappers, advertising his willingness to sell "at a much cheaper rate than they can be purchased of the French and Spanish priests, and yet will be warranted to be of the same advantage to the possessors."

And here is an old American tobacconist's conundrum:

"O and P ran a race; Q backed O, knowing that P would win. Why was this like going into a shop and asking for shag, and getting short-cut? Answer: Because it was wrong to back O."

But the prettiest conceit for a smoker's pipe is the following, which will please even non-smokers:

"Tub, I love thee as my life;
By thee I mean to chuse a wife.
Tub, thy color let me find,
In her skin, and in her mind.
Let her have a shape as fine;
Let her breath be sweet as thine:
Let her, when her lips I kiss,
Burn like thee, to give me bliss.
Let her in some smoke or other
All my failings kindly smother.
Often when my thoughts are low,
Send them where they ought to go.
When to study I incline,
Let her aid be such as thine:
Such as thine her charming pow'r
In the vacant social hour.
Let her live to give delight,
Ever warm and over bright:
Let her deeds, when'er she dies,
Mount as incense to the skies."

The coloring of meerschaums, which is the present "amiable weakness" of Young America, is an old story among the Turks and the Germans, who devoted time, patience, and tobacco to this noble object quite a century ago. We have inherited the "coloring mania" from our English cousins, among whom this valuable talent has been developed to an extraordinary degree. It is related that a young English Guards officer determined not long since to obtain, by a device worthy the grave importance of the subject, the very ideal of a colored meerscham. To do this he knew that the pipe, once lighted, must never be permitted to go out. Accordingly he arranged that it should be passed from mouth to mouth of the entire regiment, he agreeing to pay the tobacco bill. After seven months of arduous smoking and patient waiting, the fortunate fellow received a pipe the splendor and perfection of whose colors exceeded even his most sanguine hopes. With it a bill for tobacco used, to the modest tune of nine hundred and seventy-five dollars!

BURNS'S SNUFF-BOX.

But if such pipes are costly, the old snuff-boxes of the days when to be a gentleman was to take snuff elegantly were yet more precious.

BOX, FROM SHAKESPEARE'S MULBERRY.

Pope and Swift, Bolingbroke, Congreve, Addison, and many other great men, were addicted to snuff. Gibbon was a confirmed snuff-taker.

SCOTCH MULL.

Frederick the Great loved snuff so entirely that he carried it in his vest pockets, made very large for the purpose, and in moments of excitement threw it up his nose by small handfuls. In Spain and Italy snuffs were medicated, and even infused with a subtle poison, so that by the offer of a friendly pinch a man sometimes sent his enemy out of the world. But the most complete and luxurious paraphernalia for snuff-takers is undoubtedly the Scotch "sneeshing mull," with its little hammer to hit the side of the mull should the snuff adhere; bodkin, to pierce and separate it should it stick together by damp; rake, to collect it into the little shovel; and hare's foot to brush loose particles from the nose!

It remains to be said that no less than forty different species of tobacco are described by botanists, of all of which the leaves are now smoked, chewed, or snuffed in different parts of the world, smokers consuming by far the greater part.

MRS. ANTHON'S CHRISTMAS PRESENT.

MR. PETER ANTHON was a rich New York merchant—one of the old-fashioned kind. Not a parvenu, for he remembered his own great-grandfather, and was himself born in the house in Bleeker Street which that respected old gentleman built. Not a speculator either, but a sober, rigid, well-read, well-bred man, who increased his large patrimony by steady attention to business, and never invested in railway shares. At an age of discretion Mr. Peter Anthon married Miss Jane Suydam, a lady equally respectable, rich, well-bred, and rigid with himself; and in course of time Mrs. Anthon enlivened the mansion in Tenth Street by introducing to its quiet and orderly splendors a very small boy, who was christened Peter, after his papa, and was fully expected to do honor to his parentage.

Mrs. Anthon was a quiet, reserved woman naturally, and the strictest style of education had only added new force to the bent of her nature. She had no younger sisters. She knew nothing of children; and though all that was tender and feminine in her repressed heart awoke at little Peter's advent, she did not know how to express it in any sweet, motherly ways, but always talked to her child in the most correct English, and sighed over its total depravity as that Presbyterian trait developed, day by day, to Mrs. Anthon's orthodox horror.

For Peter was even a baby like other babies. He paid no regard at all to the fact that he was an Anthon. He was not in the least respectable or proper. He kicked, and cried, and laughed, and made faces just when and where he pleased, always doing the wrong thing at the wrong time. He would laugh and play peep with Hannah, the old family nurse, till she declared he was a perfect angel; and one minute after would just as strenuously rub his eyes, wrinkle up his nose, kick and scream at the Rev. Doctor Sopus, till that upright man retreated in disgust from the attempt at cultivating his acquaintance.

Peter was a very pretty baby, and his mother was extremely fond of him; but it was not to be denied that he preferred old Hannah to his mamma—that, like most babies, and perhaps a few undignified grown people, he liked better to be kissed, and fondled, and rubbed, and cooed over, than to be laid straight out on two knees, or stuck bolt upright on a rectangular arm and addressed grammatically. For, say what you will, my dear brother, babies do like baby-talk, and know its professors with a "knowledge that is love," as Mr. Kingsley says. Just let you and I go down on our knees together before that cherub in white cambric on the sofa there. You enter into conversation with it as you speak to any body else, and I assail it with those honeyed elisions, and tenderest nonsenses, shorn of labials and denuded of harsh consonants, made fluent and gracious with the indescribable loving sounds that Sir Thomas Browne meant when he asked leave to "coin the word cordilology." Don't you see who those dreamy eyes turn toward and seek for? Is it you those blessed little arms reach after? Is it you the soft pink lips begin to answer with inarticulate tones and the pucker of a coming smile? Ah no! you know better! I have conquered you with the most irresistible logic—with the baby's own induction from fairly-stated premises: bless its heart!

So it naturally came about that Hannah had more to do with baby than Mrs. Anthon herself; and as she possessed fully the true feminine joy in being tyrannized over, and knew the art of spoiling children by heart, Master Peter, by his third year, had Hannah completely under his thumb, and regarded his mother with the same calm admiration he felt for the sideboard. Peter was beginning to be troublesome, to tell the truth. Mrs. Anthon had set hours for his reception; but he would secrete scraps of bread and butter under his embroidered frock, and produce them on mamma's satin lap, or daub his fingers on her camel's hair shawl, or play horse with a big velvet chair, and bang it up against the sideboard, till glass and plate trembled at the shock, while his lawful governess sat quaking on the sofa, all unable to redress her grievances short of using physical force, of which she disapproved; and uttering inadequate remonstrances and remarks, unheard in the noise of Peter's cavalry charge, and fully convinced that "some one had blundered" in supposing character to be hereditary; for did not that uproarious, astonishing, inexplicable child spring from the highest old respectability? And what was he? Scene and reflection generally ended by ringing vehemently for Hannah, and a grand display of diplomacy on her appearance, to delude Peter back to his calm obscurity of the third story.

Mr. Anthon was a man of business, and left home every day before his son's late toilet was accomplished, returning to dinner at night, when that infant was served up with the dessert, kept in order by small doses of almonds and raisins, and hustled off to bed when the cloth was finally withdrawn, leaving behind him the impression that he was as well-behaved a child as his father's son ought to be, and carrying away a private terror of that father's cool gray eye and straight-set features that was no way akin to love.

But out of this terror, which she adroitly discovered, Hannah made her most successful engine of government. If Peter the second was naughty, his father was to be told at once; and as he never was told, the boy's natural acuteness discerned that Hannah herself was afraid of his father, and from that fact he drew the necessary inference that his father was to be feared, and he behaved himself accordingly.

So Peter grew to be ten years old; for a while under the nominal teaching of a governess—a pretty, weak, soft-hearted little creature, over whom her infant charge domineered most persistently, and who could only persuade him to learn the ominous column beginning "b a, b a, k e r, k e r—baker" by keeping him on short allowance of kisses and molasses candy. For Peter had a warm and true heart in his rebellious little bosom, and actually, like the dreadful English child recorded in Miss Brontë's life, "loved the governess!"

But the governess loved somebody else more, and one day took leave of her pupil, in a storm of hugs and tears and kicks, to marry a clerk in a dry-goods shop; at which bereavement Mr. Anthon looked more grim than ever, and forthwith provided a tutor for the seven-year manikin.

If there is any thing particularly funny in the "solemn and necessary institution" of teaching, it is to see a young man undertake the instruction of a small boy, except in a Sunday spasm of benevolence, or as the temporary didactic amusement of a rainy day. There seems to be a sort of natural antipathy between the two ages of the same sex; and the same man who holds in abject submission and awful worship a dozen of the wildest girls will be utterly routed by one naughty boy. Mr. Gaius Hogeboom, however, by dint of great natural obstinacy, poverty, and the diversion of studying theology between his lessons, managed to hold on and keep his place for nearly three years, by the end of which time Peter knew some arithmetic, less geography, a little Latin, and could write intelligibly—all but the spelling. He had also developed a great capacity for slyness, could do more mischief right under his tutor's nose than any other boy of his size, and was fast smothering his frank, warm heart under the thick selfishness that almost inevitably gathers about the only son of rich and over-careful parents. So Mr. Hogeboom came to the sober conclusion that Peter needed some more efficient training than he could give, particularly as his own course of study was fulfilled, and he now expected to be ordained. He strenuously recommended Mr. Anthon to send Peter to school, or else procure for him a companion at home, in order not merely to stimulate his mind by rivalry, but for the moral effect of another to consider and to be considered besides himself. By what Mrs. Anthon, in her profane religiosity, called a special providence, just at this time Mr. Anthon's only sister died, and left a son one year younger than Peter; as if Providence chastised and bereaved people for the convenience of somebody else, even though that somebody might be Mrs. Peter Anthon!

Mrs. Rivers was the widow of a poor clergyman, whom she married for the very unwise reason that she loved him, though her hand was solicited at the time by two other youths—rich, respectable, and of "old families."

Nobody ever knew that Mrs. Rivers pined after these advantages; probably, with the weak minds some women have (may their shadows never be less!), she thought her good and handsome husband something more precious than dollars and position; at any rate, she broke her heart when he died, and died herself six months afterward, leaving, as a legacy to her brother, a letter that might have drawn tears from a millstone, provided that commodity had ears or eyes—a letter that did make Mr. Peter Anthon blow his nose twice in the penetralia of the counting-room, and receive its accompanying bequest, the aforesaid child, as warmly as his nature or his habit permitted.

Harry Rivers was a frank, honest, fine-tempered boy, who despised lying and duplicity from the mere force of a nature that offered no temptation to those sins. His faults were all the faults of a character essentially noble, and just those that a life under his uncle's eye was calculated to repress. He was soon installed in the house, and treated, in all physical aids and appliances, as well as Peter. Mrs. Anthon liked him because he gave no trouble; Hannah, because he was "Miss Susan's boy;" and Peter liked him more heartily than either, because he couldn't help it—for he was naturally generous and affectionate, only till now he had never had any object but Hannah to expend either of these traits upon, and the habit of tyrannizing over her had become stronger than nature. There was no rivalry, no jealousy between these boys—not even when they were sent to a great, noisy boys' school together. They had small quarrels, little internecine wars of aggravation; sometimes got extremely tired of each other; but twenty-four hours always composed their differences, and they were friends again after a good night's sleep.

In school, of course, Peter had no end of trouble. The boys found out his social ignorance long before the master became aware of his deficient education, and they christened him at once as "Peter the Second"—a style that sent him home full of wrath and covered with bruises, achieved in the effort to punish his tormentors.

So Peter and Harry grew to be sixteen—Harry fulfilling the promise of his youth; Peter still as wild, as willful, and as warm-hearted as he was at three, but infinitely less afraid of punishment, and a great deal fonder of his mother, who had softened with time, and sent out every poor groping tendril of her shut-up heart toward the fresh young life of her son. At this time Peter was sent to college, and Harry taken into his uncle's counting-room. Unlucky separation for Peter, whose defender as well as friend Harry had been through all their school-days; persuading him into right and beguiling him away from wrong with every good influence, conscious or unconscious, of which he was capable. And much Peter needed such a friend. His generous impulses had no regulation of reason; his quick passions never had been repressed by principle or discipline; his earnest and ardent heart never stopped to look at sequences or calculate results; he knew neither the worth nor the want of money, for his father's school allowance to him had been most liberal. And with all these traits he was thrown into college with a herd of boys, few better and most far worse than he, with no restraint of home, and little of authority. Just as well might he have been cast headlong into a raging sea, and left to strike out for life!

Natural consequences ensued. He grew careless, lazy, dissipated; he fell into a bad set of companions; he became "fast;" bills poured in upon his astonished father, followed by letters from the college authorities, to say the least, rather uncomplimentary to Peter; and many a time Harry had to stand between his uncle's rage and his son, recalling to him how kind and earnest and fatally impulsive was the boy's nature; how long-patience must at length recall him to his better self and his best friends; how a knowledge of his actions would grieve his aunt; and how his own credit would suffer by refusing to pay his son's debts; till, at length, Peter put an end to intercession and forbearance by appearing suddenly at home, formally expelled from college; and though cut to the quick by a catastrophe so little expected, and burning with a sense of deserved humiliation, outwardly defiant, careless, and bold.

Mr. Peter Anthon, Senior, was enraged—not by any means to the point of noise or bluster—no human emotion could drive him to that. He was steel at white heat, rigid, concentrated, intense, and scorching. Mrs. Anthon was scared and grieved to the heart; she would not look at Peter before his father, but grasp his hand when they met in the halls, or in the rare moments they were left together, and say, in piteous tones of appeal and remonstrance, "Oh, Peter!"—sole reproach her trembling lips could frame, or her heart compel itself to utter, but far more potent with Peter than all his father's bitter words or poignant accusations. Vainly did Harry Rivers try to reconcile father and son. Neither one would take the first step toward it.

"It's no use, Harry," said Peter, one night, going to his cousin's room after an evening spent with his father. "I can't stand such a rowing over again. The governor says he'll cut me off with sixpence, and leave it all to you. I hope he will. You deserve it, and I don't. I don't want his money; but, confound it! I should like to think the old man was flesh and blood, and cared a curse whether I was alive or dead, before I leave him for good."

"You're all out there, Peter," answered Harry. "If the old gentleman didn't care about you, do you think he'd make all this fuss? Not he. It's his way of showing he does care for you; and as for leaving his property to me, he won't do any such thing. He is too true an Anthon for that. It was only a threat."

"Well, he won't threaten long," interposed Peter, in a gloomy tone.

"Don't go to doing any thing absurd, Pete," said Harry, earnestly. "Just have patience to lie by till the storm's blown over, and then come quietly down to the counting-room, and do what he wants of you. Aunt Jane will break her heart over you if you don't."

"H'm!" growled Peter, "I guess not; she daren't speak to me before father now! Well, Harry, you're all right, anyway. . . . You're a clever fellow, Hal. Shake hands—won't you? Good-night!"

In the morning Peter Anthon, Junior, was missing. A hasty letter informed his father that he had joined the volunteers for the Mexican war; and from that hour Mr. Anthon spoke his son's name no more for years; and his wife, having wept herself half blind, relapsed, after a while, into her old repression and formality, and wore steadily the same cool and quiet aspect that nobody but her child had ever disturbed or dispelled.

When the lists of killed and wounded came home after the battle of Chapultepec, Peter Anthon, private, was reported missing. Harry Rivers wrote to the colonel of his regiment for further particulars, and learned that a party of skirmishing Mexicans had sprung upon a few men detailed for the purpose of fetching water to the wounded after the battle, killed six, and made three prisoners, none of whom had been heard of or seen since, and one of the three was Peter. Harry laid a copy of his letter and the colonel's answer on his uncle's desk, and knew by his aunt's face and eyes at breakfast the next morning that she had seen them. But no words passed about the matter; and as year after year rolled away, and Peter never returned, he was given up for dead, mourned for in proper blackness, and every body knew that Mr. Anthon had adopted Harry Rivers for his son, in place of "that poor, dissipated creature who went to Mexico," as the New York world said.

It was no such great blessing, after all, to Harry Rivers to be so adopted; for it bound his fresh, gay, sparkling nature to the form and routine of two dull and formal people, and incarcerated him, as it were, in a jail of propriety, where another and a weaker nature would have been altogether crushed and devitalized. But Harry was not to be crushed by any thing less than a real evil; nor did he fly for relief to such pursuits as many youths would have sought for that end. He disliked wine and spirits too much to know them as temptations; cards were stupid to him; the vulgar rivalry of a race-course disgusted him with horses simply as racers. In short, his nature and his training both kept him out of sin, till the time came for religious principle to become an ally all-potent to both training and nature. So there was no danger that even the stupidity of his life should drive him into being "fast."

Really Harry Rivers was a very good young man. Not one of the inexpressible noddies who usually pass muster under that synonym, merely too stupid to be any thing—a negative of all evil because a negative of every thing—not one of these! No priggish manners asserted his superiority to the most trifling boy or girl of his rank in society; no obtrusive preachments of trite moralities bored and disgusted his friends at all times and places. He was simply a healthy, honest, high-spirited young fellow, who found hard work enough to do in fighting his own temper and his own indolence, and took his pleasures after a certain fresh and characteristic fashion, careless of laughter or sneers; for Harry kept a good horse, and every day drove or rode him; but instead of taking with him some pretty girl or stylish dandy, he carried off his uncle's old dusty, rusty book-keeper, or a pale, overworked clerk, or a couple of children belonging to some poor widow, who could as easily have compassed the Koh-i-noor as the refreshment of a drive for her white-faced, timid little girls. Just such sort of persons were his companions in the frequent sails that were his summer recreations, greatly to the wonder of his higher-life companions, and to the delight of many who laid up against him as a virtue that which was simply a pleasure. For Mr. Rivers held in small esteem the young ladies who made the staple of such gay society as he frequented now and then; and still less was he fond of companionship with most of the young men; and he had a heart full of humanity—rarest virtue in these days, when doctrines, and theories, and speculations outpreach the most living fact of God's great Gospel—the fact Christ came to illustrate and impress—the very pass-word of heaven: "For all ye are brethren." So between one thing and another it was, after all, his pleasure that prompted Harry Rivers to do these things, just as much as it was his pleasure that carried him to the Opera, to the Philharmonic, and to every decent concert that promised music—promise too often unperformed to any ear cognizant of music!

Besides, Harry was well aware that he was the only thing his aunt cared for now. She had relapsed into her old impassibility after Peter's death; but if ever any ray of affection visited her dull blue eye, or any tenderness tempered her cold voice, it was always Harry Rivers who so moved her; partly because she associated him more than any one else with her lost boy, and partly because it was next to impossible for even an Anthon to live in the house with Harry and not love him. Mr. Anthon, too, felt a kinder warmth for him than for any thing but bank stock, and began to trust him and lean upon him in his business, in a way that both pleased and touched Harry's generous, loving nature—a nature trust and kindness never were wasted on, but one that suspicion and cruelty might have driven to any extent—to any excess.

One thing only in their nephew's conduct troubled either uncle or aunt: he had grown to be twenty-six, and never fallen in love or married! Vainly did Mr. Anthon suggest one young lady after another, of the best family, the most undoubted accomplishments, the securest fortune. Harry laughingly set aside all their claims on any score, and declared he was meant for an old bachelor. One was too pretty ever to think her husband handsome; another too rich to let him keep his independence; another too musical for a quiet man; and another too expansively founced—laughing reasons all, playing harmless about the fact that none of them moved him a hair's-breadth; none of them stirred his heart or entranced his eye; not a girl of the set could wake up any thrill in his dreaming soul, or flutter his pulse with a grain's vibration, and he could not fall in love, even to Peter Anthon and Co.'s order!

But Harry's day came at length. On a journey of business he contracted a Southern fever that nearly brought him beyond the reach of love or matrimony—or rather the latter; and on his recovery he was sent peremptorily to the sea-side and quiet.

Watertown was a straggling little village on the Connecticut shore, full of white houses with green blinds; marigolds, fennel, and hollyhocks in the garden; and south doors always open in summer, provided there was any southern exposure whereon to locate such a door. A few scattered houses dotted the beach, and in one of these Mr. Rivers took board and lodging for the month of June. Of course, in his visits to the village post-office he made acquaintance with the doctor, the minister, and the lawyer of Watertown, and was, after a time, invited to drink tea solemnly with each of these dignitaries, ending with the minister—the Reverend Gideon Tennant—on which latter occasion Mr. Rivers found his fate.

And found it in the prettiest shape! for Nelly Tennant was one of those New England types most like the wild blossoms of her country, delicate, sweet, earnest, yet withal so firm in vitality that neither time nor trouble do more than bend them for a season. The first sunbeam calls them up from the sod with undimmed eye and fresh perfume. Very pretty indeed was Miss Nelly; a delicate skin, pale except with emotion or exercise; the tiniest rosy mouth; a nose proper enough, and not Grecian; two dark eyes that were sad, sweet, bright, naughty, and lovely by turns; plenty of soft dark hair; a pair of useful hands; ditto feet; and a tolerable little figure, rather too aerial for beauty, being, as the village dress-maker said, "dreadful lean"—I should have said, "slight."

But if Nelly Tennant had possessed green eyes and gray hair she would still have been attractive. Green and gray may laugh at tint, and shape, and regularity when they are strong in the alliance of such an earnest, tender, true nature as Nelly Tennant's, and take to themselves neither shame nor credit when a bright mind and a sunny temperament abet the nature aforesaid.

Every body in the parish loved Nelly, though she was the minister's daughter. All the children ran to meet her; all the dogs wagged their tails for a pat of her soft little hand; all the old women told her every thing about the last fit of "rheumatiz," or that "drefful coughin' spell of his'n;" all the old men grinned at her benignly, and pronounced her "real pretty-behaved;" while young men and maidens came to Nelly Tennant with all their plans and all their troubles, from the planning of a picnic to the arranging of a knotty love affair, sure of quick sympathy and timely aid. And every body loved Nelly because she loved every body first. Her heart was certainly suffering from enlargement, for not even a sick cat missed its due pity or careful tendance if Nelly knew its need; while the few poor and the more frequent sick in Watertown blessed her daily, if not for real help, yet for her bright smile and cheerful words, always ready for sick or poor. At home she was gay, natural, charming, just like a fresh daily rose that puts out its blossom till the winter frosts smite it, and comes first in the spring-time to bring news of summer.

Of course Harry Rivers liked "Miss Helen" very well on first acquaintance; better the second time; far more on a picnic they both went to—institution most trying to female vanity and self-conceit, where Nelly never showed a bit of either trait, but gave every body else the best places, dressed all the pretty girls' hair with garlands, whose grace and adaptation made the wearers twice fair; introduced Mr. Rivers to all the homely girls, and talked to them herself; and at length—climax of virtue, as I sorrowfully confess!—washed up all the dishes and repacked them herself, giving the right owners their own, and then sat down to enjoy herself as merrily as if she were there only for that end.

It's all very well, young ladies, for you to dress, and dance, and be elegantly benevolent, or literary, or accomplished within an inch of your lives, and then go home to snap at your father, and sniff at your dear old mother, harass the luckless servants who do not suit you, and oppress the poor seamstress, whom you cheat out of her dues between overwork and underpay. But, let me tell you, the real life you live sets its mark on you in the eyes of any man or woman worth knowing; and all your finery, and education, and charity can never cover that fatal seal. Nature will out, as well as murder; in all places the traitor whispers and winks. If you want to be loved, make yourselves lovely. Neither time nor chance shall touch you then, and circumstance itself—fatalest of fates—shall only prove you fairer in its test, and attract to you more and more deeply whatever is lovely and loving about you.

For that was Nelly Tennant's spell; and it worked well indeed, since before June dazzled into July Mr. Rivers thought the day lost that he missed sight of Miss Tennant; and when he went to say good-by, in the middle of that summer-time, he looked so miserable, and Nelly felt so sorry for him, that after he went away her sympathizing little soul overflowed in a great quantity of tears, which made pretty rainbows, no doubt, among themselves at the smile that every now and then shone through them when she remembered how he said to her, at the gate,

"I shall come back again, Miss Nelly. May I?"

The hardest part of the affair to Harry was to tell his uncle of it. Not because he doubted his consent, or cared very much whether he had it or not; but because it is always hard to drag one's sentiment into the light and offer it for examination like a piece of goods.

However, the thing was to be done, and knowing that, Harry did it; for he was not a man to shrink from any thing that he decided necessary, and in this case he was agreeably disappointed by Mr. Anthon's reception of his confidence. It is true the old gentleman would have been better pleased had Harry married a fortune, but he had proved so untractable heretofore on the head of heiresses that his uncle was advised by the recollection that it was an act of grace in the youth to marry at all, though it was only a woman.

One battle only followed. Mr. and Mrs. Anthon insisted that Harry should bring his wife "home," as they phrased it, to their house; and at this he rebelled long and strenuously, but in vain. At last he was forced to admit their right to ask some concessions from him; and in due season, after a quiet wedding at Watertown, Mrs. Harry Rivers was installed in the pleasantest room of Mr. Anthon's house, and the world went on much as usual, though perhaps that household fancied its old grooves were oiled and its orbit easier to circle. Certainly it was to them; for Nelly Tennant was like a song-sparrow in an owl's nest there. The quiet, chilly, dreadfully neat house was quiet and chilly no more. Nelly loved sunshine and heat like a blossom, and the south windows of her room let in streams of sunshine on to the gay carpet and pretty furniture, to Mrs. Anthon's great consternation; only as Harry had furnished it, she could not interfere further than meekly to ask,

"Aren't you afraid the sun will fade your carpet, dear?"

"Oh no, aunty! Better fade that than fade me, isn't it?"

And Mrs. Anthon was forced to feel as well as say, "Yes."

Then Nelly had a voice sweet, clear, and round, always running over in some gay or tender song. Up and down stairs, through the hall and parlors, in her own room, every where, you tracked her by the little ripples of music that made one think of the good little girl in "Diamonds and Toads," who spoke jewels. Mr. Anthon himself, grave and grim, was melted into a stately and serene politeness by Nelly's perfectly natural sweetness and gayety. The only fault either uncle or aunt found with her was an inveterate propensity she had to visit poor people.

Now Mr. and Mrs. Anthon were very good people, after a highly respectable fashion; they subscribed to several societies indorsed by the Reverend Dr. Sopus, whose church they attended. They always put silver into the poor-box, and never gave any to street-beggars. They had a vague idea that poverty and sin were twin-sisters, and good to one might nourish the other, unless strict care was taken to define the "virtuous poor." But the idea that the inhabitants of Cow Bay and the Five Points were really the same flesh and blood and spirit with Anthon's, Suydams, Astors, and Livingstones, was an idea they never entertained for a moment, and would have rejected with disgust as a radical, socialistic theory, calculated to destroy the whole social system, and bring Red Republicanism into vogue directly.

Nay, had one brought before them, as a case of to-day, the child of the carpenter, born in a manger, not the celestial calm of Mary's spotless brow, not the far-seeking melancholy of her Son's divine eyes, or the grave dignity of Joseph's aspect, framed in the blue Syrian skies and the low brown outline of the hills of Bethlehem, could have moved one thought of humanity in those frigid souls! The choiring heavens and the adoring Magi, with all their gold and frankincense, would scarce have indorsed for this business man's notice the lofty claims of a homeless mechanic—a man despised, rejected, and poor!

They believed in the Bible after Dr. Sopus's teachings, as a book indeed divine, but dealing with historic sinners and publicans of a legendary nature; people isolated for examples, types of a class confined to Bible times and theories. The Magdalen of Palestine, breaking her box of ointment with the lavish waste of a gratitude that is too rich for any expression, was by no means an unmentionable woman; but the Magdalen of to-day, flaunting in silken sin, tawdry and impenitent, was another and a despicable creature, not to be named by the pure; beyond hope, below charity! The thief on the cross, raised to God's paradise, consoled them with hope of a late repentance should death appall at the last, and furnished a text for consolation and edification to Dr. Sopus when his richest pew-holder, Herman Van Slyp, died and gave no sign, except asking to have the Bible put under his head by way of easing his position; but the thief in the Tombs was only a scoundrel to be sequestered for the good of other people, as incapable of paradise as of piety—a practical illustration of the doctrine of reprobation. And the idea of Nelly Rivers, their dear, pretty, delicate Nelly, betaking herself to holes and corners only fit for poor people in order to help and comfort them! This was a shock not easily endured by the Anthons. Why couldn't she let other people do it? There were plenty of persons of a lower class whose business it was to see to such things: city authorities, police, nuns, old maids, city missionaries. Why should Mrs. Rivers soil her fingers by contact with such pollution?

But argument and displeasure were vain with Nelly. Harry did not attempt to interfere with these pursuits of hers further than to see that a servant always accompanied her into the haunts of sin and misery she threaded day after day, preaching the Gospel in her sweet smile and kind words, as the Gospel should be preached to the poor—a living and loving "good news" to man, through men, from God! And as long as Harry approved Nelly held on her way. Many a ragged child clung to her skirt with such smiles as only wretched children know—the very sunburst of gratitude and worship. Many a poor woman welcomed her as the only bright thing life had left for her—the only door of hope; and more than one, fallen beyond woman's touch or man's pity, died with her head on Nelly Rivers's shoulder, learning Christ's pity from Christ's child: forgiven of God, and forgiven of women by one woman whose viaticum and extreme unction were but the touch of pure lips to the death-damp brow, and the words of her Master breathed into the dying ear, "Go, and sin no more!"

Strange enough it continued to be to Mrs. Anthon that Nelly should take pleasure in these things rather than in gayety, dress, and amusement. She did not recollect her "pastoral" training, nor did she see in her heart the ever-fresh and renewing love for Jesus that made His words her dear and sacred commission, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto Me"—words that lingered on her lips always, and sounded in her thought whenever she fed, or clothed, or comforted another, or laid her hands upon the dying head of one out of those myriads He left for us to serve, so serving Him.

Something of a separation these different tastes made between Nelly and her aunt; nothing more than a chilly atmosphere clinging to Mrs. Anthon, and a delicate shade of disapproval that clouded her face whenever Mrs. Rivers referred to her work in any way. So Nelly learned to be silent before her aunt; and Mrs. Anthon chose to forget what she could not prevent, and content herself with her usual donations to societies—the only proper and respectable means of charity!

Nearly two years had stolen away since Harry Rivers's marriage, and it drew near to winter, finding Nelly in a state of excitement rather unusual for the little lady; but she meant this year to carry a great point, and was wonderfully in earnest about it. For the year before Nelly's soul had been shocked by the stupidest Christmas that ever she could remember. Her father, unlike New England clergymen generally, had always made this festival a celebration in his house; and Nelly's earliest remembrance was of her biggest stocking crowded full with delightfully suggestive bumps and lumps, tied to the bed-post in company with Tom's, and affording such food for the imagination in the gray dawn, as she conscientiously lay in bed, making all the noise she could without speaking, since it was forbidden to wake her little brother before due season. Then came later recollections of Tom's school and college days, when the pretty German tree stood in stead of the two stockings, and neighbors came in to gather its gay fruit and stare at its tinted tapers; when Tom brought home his chum from college, and Nelly had her dearest friend from next door; when there were vast exchanges of worsted-work, needle-work, and sugar-plums; bitter sarcasms in the shape of cigars that always burned but never were lighted, and false mustaches manufactured from the spaniel's curls; when Tom retorted on these cutting gifts with a present of a spelling-book (for Nelly never did spell quite right), and crushed the dearest friend into silence by the irony of a rattle-box! Oh! how different those funny, merry, uproarious days, that left them all tired with laughter and sleepy from mere "eye-exercise"—how altogether different from that first Christmas-dinner at Mr. Anthon's! Stately, formal, proper; where the very turkey looked as if it had resigned itself to the spit in decent fortitude, and the cranberry-jelly never dared to quiver in its exquisite moulding, or the ice-cream to swerve from its uprightness for one slippery moment; where Mrs. Anthon appeared in black velvet and a Honiton cap, and Mr. Anthon in severe broadcloth of incredible fineness; where Harry insisted on his wife's being uncomfortable in a blue brocade, her hair screwed up to the last degree of smoothness and fixity by "the" hair-dresser, and her warm soft hands gloved in immaculate kid—simply because it was Christmas! and Paul Herring, an ancient bachelor of sixty, Mr. Anthon's partner, was there to dinner, wherefore the junior partner's wife must do honor to the firm. Never would Nelly endure such another Christmas! never again would she undergo that dreadful formal presentation of gifts, however costly they might be, that came on with the dessert like a polite insult!

No; her soul was set on a merry Christmas in the very face and eyes of the Anthon's, and already, in November, the preparations began. Peyser's and Doubet's were ransacked for material and devices; comical German toys hunted up from out-of-the-way shops; tapers and a tree engaged; and in the delightful hurry of such a work Nelly almost forgot some of her poor people. Not quite! The greatest difficulty in her way was to find some gift for her aunt that should be apt or odd enough to awake her, if only for a moment, from her habitual chilly apathy; and how to do this put Nelly at her wit's end.

About a week before Christmas she went out one bitter, snowy day to carry some warm clothing to a sick woman, down in one of the lower streets of the city, and, as usual, took Cæsar with her to carry the bundle. Arrived at the house, she went up its long, dingy stairway, and pausing for breath a moment at the end of the third flight, heard voices in Mrs. Tucker's room, or rather a voice, that made her suppose her errand had been forestalled by some other lady, so gentle and refined were the tones. Her tap at the door was answered by the invalid's own nasal "Come in!" and entering, she found no visitor, but a young woman seated by Mrs. Tucker, evidently a foreigner, and holding in her arms a sleeping child. Mrs. Rivers was extremely struck with the woman's face. It was fresh with youth, but of that grave, serious beauty that we dream of as the Spanish type—a pure oval outline; deep-cut features; eyes dark and full of expression, now just shining with unfallen tears; and a profusion of black and glossy hair, coiled at the back of a noble head, set on her round, full throat with a certain haughty grace, that ill-matched her dress of printed cotton, and the coarse soft shawl in which she had wrapped her baby.

As Nelly approached Mrs. Tucker the stranger left her seat, and, so softly as not to wake her child, disappeared into an adjoining room. So after listening to a twenty-minute account of the last fit of rheumatism and the bad dreams of her patient, Mrs. Rivers had full chance to inquire who the young woman was whom she had found there, and learned she was a Mexican by birth, who had married an American, and coming home with him the vessel had been wrecked off Cape Fear, crew and passengers rescued by a Havana steamer, on board which her husband had been seized with a violent fever, and was carried from the ship to the hospital, where he had lain raving for five days. One of the hospital surgeons procured a lodging for the wife and child in a room next to Mrs. Tucker's, miserable enough in aspect, but clean and capable of warmth, and cheap enough to recommend itself to the finances of its inhabitant, who had only rescued from the wreck a heavy gold rosary and a small diamond ring, both of which happened to be on her person at the time, and the sale of which furnished all the pittance she had to look to for support till her husband should recover, if indeed he lived.

After hearing the story Nelly at once resolved to visit the poor young wife, and see what could be done for her. So tapping at the door, she introduced herself, and was received as one lady might receive another, the Mexican speaking English fluently, with only a charming foreign accent, that was rather a fascination than a fault. Mrs. Rivers was slightly at a loss how to offer her services, so much like one of her own station appeared in the manner and aspect of the young woman; but happily for both the baby awoke, and stretching its arms toward its mother with a rosy smile, at once captivated Nelly, and gave her something to speak of cordially and naturally. No wonder; for the baby was a beautiful creature: every dimpled limb shaped like those of a statue; fair hair curling about a grand head in those soft rings that are the secret pride of mothers and nurses; great dark eyes full of innocent gravity; and a mouth nobody could help kissing, least of all little Mrs. Rivers, who got down on her knees at once to the baby, kissed and coaxed and adored it, till its mother's cheek glowed with pleasure; and the boy's mouth dimpled into smiles, and its fair arms went out toward Nelly with an appeal that brought the tears to her eyes—it seemed as if the little creature asked for help!

There was no reserve after this between Nelly and the baby's mamma. She found out that they were not yet destitute, but were in a fair way to need both aid and counsel, for but little money remained to "Mrs. Antonio," as Mrs. Tucker Americanized the stranger's title; and it was hardly possible that her husband would be able to work for months, and improbable enough that she, a perfect stranger in the city, could have found any thing to do for herself but for the timely appearance of Mrs. Rivers.

But by the time Nelly had found out all this, as well as her protégé's capacity for embroidering—the only reliance she had for her support—it was late enough to bring the visit to an end; and after another earnest kissing, little Pedro's arms were unclasped from Nelly's neck, and Cæsar roused from his meditations outside the door, where he had been wondering for some time if his young mistress meant to stay till dark!

As for Mrs. Rivers, she pursued her way homeward in a most charming state of mind. Here, now, was a real adventure! Most poor people on her list were dirty, stupid, and ungrateful; and though neither of these small failings stood in the way of her patient charity, still it was refreshing to find a woman, like the poor people in books, beautiful and refined, and delicately distressed, not degraded, by want. As if a man weeding a wide field, in the midst of nettles, pig-weed, and cockle, should find a China rose full of bloom!

Of course there was a great deal of embroidery needed directly in Nelly's own wardrobe, and the next day she loaded Cæsar with another large bundle, and went again to see Mrs. Antonio. What passed on this visit it would be rather premature to declare just now. Suffice it to say that about dusk, just as Mr. Harry Rivers had pulled off his boots and seated himself before the fire in his own room, waiting for dinner and his wife, the latter institution rushed into the apartment in her walking dress, frantically embraced her astounded husband, thereby smashing into utter confusion such a love of a French hat, and then executed a waltz about the room that nothing but the friendly circumference of her hoops put an end to, since, after leveling three chairs, they at last caught on a small table, and put a sudden period to her revolutions. Harry by this time had risen to his feet, and having run his fingers through his hair to no purpose, now stood with both hands in his pockets, staring at his wife.

"What on earth ails you, Nelly?" said he, when the hoop limitation brought her literally to a stand.

"Oh, Harry!" was the breathless answer with which Madame pulled from her muff a little dirty, worn Testament, and opening it at the fly-leaf, thrust it in her husband's face, for want of breath to say more. Certainly some spell assailed both these young people—some magic of the season—for Harry Rivers turned white and then red, caught his pretty little wife up in his arms, set her carefully down in a big chair, and asked her twenty questions in a string; after which his boots speedily replaced the slippers, Cæsar was sent for a carriage, Mrs. Anthon heard they were going out to dinner, and the pair disappeared till somewhere about ten o'clock, when they came back in a more composed state of mind, said they had been dining with some friends at the Brevoort House, and made no farther revelations of any kind.

The few days between that and Christmas Eve passed rapidly enough to most people, but

Mrs. Nelly thought no days had ever dragged so slow a course. At length it came, much at the usual time; and all day Nelly glowed, and dimpled, and laughed, and sung, and said, "Oh dear!" at least fifty times, till Mrs. Anthon really thought her growing a little hysterical, and regretted having ever given her cold consent to this business of a Christmas-tree.

But it was too late now. At eight o'clock the dining-room door opened and the sparkling, glittering, gay-fruited boughs of fir compelled approbation from both Uncle and Aunt Anthon; but Nelly could not wait to hear them admire. She laid her hand on her aunt's.

"Come, aunty, come! I want you to get your present quick!"

Mr. Anthon followed, both roused and amused by the spectacle and a certain keen excitement that thrilled in Nelly's tone. Under the tree stood the conventional cradle, but not this time of sugar or trinketry. No! a veritable child's cradle, from which Mrs. Rivers lifted the delicate vail, and there lay a beautiful child, sleeping tranquilly in the softest folds of cambric and embroidery. Mrs. Anthon looked thunder-struck. Nelly bestowed upon her one energetic hug, and cried out, between tears and laughter,

"Oh! Aunt Anthon, that's Peter the Third!—that's your own boy's baby!"

Really there wasn't any scene to describe!

Only a few shy tears and a great many explanations; but in half an hour after Mrs. Anthon had the baby in her lap, and Peter's wife beside her, in the parlor up stairs; while Mr. Anthon and Harry were gone off to the hospital, and Nelly was down stairs economically putting out the Christmas tapers, and laughing to herself to think how nobody had noticed any thing at all after the first glimpse of Master Peter.

Peter Anthon had been captured by the Mexicans first, and then by Juanita, and was coming home, after the dear old fashion of the Prodigal, when fever smote him on shipboard. The rest of the story we have told; for, dear reader, you are brilliant enough to guess that Nelly found his name in the Testament just in time to achieve her little plan. And Nelly had her own reward, for nobody ever said a word against her going to see the poor ever again, and Christmas was always kept in her own fashion; though years after, when not only grandchildren, but grandnieces and nephews rifled the gracious boughs, and played all sorts of tricks off with impunity in that very house, that had somehow changed its aspect as utterly as its old rulers had changed theirs, old Mrs. Anthon would now and then put her hand on her steady, handsome son's shoulder, and say,

"They're very sweet children, Peter!—Nelly's and yours, too—but there isn't one of them to compare with my Christmas Present!"

THE POET'S SECRET.

THE poet's secret I must know,
If that will calm my restless mind.
I hail the seasons as they go,
I woo the sunshine, brave the wind.

I scan the lily and the rose,
I nod to every nodding tree,
I follow every stream that flows,
And wait beside the rolling sea.

I question melancholy eyes,
I touch the lips of women fair;
Their lips and eyes may make me wise,
But what I seek for is not there.

In vain I watch the day and night,
In vain the world through space may roll;
I never see the mystic light,
Which fills the poet's happy soul.

To hear through life a rhythm flow,
And into song its meaning turn—
The poet's secret I must know:—
By pain and patience shall I learn?

THE ATOMS OF CHLADNI.

GUSTAV MOHLER, the once celebrated inventor and mathematician, died last year (1858) in a private lunatic asylum. His wife, more accomplished than her husband, even in his best days, has also departed. The peace of God and the love of all went with her. To disclose the causes of Mohler's alienation from her, and of the insanity which overtook him soon after, will offend no man's pride, no woman's vanity. I wish, as a friend of Madam Mohler, to justify her. None who enjoyed her splendid hospitality or the delights of her conversation will be displeased with me for the attempt.

My first interview with Mohler was preconcerted by my friend P——, the savant. This was in the winter of 1854. We three met by appointment in a public library. My friend had been deceived by the serene enthusiasm of the inventor, and believed that he could communicate some valuable secrets. We sat at a round table in an alcove of the library inspecting plans and diagrams. For an hour the inventor explained, calculated; plunged into abysses of constructive dynamics; his voice sounded drearily, under the Gothic hollows of the room. The old folios of alchemy and philosophy, twin children of ignorance, that cumbered three sides of the alcove where we sat listening to this madman, seemed at last to nod and shake, in sympathy with his wild, interminably worded digressions. It was like the clown fighting with the hoop; intellect struggling in a vicious circle, maddened with its own exertion.

The enthusiast seemed to be between thirty and forty years of age; well formed, well dressed; a gentleman in manners. His voice and address were mild and insinuating, but the feeling he inspired most was compassion. His inventions were for the most part mere lunacies, violating every mechanical law. The instinct of common sense, a suspicion that he might be wrong, made him appear timid in his statements. He deferred to P——'s superior knowledge; asked him to point out the errors; smiled sadly when P—— intimated, with some asperity, his contempt for the whole matter.

I would willingly have talked to Mohler about himself, but his personal reserve repelled sympathy. He begged P—— to look farther into the invention (a new motive power); said that something might have escaped him in the calculations; but that, "as all these things were imparted to him by spiritual communication, he dared not abandon the research."

"Spirits," replied P——, with one of his cutting scientific laughs, "will not enable you to circumvent God; and it is He, the Maker of the universe, who condemns your invention. It would wreck the universe."

Mohler replied, meekly, that "he should be grieved to think that his spirit-friends had deceived him." He then drew me aside, and with a gleaming look askance at P——, who remained yawning and fretting over the table, "He," said

Mohler, "is a materialist; but in you I have confidence." He then alluded to another invention of his own, which, he said, had been perfected by evil spirits, and had ruined him.

The eyes of the lunatic dilated, and a visible tremor shook his frame, as he described the machine. "It was a means," he said, "to discover falsehood and treachery." The spirit of Chladni communicated that to him—Chladni, the Frenchman who discovered the dancing of the atoms. "It is the same," he said, "in the atoms of the brain; they vibrate in geometrical forms, which the soul reads."

P——, who had been watching us, alarmed at the maniacal excitement of Mohler, interrupted our conversation and hurried me away. Though the froth of madness had gathered upon his lips, the unfortunate inventor had still power enough over himself to show, in leave-taking, the urbanity of a gentleman.

As P—— and I left the library together, I expressed a wish to learn something of the previous life of Gustav Mohler. P—— said I was over-curious in such matters; for his part, the history of a madman was, of all, least entertaining, and useful only to those intelligent but unhappy persons who have charge of asylums. Of Gustav Mohler he neither knew nor desired to know any thing farther, and regretted the hour wasted in his company; which had delayed an important analysis of earths in which he was about to engage that day, in company with Professor M. "I suppose," he added, with a half sneer, "you are seeking characters for a novel, and you fancy the history of this creature might furnish you a high-seasoned dish of the horrible."

And so we parted, in no very good humor with each other—I to my meditations, he to his earths.

Several months had passed, after this interview, before my accomplished and practical friend, the savant, saw fit to honor me with a visit. One cold, rainy night in November of the succeeding year I heard his firm, quick step in the hall. There was a knock, and the door of my room opened intrusively.

The savant stood in the door-way, his sharp nose peering under a glazed hat, and his form made shapeless by an ungainly water-proof cloak against the wind and rain of the night.

"Ah!" said he, "you are a fixture, I fear, by the fireside. But if you have courage to face this storm, I have a pleasure to propose."

"Come in; lay off your storm armor, and we will talk about your pleasure."

He complied in the hasty, discontented manner peculiar to him, threw his wet hat and cloak over a table covered with books and papers, and drew a chair.

"You will go with me," he said, authoritatively, "to Charles Montague's this evening."

"Forty-second Street—through a northeasterly storm! Be wise—I have ordered whisky and hot water, with lemons." I rang the bell.

Professor P—— had a weakness for punch, especially when I made it. He acquiesced, with a sigh.

"We can go late," said he. "There is to be a meeting of rare people. At least two entomologists, an antiquarian, and a collector of curiosities from Germany, who has a tourmalin which I must steal or buy; it is yellow, or rather gold-colored. Then there will be a woman there—a Mrs. Bertaldy, American; a wonder of science, whom you must see."

"P——, you are a fool. Scientific women are more odious to me than womanish men. The learning of a woman is only a desperate substitute for some lost attraction."

"Very true, perhaps; I will think about that: but Mrs. Bertaldy is a beautiful, not to say a fascinating woman; only thirty years of age—rich, independent, and a delightful conversationalist."

"Hum! a widow?"

"Yes, at least I am so informed."

"A friend of the Montagues?"

"They vouch for her."

"And an American, you say?"

"Yes, with a foreign name—assumed, I suppose, to avoid some unpleasant recollections; scientific women, you know, have these things happen to them. Husband dead, and no children. Charles Montague swears that it is so; his wife protests it is so; and, of course, it must be so."

"Another glass, and I am with you. We will visit the Montagues, and talk with Mrs. Bertaldy; but if you oblige me to listen to any of your alchemists or virtuosi, I promise to insult them."

My first ten minutes' conversation with Mrs. Bertaldy was a disappointment. She was of the quiet school of manners, low-voiced, and without gesture or animation. Her features were regular, well formed, rather dark, with just the merest trace of sadness.

The difference between mediocrity in a woman and the mean of perfection is not instantly visible, unless to very fine observers. Mrs. Bertaldy made no impression at the first view, but I found myself returning often to speak with her. Her talk was neither apophthegm, argument, nor commentary; it was a kind of sympathetic music. She bore her part in the concert of good words in a subdued and tasteful manner, putting in a note of great power and sweetness here and there, when there was a rest or silence.

P—— was dissatisfied. Mrs. Bertaldy took no part in the noisy and tedious discussions of the savans. On our way home he pronounced her "a humbug—a false reputation." I, on the contrary, resolved to cultivate the acquaintance. It was agreeable. P—— sees no points but the salient, in men or things; he is merely a naturalist.

My new acquaintance was domiciled with the Montagues, and I soon became an expected visitor and friend of their guest. Not, I beg to have it understood, in the manner of a lover, or wife hunter, but simply of one seeking agreeable society. The fastidious Montague and his good lady were impenetrable about the "antecedents" of Mrs. Bertaldy; but they treated her with a confidence and respect which satisfied me that her previous history was known to them, and that their sentiments toward her were grounded in esteem. They seemed to be afraid of losing a word of hers, when she was conversing. Her knowledge was various and positive, but she spoke of things and persons as if each were a feeling more than an object. I was not long in discovering that a part of the charm of Mrs. Bertaldy's society lay in the graceful and kind attention with which she listened. She encouraged one to talk, and shaped and turned conversation with an easy power.

One morning in April, while we were enjoying the first warm air of spring, and the odor of flowers, in Montague's magnificent conservatory—the windows open to the south, and the caged birds cheering and whistling to each other amidst the orange-trees—I was describing a garden in the South; my language was apt and spontaneous. The lady listened with her delightful manner of pleased attention.

She was certainly a beautiful woman!

Her eyes dwelt upon mine, when, by I know not what association, the vision of the spirit-haunted enthusiast rose before me, and I was silent.

Mrs. Bertaldy became pale, and gazing on my face with an expression of terror, she exclaimed, "You were thinking of him. How strange!"

"Yes," I said; "but do you know of whom I am thinking?"

"He is no longer living," she replied; "and we may now speak of him without wrong."

"Of Mohler, the enthusiast?"

"The same."

"How came you to know it was he I thought of?"

"You need not be surprised. We have been much together, and though you have not named Mohler—he was my husband—you have made remarks and allusions which convinced me that you at least knew him, if not his history."

"True, I have spoken of his inventions, and often wished they were real and possible."

"And your allusions have made me shudder. Mohler was mad. You will think me mad, I am afraid, if I assure you that some of his inventions, the most wonderful of all, were perfected and applied before his reason left him."

"You were, then, the wife of this man?" I said, with a feeling of compassion.

"Yes. Our parents were foreign, though Gustav and I were born and educated in America."

"Will you tell me something of this marriage?" said I, touched with deep interest.

She sighed, but after a moment's meditation spoke with her usual manner.

"We were united by our parents. Mohler was in his twenty-first year; I but seventeen. We had no children; we were rich, educated, luxurious. Mohler addicted himself to inventions,

I to society. He faded into a recluse; I became a woman of the world. Our home was divided against itself. We occupied a double house in D— Street. One half was reserved by Mohler for himself and his mechanics; the other half by me for my friends and visitors, whom he seldom saw. Within five years after our marriage I was left to my own guidance. Our parents died. Fearing the wasteful expenditure of Mohler on his strange inventions, they willed their property exclusively to me. Their fears for him were well-founded. On the anniversary of the seventh year of our marriage, at midnight, after a musical entertainment—I was then passionately fond of music—Mohler entered my chamber, which he had not visited for a year. He closed the door, locked it quietly, drew a chair to the bedside, facing me, and seated himself.

“‘Maria Bertaldy,’ he said, after a silence which I took pains not to break, ‘we are no longer man and wife.’

“‘I made no reply. My heart did not go out, as formerly, to meet him.

“‘My name is not yours,’ he added.

“‘No? And why, Gustav?’

“‘My lawyer is about to furnish me with evidence which will make our continued union impossible.’

“‘Your lawyer!’ I exclaimed, starting up, involuntarily. ‘My friend, Raymond Bonsall?’

“‘Your friend, Maria! Has he deceived me? Forgive me if I have wronged you. My soul is dark sometimes.’

“‘There was a manner so wretched and pleading with what he said, I could not forbear pity. His dress was soiled; his hair hung in elf locks; his eyes were bloodshot with glowering over furnace-fires. The poisonous fume of the crucible had driven the healthy tinge from his face, and given it the hue of parchment.

“‘It is many a long year,’ said I, ‘since you have looked at me with kindness.’

“‘I have deserved,’ he answered, ‘to lose your affection; but you should have taken better care of my honor and your own.’

“‘The guardianship of both seems to have been transferred to your lawyer.’

“‘I may believe, then, that you are indifferent in regard to that?’

“‘You may believe what you will. I have been long enough my own guardian to look to no one for advice or protection.’

“‘You are rich.’

“‘That is a consolation, truly. I am thus not without means of defense—more fortunate than most women.’

“‘And I have nothing but that of which you have been willing to deprive me.’

“‘Your accusations—more especially as you are the last person who is entitled to make them—I repel with contempt. For your loss of fortune, miserably expended in futileities, I am deeply grieved. If you are in need of money for your personal expenses, take freely of mine.’

“‘I am in debt.’

“‘How much?’

“‘He named a large sum. I rose, and going to the escritoir, wrote an order for the amount. He followed me. The tears were streaming from his eyes. Kneeling at my feet, he seized my hands and covered them with kisses.

“‘I had formerly entertained an affectionate regard for Gustav. We were at one time playmates, friends. Regret made me look kindly upon him.’

“‘He caught eagerly at the indication.

“‘I will not rise, Maria,’ he said, ‘until you have forgiven the cruel accusation. So much goodness and generosity can not proceed from a faithless or dishonored wife.’

“‘You judge truly, my husband.’

“‘He rose from his knees, still holding my hands in both of his.

“‘You have saved me,’ he said, ‘by your liberality. Grant me still another favor: let the reconciliation be perfect.’

“‘Any thing for a better life; but only on one condition can you and I live happily, as at first.’

“‘And that is—?’

“‘That you change your occupation—give up these wild researches—spare your body and your soul, and live as other men do, in simplicity.’

“‘But,’ said he, stammering, ‘I have an invention of incalculable value. To give it up now would be to lose the labor of years.’

“‘And this other favor is—?’

“‘I must have means to continue my work.’

“‘I will not furnish you with the means of self-destruction.’

“‘Limit me. Your income is large; you will hardly miss what I require.’

“‘For how long?’

“‘One year. I shall then have perfected what will immortalize and enrich me. Pity me, Maria! We have no children. You have your pleasures and pursuits; I, only this; and this you deny me!’ he exclaimed, with a slight bitterness, so artfully mingled with affection and repentance, my heart gave way. I consented.

“‘Gustav was not without personal beauty or manliness of character. He now studied again to please my tastes. We resumed our former relations. Though his days were devoted to labor, his evenings were given to me and my guests. His cheerfulness seemed to have returned. I was so happy in the change, I allowed him to draw from me large sums. My fortune was still ample; and I looked forward to the happy ending of the appointed year.

“‘You are doubtless surprised that I could so easily forgive his accusations. Satisfied that Raymond Bonsall, the lawyer, who had persecuted me, before the reconciliation, with unsolicited attentions, was the originator and cause of Mohler’s suspicions, I had dismissed the subject from my thoughts. Indeed, my happiness expelled revengeful passions, even against Bonsall himself. As the friend of Gustav, I received him with courtesy, and he continued an accepted member of the refined and elegant society with which it was our good fortune to be surrounded.

"With surprising address Bonsall changed his plan. As before he had been secretly attentive, now he was openly and constantly devoted, but shunned me when alone.

"Bonsall's influence over Mohler became, at last, absolute and inscrutable. It did not satisfy me to hear them repeat, often and openly, that they were partners in the invention; that Bonsall had purchased an interest; and that they consulted together daily on its progress. Anxiety led me to observe them. Daily, at a certain hour in the afternoon, Bonsall entered the house and passed into the lower work-shop. There he would remain a while, and then retire. In the evening he appeared often in the drawing-room, and never failed to make himself agreeable to our friends.

"The instinct of a woman, correct in appreciating character and motives, fails always in sounding the complicated and strategic depth of masculine perfidy. I soon knew that Bonsall had become my enemy, and that his ultimate purpose was to avenge my repulses and defeat my reconciliation with Mohler; but the singularity and constancy of his behavior—attentive in public, and reserved and cautious when alone with me—together with the pains he used to create for himself relations more and more intimate with my husband, puzzled and confused me.

"'Could it be,' thought I, 'that his public attentions, so embarrassing and yet so blameless; his watchfulness of my desires, when others could see them as well as he, are to impress a belief that his private relations are too intimate?'

"The suspicion gave me excessive uneasiness. I gradually broke the matter to Mohler; but he assured me I was mistaken; that Bonsall suffered remorse for the injury he had inflicted upon both of us; that our reconciliation alone consoled him; that Bonsall was his adviser in the invention, which already, at the eighth month of the stipulated period, had nearly reached perfection. His tenderness quieted my fears, and I too easily believed him.

"Soon after he proposed certain changes in the architecture and furniture of my apartments. His reasons seemed to me satisfactory and kind. I vacated the rooms for a month, leaving him to improve and alter. He wished to give me a surprise. The apartment was large, with a dressing-room and ante-chamber. These were refitted under Mohler's direction; after which, in company with a few friends, we visited the new rooms.

"The ceiling had been made slightly concave; in the centre was a large oval mirror. This mirror, so strangely placed overhead, excited general admiration. Bonsall was, or pretended to be, in raptures with it. I observed that the mirror, beautifully fair and polished, was not of glass, but of a metal resembling silver.

"From this brilliant centre-piece radiated panels exquisitely carved, with frescoes of graceful and simple design. The carpets, wall mirrors, fountain, statuettes, jewel and book-cases, tapestries, tinted and curtained windows, all were perfectly elegant, and fresh with living colors in harmonious combination.

"In the centre of the ceilings of the dressing-room and ante-chambers were smaller mirrors of the same metal. This new style of ornament, supported by adequate elegances, and a perfection of detail of which I had never before seen the parallel, occupied continual notice and remark. Some criticised and laughed, but the most admired; for the beauty of the effect was undeniable.

"I was surprised and delighted at the results of my husband's labors. That Mohler, a great inventor and mechanic, was also a master of design, I had always believed. With the genius of Benvenuto Cellini he united a philosophical intellect, and by long years of research in the metallurgic arts had acquired extraordinary tact. In the least details of the work of these rooms there was novelty and beauty; though, with the sole exception of the metal mirrors, I observed nothing absolutely new in material.

"Mohler did not fail to observe, and turn to his own advantage, my gratification and surprise. He at once sought and obtained leave from me to occupy a suit of apartments next above mine, in exchange for others on his side of the house, which, he said, were too dark and narrow for his purpose.

"I sent immediately for my housekeeper, ordered the change to be made, and the keys given to the master.

"By a tacit understanding we had never intruded upon each other. I had not penetrated the privacy of Mohler's work-rooms, where certain confidential artisans labored night and day; nor had he overstepped the limit on my side of the house. He breakfasted, and generally dined, in his atelier, superintending operations which required a constant oversight.

"For more than two months after the completion of my own apartments I was disturbed day and night by noises of repairs and changes going on above. Mohler assured me that this would not continue; that he had perfected and was erecting the delicate machinery of his invention.

"Want of curiosity is, I believe, a greater fault than the excess of it. I am naturally inquisitive. It did not irritate my fancy to remain in ignorance of secrets that did not seem to concern me. My husband and I lived together in a manner that was at least satisfactory. Our affection was only an agreeable friendship, such as many consider the happiest relation that can exist between husband and wife. Our too early and hasty marriage had kept us in ignorance of the joys and miseries dreamed of and realized only by mature and long-expectant passion.

"You will not suppose that life was therefore tedious or fruitless. My parents had given me a full and judicious education. I could speak and write several languages. Mature and difficult studies—philosophy, natural history, and even astronomy—established for me relations of amity with learned and accomplished men. I wrote verse and prose, attempted plays, observed and sympathized with political movements. In order to perfect myself in languages, I cultivated the admirable art of phonography, and would sometimes fix in writing the rapid and brilliant repartees of accomplished persons, who could forget my presence in the excitement of conversation. I learned to prefer the living to the written word. Literature for me was only a feeble reflection of reality; for I have never found in books that vivacity, that grace, that unfolding of the interior life, which makes social converse the culmination of all that is excellent and admirable.

"At the expiration of the year Mohler announced the completion of his grand work, which he had been seven years in perfecting. I thought he would have told me its purpose; but with a cold and embarrassed manner he presented me with a check upon his banker, just equal to the sum of all I had advanced to him during the year. His behavior was mortifying, and even alarming. I noticed a gradual change in the manners and conversation of Bonsall. He assumed airs of authority. Mohler gradually withdrew himself, and began to be reserved and serious; criticising my conduct, friends, principles, and tastes. More mysterious still was the gradual loss and defection of my most valued female acquaintances. My parlors were gradually deserted. Old friends dropped away. It was as though I had become suddenly poor, when, in fact, my wealth and magnificence of living had increased. Persons of good name no longer responded to or returned my invitations. I was alone with my wealth, dispossessed of its power and its enjoyments.

"I knew that Bonsall continued to visit the friends who had deserted me. He still frequented our house, was daily closeted with my husband, and treated me now with a careless indifference. Mohler, on the other hand, withdrew until he and I were completely separated. We no longer spoke to or even saw each other. My servants became insolent; I procured others, who, in their turn, insulted me. I grew careless of externals; lived retired, occupied with books and music. Through these I acquired fortitude to resist the contempt of the world. My knowledge increased. These sad months, interrupted by short visits to the country, produced no change in my social or marital relations, but gave me an inward strength and consolation which since then has served me like an arm of God whereon one may lean and sleep.

"While these changes were succeeding I enjoyed a source of consolation which I need only name and you will appreciate it; that was the correspondence of Charles Montague, then in Europe. He had been the friend and counselor of my parents, and continued his goodness to me after their death. I confided to him all my troubles, giving him each month a written narrative of events. He replied always in general terms, mentioning no names, and giving advice in such a form that it could be understood by no person but myself. This was a just precaution, for I had discovered a system of espionage which Bonsall and my husband maintained over me, a part of which was the inspection of private papers.

"Gradually all my valuable papers, receipts, copies of deeds, important correspondence with the agents who had charge of my large and increasing property, Montague's letters, my private journal, were abstracted. I made no complaint, trusted no person with my secrets.

"At the expiration of this year of estrangement and solitude, in the fall, Montague returned from Europe with his family, and fitted up this house. Mrs. M. I had not known until then. Neither of them had visited at my house, nor were they on terms of intimacy with any of my friends. Even Bonsall was a stranger to Montague, and Mohler had disliked and avoided him. Plain sense and honesty ran counter to his dreamy vanity.

"I was received by the Montagues with great kindness. I found the lady, as you have, intelligent and amiable, and the man himself become, from a mere guardian of my property, a warm and devoted friend. I consumed almost an entire day in narrating what had passed between myself, Bonsall, my husband, servants, and acquaintances.

"Montague made minutes, and compared the narrative with my correspondence.

"'I am convinced,' he said, 'that there is a conspiracy; but whether your life and property, or merely a divorce, is the object, can not be determined without some action on your part. Find out the purpose of the changes that have been made in your apartments, and by all means visit and inspect those that are above you. You must do this for and by yourself. You are observing and not easily intimidated. You have a right to use any means that may be convenient—to pick locks, force open doors, seize and inspect papers, bribe servants, and in other ways defend yourself and obtain advantages over the enemy. Count no longer upon the good-will or affection of Mohler. He is resolved to sacrifice you and possess himself of your property, but is still at a loss for evidence.'

"With these words Montague concluded his advice. He then led me to a front window, and pointed to a dark figure in the shadow on the opposite side of the street.

"'That person,' said Montague, 'is certainly a spy employed by Mohler and Bonsall. He arrived at the same moment with yourself, has passed the house many times, and now watches for your departure. He has an understanding with your coachman. I saw them conversing in the area about noon.'

"It was late, and I proposed to return home. Montague and his wife wished me to pass the night with them. 'But first,' said Charles, 'we will amuse ourselves a little with the spy.' He took pistols from a drawer, went out by the basement, and returned in a few moments to the study, where Mrs. M. and I were sitting, driving in the spy before him.

"Now, Sir," said Charles, 'sit you down and tell your story. Out with it. You are employed by Bonsall and Mohler to watch this lady.'

"The man grinned, nodded, and seated himself quietly near the door, much in the manner of a cat preparing to run.

"This person," said Montague to us, 'is a volunteer detective, employed chiefly by weak-minded husbands and jealous wives. You can not insult him. He will voluntarily expose his person to any degree of violence short of maiming or murder. Kicks he pays no heed to. He passes in public for a sporting gentleman, and is, in fact and name, a Vampire. By-the-by, Mr. Crag,' said he, changing his tone, 'you may have forgotten me. You were employed, if I remember right, in the Parkins murder case, were you not?'

"Yes, Sir. You were counsel for defense.'

"Exactly. I think you followed me to my lodgings several times at night, and were shot through the leg for taking so much unnecessary trouble.'

"Yes.'

"Well, Mr. Crag, I caution you that the same, or a worse matter, will happen to you again, if you continue to watch persons entering my house. I may fire upon you.'

"The law will protect me.'

"Not at all. You watch my house; you are not a qualified policeman; you are consequently either a burglar or a conspirator. I can shoot you if I wish. You have admitted that Bonsall and Mohler employed you to watch this lady. Go to the table and write a full testimonial of the fact, or take a lodging in the Tombs to-night. Write dates, facts—all in full.'

"The Vampire did not evince any emotion, but refused to write. After some hesitation, however, he made a general confession of his motives in following and watching myself. It was to the effect that, on the 20th of October, of the year 185-, Raymond Bonsall, lawyer, of New York, and Gustav Mohler had sent for him to the house of said Mohler, and had there proposed to him to watch, follow, and dog the wife of Mohler, at all hours of the day and night, and to employ others to do the same, for the space of one month from that date; and to report all her actions, movements, speech, disguises, the names and occupations of all persons with whom she associated—in short, every particular of her conduct and life; for which they were to give the sum of twenty dollars a day, the half to Crag, and the rest to coachmen and assistants in his employ; that he had been occupied in this work ten days, and had each day given in a written account of his espionage. Crag rose to depart.

"You will see Bonsall and Mohler to-night," said Montague, 'and report to them what has happened.'

"That," said Crag, 'is impossible—they are out of town.'

"Good; then you can not. Please observe that I shall be in possession of Bonsall's papers within a month. If any of yours are found among them you will be terribly handled.'

"How?" said Crag, anxiously.

"I will have you up in the Parkins affair, and some other little matters—the burglary in D Street, for instance, 25th of June.'

"The Vampire's impassible countenance relaxed into a horrible smile. 'I see, Mr. Montague, that you are watching me. I will go; but let her look out. Bonsall has made up his mind; and he's got Swipes—a better man than I; and if they can't convict her of something they'll have her poisoned. Bonsall's a better man than you, Mr. Montague, and he's got the papers.'

"What papers?'

"Proofs against the lady. All kinds. A will, for instance.'

"A forgery?'

"In course; but you can't prove it.'

"How came you to know that?'

"Well, you know Bonsall wanted to get rid of Mohler and marry his widow, years ago. He was afraid to go the common way to work; so he encouraged him in working at his lunatic notions—some kind of machinery that no man ever heard of, thinking it would kill or craze him; but Mohler succeeded, and Bonsall had to lay a new plan. He furnished Mohler with the money to repay the loan he made from his wife. A German chemist Mohler has in his laboratory told me this. He can't speak English, but understands it, and I speak German. Well, Bonsall and Mohler have got a quantity of written evidence against Madam Mohler—a volume of it—all in writing—conversations of hers with some person who visits her room.'

"At this point of Crag's narrative Montague's innocent wife looked at me with a sorrowing and pitiful expression. I paid no heed to it.

"With your permission, Mr. Montague," said I, 'let me continue the examination.'

"He acquiesced.

"Mr. Crag," said I, 'do you believe that I conversed with any person in my room?'

"It's a common thing, marm, and it might be, for aught I know. Mohler believes it; but he is awfully perplexed to know who it was you were talking with. I believe Bonsall knew who it was, but he would not tell Mohler.'

"How came you to be so minutely informed?'

"Why, marm, you must know every profession has its ins and outs; it isn't enough to earn money, you must know how to get it when you have earned it; that is more than half. Now, when I am employed by any party to watch another I watches both; else I couldn't make it pay. I spend half my time watching Mohler and Bonsall, when they suppose I am after you. I thought there was small chance of a conviction, and I wanted to threaten Mohler and Bonsall for conspiracy, and make 'em pay a bonus at the end of the business, afore they gev up.'

"Well?"

"The German chemist, you must know, marm, agreed to divide with me, and will be ready with his evidence when he finds there is nothing more to be made out of Mohler, who agreed to give him a share in the invention, but was obliged to sell the chemist's share to Bonsall."

"What is the invention?"

"I don't know—never could find out. These Germans are naterally mysterious about mechanical and chemical matters, though they'll tell any thing else."

"What was the real purpose of Bonsall?"

"He hated you because you had slighted him. He has forged a will of old Bertaldy, your father. The chemist helped him to do that. This forged will leaves every thing to Mohler instead of yourself, and Mohler has mortgaged all in advance to Bonsall for funds to carry on the work. The chemist says that the invention is worth more than the telegraph; that Mohler is the greatest genius in the world or that ever lived; but, he says, a man without any feelings, marm, only bitter jealous—"

"Had Mohler a hand in the forging of the will?"

"No, that was Bonsall's work; but the other knew of it. He thought that the property should have been left to him to accomplish the "great and beneficial work;" so he called it, meaning the invention. You, madam, he said, spent money in frivolities; he, in doing good to the world."

"Did he or Bonsall converse about my death?"

"No, marm; it is Mohler, I believe, who is to be made away with, if any one—not you; and then Bonsall would find a means to make you marry himself."

"What means?" interposed Montague.

"Why, the common means, I suppose. He'd scare the lady into it. He'd have a pile of evidence against her to hurt her reputation, and women, you know, like the madam, are afraid of that. And there is the forged will in his possession, leaving all the property to Mohler, and Bonsall holding claims and notes covering the estate. In fact, he'd be sure to do it, Sir."

"During the conversation I had written, in phonographic characters, all that had been said. Coming forward, I laid my note-book on the table. 'Mr. Crag,' I said, 'the testimony you have given is written here, word for word. I shall copy it in full, and I expect you to sign your name to it.'"

"Not without pay, marm," replied the Vampire, rising.

"You will remember," said Montague, "that these ladies are witnesses to your demand."

"Black-mail, eh!" chuckled the Vampire. "I never testify unless I am paid, and I never sign."

"It is unnecessary," said I, coming before Crag. "You are one of three engaged in a double conspiracy against Mr. Mohler and myself for life, or money, or both."

"I will dispense with the signature," interposed Montague; "but you must leave the city immediately, or suffer arrest for conspiracy."

"It's a good job," said the Vampire, reflectively, "and I don't like to leave it. Can't you make an offer?—say fifty dollars on account, marm—and I'll keep dark for a month."

"I'm afraid not."

"In that case I can't go."

Montague looked at his wife; she pulled a bell-rope. The sight of Montague's pistol, which he cocked and held ready, kept the Vampire from moving, though he was near the door. A servant entered.

"John, go to Captain Melton, and tell him to send me a good officer."

Fifteen minutes of silence followed, during which time the Vampire neither moved nor spoke. The officer entered, recognized Crag, and took him away.

"The movement of our lives is a tide that floats us on toward an unknown destiny. This we call Providence. It is doubtless the will of God working in events and circumstances. It is rather like the motion of the great globe, moving silent and irresistible through the void of space. We struggle and fret with trifles, while Divinity wafts us onward. All is for the development of the soul; to strengthen, expand, and purify its powers. Grandeur will come hereafter; in this life there is only a nursing germ of goodness and power."

"These thoughts came first into my mind while I sat looking at the miserable face of the Vampire, waiting to be taken away like a rat in a cage. Anger, terror, revenge passed away like a cloud. I hated not Mohler, nor feared the wiles of the demoniacal Bonsall. Montague wished me to remain with him, using his house as an asylum. I thanked him, but declined the offer. He feared for my life. I knew too well the weakness of my enemies to entertain such fears."

Montague imaged to himself, in the secret invention, some unheard-of infernal machine which would take life quietly. He believed that the metallic mirrors fixed in the ceilings of my apartments were a portion of the machinery. I promised that I would not sleep until the mystery of the mirrors had been explained.

"It was the third hour of the morning when I reached home, and entered, as usual, by the side-door of the garden. My servants were junketing in the kitchen. On Mohler's side of the house all was dark, closed, and silent. The conspirators were absent. I passed in unobserved, changed my dress, and went up stairs to the rooms above mine. The doors were locked. The door of the German chemist's room opposite stood ajar. A gas-jet, turned low, as the occupant had left it, guided me to a table. In a small side-drawer were several pass-keys of unusual shape. With one of these I succeeded in entering the machine-room, over my own. After closing the shutters and lighting the burners, I looked around me with a novel sensation of intense curiosity, not unmingled with fear.

"The apartment was of the full depth and width of the house; all the partitions having been removed, and the floors above supported by posts of wood. Over the centre of each room of my apartments, and consequently over each of the three metallic mirrors, stood a table about six feet square, of the usual height, solidly framed, and supporting pieces of machinery—a combination of clock-work, galvanic engines, wires coiled myriads of times around poised, pendent, or vibrating magnets; a microcosm of mechanical powers which it were impossible to describe. The three tables were connected by decuple systems of copper wires suspended from the ceiling by glass rods, and associated with a gang of batteries, sixty in number, arranged in double tiers along the side of the room, ten paces in length. From these came out a sickening fume of acid corrosion, the death and decay of metals. From these, it seemed to me, an electric power might be drawn equal to the lightning in destructive force.

"A shuddering horror seized and shook me as I gazed around upon this vast and gloomy apparatus, which some secret intimation told me had been accumulated and connected here to work for me either death or ruin; but the terror was momentary, and again I addressed myself with courage to the investigation.

"The floor of the apartment had been covered first with moss, and then with thick felt, which deadened the sound of footsteps. Around each of the tables, from their edges, depended three-fold curtains of green baize. I raised one of these curtains, and the light penetrating beneath, revealed the upper surface of the metallic mirror, perfectly polished, of which the lower was a part of the ceiling of my rooms. Points of platina wire, as fine and pliable as spider-webs—perhaps a hundred in number—touched the mirror in a certain regular order, the surface upon which they rested being divided into the same number of mathematical figures, representing, as it seemed to me, the system of vibrations of the plate. The wires were connected above with the complicated magnetic machinery which rested on the table. The same arrangement appeared under each of the three tables.

"Equidistant from the tables, and nearly in the centre of the apartment, stood a wide desk, or writing-table, on which rested another piece of machinery, less complex than the others, but connected with all of them by a system of wires. This was evidently a telegraphic apparatus for the transmission of signals generated by the larger machinery. On the desk lay a record book, and a card marked with phonographic signs, for the use of the operator, corresponding with others upon the signal-wheel, and which were marked by a needle-point on a coil of paper, as in the ordinary telegraph.

"Facing the seat of the operator, on the table, stood a clock marking hours, minutes, and seconds.

"I seated myself at the desk, placed the record before me, and opened it at hazard. It was a journal of months, weeks, days, hours, minutes, and even seconds. There were three hand-writings, giving the dates and moments of making entries. In these I recognized the alternate work of Mohler, Bonsall, and the German.

"Although the writings were phonographic, representing only the elementary sounds of the human voice, I read them easily.

"I had but just begun the perusal of the record when the touch of a cold hand upon my shoulder, like the fingers of a corpse, caused me to spring from my seat with a cry.

"It was Bonsall. He stepped forward as I rose. The short figure of this man, my persecutor, in his slouched hat and traveling cloak, with the eternal saturnine smile, and eyes twinkling savagely under black projecting brows, reminded me of all I had read of conspirators. His face, at that moment of horror, seemed to me like that of a vulture; the livid skin clung to the cheek-bones, and the lines of the mouth were cruel and cold.

"'I should not have returned here to-night,' he said, 'but for an accident. I was not so far distant but that a messenger could reach me with information of Crag's arrest by our friend Montague. He has, of course, betrayed every thing?'

"'Yes,' I replied, reassured by the quiet manner of Bonsall, 'I am acquainted with the particulars of your conspiracy to destroy Mohler and myself.'

"'Are you not afraid to confess the knowledge, alone with me in this solitary place?'

"'Are you a murderer?'

"'Alas! Madam, it is you who are the destroyer.' I fear you now as one who controls my destiny, and can blast my good name and fortune with a word.'

"A long, deep sigh of relief escaped silently from me. I no longer feared Bonsall. He saw his advantage and hastened to improve it.

"'Montague is my own and your husband's enemy. We employed a spy to observe him. The spy endeavored to extort money from your terrors. Lying is his vocation. Reasonable persons should not confide in the assertions of a Vampire. Cease to fear and believe him and he is powerless.'

"'Mohler's first enemy,' I answered, 'is his own unnatural jealousy. You may, perhaps, claim a second place. But we need not speak of that at present.'

"'Were not you tempted by an equal jealousy to penetrate the privacy of this apartment?'

"'Beware, Sir, how you trespass upon my hospitality. Your presence in this house is merely tolerated. Retire. If you have any repentance or apology to submit, let it be in the light of day and in the presence of witnesses, as heretofore.'

"A flash of rage lighted up the noble but vulture face. It was momentary. He assumed an attitude of polite humility, bowed low, and seemed willing to leave me, as I desired, but hesitated.

"Speak," I said, quickly, "if you have any thing to add: I wish to be alone."

"Forget, if only for a moment," said Bonsall, doubling his effort to appear humble and repentant—"forget your enmity, while I explain to you the uses of this mysterious apparatus. As a piece of mechanism it is the grandest achievement of modern science, and besides that," he added, in a significant tone, "you have an interest in the matter. It was made partly for you."

"There was a cold, malicious impudence in the expression, 'It was partly for you,' that made me shrink; but I remembered my promise to the Montagues, and allowed the wily conspirator to engage my attention by a lucid and wonderfully condensed and simple explanation of the machinery. I had read and seen enough of chemistry and mechanics to comprehend all.

"It was you," he said, "who suggested the idea of the invention, though you were not conscious of it at the time. Five years ago, in the winter of the fifth year after your marriage, Mohler became intimately acquainted with me. The following summer he disclosed to me his suspicion of your fidelity. He knew that your affection for him had declined into a temperate and sisterly friendship, and he believed that you had given your heart to a man of more brilliancy and personal power than himself."

"Whom did he suspect?"

"I am his counselor, and dare not violate confidence. His suspicions were soon after transferred to a person much more innocent."

"Yourself?"

"Yes. I own that, at first, I was deeply impressed by your beauty and intelligence; but I soon learned that these were defended by your virtue against ordinary, or even extraordinary, temptations."

"The 'extraordinary' being the seductive manners and the wit of Mr. Bonsall."

"The same, Madam," replied the lawyer, coldly.

"Men of genius, Mr. Bonsall, are said to be the best judges of their own ability."

"Even when it is a secret from the rest of the world. I admire the sarcasm; but let me proceed. You were reading aloud, to a circle of savans, a chapter from a French journal, reviving, with the vivacity and elegance peculiar to the scientific literature of France, the old discoveries of Chladni, who found that musical vibrations imparted to tablets of glass or metal caused particles of sand, or finer powders, which he strewed upon their surfaces, to assume a regular distribution, dancing and arranging themselves, like sentient beings, to the sound of music. The hand which held the pamphlet was a delicate, a beautiful hand, sparkling with diamonds, and blushing with the same intellectual enthusiasm which inspired a melodious voice that warbled, more than it uttered, the mellow periods of the author. The face, the form, the lips, the eyes, the fair rounded arm, and the grace of attitude—much more than the interest of what you read—inspired your auditors with admiration. Mohler alone suffered in that circle: jealousy devoured his heart. The admiring savans listened with delight while you spoke of the atoms of Chladni and of Epicurus, and led us, by a ravishing disquisition, from the cold, angular ideas of mechanics into the rich sunlight of poetry and philosophy. While the dancing atoms of Chladni became to me the cause of passionate admiration, they suggested to your jealous spouse a means, as he conceived, of proving your suspected infidelity, even in its least and slightest expressions."

"Miserable man!" I exclaimed, with an expression of equal pity and scorn.

"Mohler found it necessary to have an adviser and a confidant. I became both. Yes, Madam, I confess it. An irresistible passion seized upon my heart. I burned to separate you, by all and any means, even the most criminal, from him, that I might induce you to become the wife of a man who could better appreciate you. You seemed to me a woman worthy of my highest ambition. I was ready to devote my existence to the hope of one day possessing you."

"Ah! beware, Madam, of despising me. You rejected my involuntary admiration. You made me, at last, an enemy; but," he added, quietly, "I am now repentant, and desire to become your friend."

"Without waiting for my reply, Bonsall, throwing off his cloak, directed my attention first to a broad plate of thin metal suspended from the ceiling by threads of silk. Over this he strewed fine dust from a woolen bag, and then, as he drew a violin bow over its edge, I saw the dust gather and arrange itself in geometrical forms, consonant with the tone imparted.

"See," said he, "The Atoms of Chladni. They mark the tone; but the plate, as you well know, has become electrified by vibration. The mirrors of your ceiling are each a vibrating plate. From the upper surface of these rise wire conductors of the electric power generated by the vibration. This is faint and feeble at first, but, by passing through metallic threads coiled a thousand times round small magnets—each geometrical division of the plate corresponding with a magnet and with a radical sound of the human voice—it has power to connect and disconnect the keys of the batteries ten thousand times more powerful, giving motion to the wheels and pendulums, which, in their turn, move the needles of the register—with a slow or swift motion—piercing more or fewer points in this strip of paper, from which, by such wonderful means, has been read off and written every clearly articulated sound uttered in your apartments."

"Not until that moment did the horrible reality flash through my heart, attended by a thrill of hatred and disgust as though given by the touch of a serpent. Hatred for Bonsall and withering scorn of my wretched husband took full possession of me.

"After a brief silence, during which I succeeded in mastering the violence of these emotions: 'This record, then,' I said, 'is the result of your labors?'

"'Yes,' he answered, with the old furtive smile playing about the cruel mouth; 'in that book your most secret and confidential conversations are recorded.'

"'Stolen property,' I said, taking up the book, 'goes back to the right owner.'

"'Ah!' said he, laughing, 'we have a duplicate, a copy to which you are welcome; but this one,' snatching the volume with a slight of hand, 'belongs to me.'

"'A gentleman!' I said, with I know not what sneering addition, for the littleness of the action inspired me with contempt.

"'A fine word, Madam, properly used—counterpart of the word "lady;" both significant of many virtues; and among those I class purity of mind and conduct. Look,' said he, placing and opening the volume before me. 'Read for yourself.'

"The day of the entry was Saturday of the week previous, one hour and five minutes past midnight. I read under this date the transcript of a conversation between two lovers, one of whom deplored the folly and jealousy of a silly husband; the other urged an elopement. Then followed signs of inarticulate sounds.

"Immediately after, dated at ten in the morning of the next day, was a conversation of mine with Marian, my dressing maid, concerning certain garments which she asked from me. I remembered the conversation.

"'There are ninety distinct entries of the record,' said Bonsall, closing the book, 'and of these, more than twenty are conversations between the same pair of affectionate lovers. All must have taken place in your room; and please observe, that whenever these interesting conversations have occurred you were at home and in your room.'

"'Either your machinery, or yourself, Mr. Bonsall, is a contemptible liar. I confess the ingenuity of the contrivance; but it seems to me that half a dozen perjured witnesses would have been a much less expensive and troublesome apparatus. Have you no better or more reasonable testimony than this? You are a lawyer; so am not I.'

"'It would be a profound gratification—yes, a happiness to me,' he answered, 'could you establish your innocence.'

"'I will do it here, and now. Put your machinery in order for its work. The ninety-first entry will explain the others.'

"The lawyer hesitated; but seeing no change of countenance or movement on my part, but only a certain resolute passivity, he proceeded—maintaining his rôle of disinterested friend—to adjust the telegraphic machinery and connect the galvanic apparatus in a continued chain. He may have been five minutes occupied in this manner, during which time a low murmur, like the frothing of the sea, rose from the three thousand couplets of electrified metals, eroded by the biting fluids of the troughs; then touching a heavy pendulum on each of the three tables, and communicating life to the apparatus by winding a powerful spring, he stood aside, and asked me what I would have him do next.

"Without replying, I raised the thick baize curtain which concealed the metal mirror under the larger of the tables, and, stooping down, uttered, slowly, a few distinct words. The clicking of the needle showed that they had been recorded, as I spoke, on the slip of paper at the telegraph desk.

"'It appears to me,' said I, glancing at the scowling, troubled face of my enemy, 'that you do not at this moment enjoy so greatly the proof of my innocence, and—pardon me if I add—of your own villainy. Your villainous machine records words spoken in this room, above the mirror, as clearly as though they had been uttered below it, in my chamber. The enamored conversations that occupy so many pages of this volume, resembling a poor novel, have been composed by yourself; proving, Sir, the just equality of your literary talent and your virtue.'

"The dark eyes of Bonsall flashed malignant fires. Shuddering and shrugging with impotent rage, he began pacing with heavy strides, his hands clasped nervously behind him, back and forth the long room. Twice, as he passed me, he threw deadly glances. I wished to retire, but would not. There is something awfully attractive in the exhibition of destructive passions. My eyes followed the man, who at that moment contemplated every possibility of violence, with a fixed regard of terror and curiosity. I felt that we were acting a part, but the actors were sincere, and thought nothing of the possible scorn or applause that might follow the lifting of the curtain.

"At length utterance returned to him, and he gave vent to his accumulated rage in a curse. Raising his right arm, he cursed me as he passed before me, with the addition of such words as the man uses when he would destroy all possibility of reconciliation with the woman. The nervous arm, raised to enforce the language, in falling broke a link of the strong connecting-wire looped along from column to column. The surging murmurs of the batteries, the whirl of the magnets, and the click of the heavy pendulums, ceased on the instant. He stopped in his way.

"'I see,' said he, 'that you, such as you are, have the advantage of me in self-command.'

"With a deep sigh he expelled the tumult from his breast.

"'As easily,' he continued, 'as I can repair the slight injury my foolish rage has inflicted upon this thread of metal, so easily can I mend the mischief you have brought upon me by your discovery.'

"When Bonsall uttered this threat I lost all fear. Contempt made me laugh.

"There was a time,' he continued, 'when I loved you with a passion equal to my present hate.'

"Pray, Sir,' I said, 'may I inquire the cause of this heroic hatred?'

"Is it nothing to have suffered, year after year, the pangs of incurable love, until every thought, every action was absorbed in that one grief? If the passion soured into hate—'

"I gave you no invitation to indulge such folly.'

"True, you gave none. Becoming daily more beautiful, more lovely; as the days wore on, estranged more and more from your miserable husband—'

"Not a word of that, Sir! You were my accuser.'

"Yes, I own it. It was a crime—'

"Crime upon crime, Raymond. First, an unlawful passion; then treachery to a friend; then hatred of the object unlawfully loved; then futile conspiracy to defame, to rob. Do you call that love? Oh, fool!'

"It was not I who planned it; the wretch, Mohler, a mean, suspicious creature, cowardly, an intellect without a heart—it was he, Maria, who devised your ruin. He called on me to help him.'

"And you answered the call?'

"Bonsall was silent.

"There is no excuse. Your nature is evil. What you call love is an unholy passion that would sacrifice every thing to itself.'

"Would not the highest virtue do the same, Maria?'

"You are more subtle than I. Your subtlety of intellect has destroyed you.'

"Mixed motives. I loved you, nevertheless; ay, worshiped—that is the word; I love you still. Bid me die, and I will.'

"Love!'

"Yes, deep, absolute. It was your silence, your avoidance, aversion, that ruined me. Now I can speak freely with you, and I no longer hate.'

"In every woman's heart (surely in mine) there is a degree of compassion and forgiveness for those who suffer by the effects of love. It is God's will that it should be so; else all women would fly from men. Great as my abhorrence was—thoroughly as I despised the baseness of Raymond—an old secret preference, a long-suppressed feeling, crept up into my throat and choked me.

"Raymond,' I exclaimed, with an accent, I fear, not wholly harsh, 'you have chosen a base and crooked path to the favor of a woman who was once proud to call you friend. During the last two of seven tedious years you have not acted the part even of a friend—much less—'

"It was the accursed silence,' he exclaimed, eagerly. 'We should have been more honest.'

"We, Raymond?'

"Yes, we. You loved me once.'

"I had gone too far to recede. My courage rose. Prudery would have been cruel and absurd. Could I, then, terminate this long career of crime by a simple explanation?'

"A word more,' I said, 'before we end this conference—which, I hope, may save us both. Tell me for what purpose you conspired to deprive me of my fortune? That was the act, not of a despairing lover, but of an unprincipled sensualist. Why this complicated and cumbrous mass of conspiracy against me and mine?'

"Judge me as you will,' he answered. 'I have told you all. I would have restored all that I had taken from Mohler to you. I wished to load you with obligations. See, here are all the evidences.'

"He opened a drawer of the desk, drew forth a package of papers, and placed them in my hand. I accepted the gift. It was prudent to do so.

"Destroy these papers,' he continued, eagerly, 'and the work of infamy is undone.'

"I appreciate the motive, but how can I forget the crime?'

"By extending pardon to the criminal.'

"Oh! my friend, when the sun-rays of mercy spread over the soul their warm and tender light, are we to be blamed if we forget the strict laws of social propriety?'

"Come near to me,' I said.

"He came and stood before me, with downcast eyes.

"If I will forget the past, will you forget it? Will you leave me now forever, and let silence cover all?'

"Death—death! I could not outlive the separation. Though it must come, while I live let me live near you!' he exclaimed, turning away, pale and convulsed.

"See,' he said, taking up one end of the broken wire, 'this poor mechanism is like your favor: while the wires are united—that is, your good-will, your pity—it gives life, power, hope; the strong currents of the soul flow on, and the man is powerful, useful, happy. Without this he is only a self-corroding machine. Pardon me,' he added, while a blush mantled his features, 'if my long study of these magnetic laws has suggested an illustration that may seem mean and trivial to you; but the great laws work in souls as in matter. Give me, then, your favor, or—'

"He touched, as he spoke, the other depending piece of the broken wire. A murmurous sound arose from the batteries. The pent-up, concentrated lightnings rushed from the wires through his frame, and he fell dead like one who has dropped suddenly asleep.

"I went to him, and regarded for a time, in silent awe, the upturned face of the dead. Ah!

what a terrible anguish is compassion! It is the grief of God. Kneeling by the side of Raymond Bonsall, slain by a sudden, unlooked-for vengeance—the work, inadvertent, of his own hand—all the past fled away, and I thought only of the ages of remorse that, in another world, would punish the repentant but malformed, misguided soul. The tears were falling freely from my eyes as I knelt by the dead, when I heard behind me a step that I knew to be Mohler's.

"As I arose I saw the sordid figure of the German chemist creeping behind. When he saw me, and at a glance divined the nature of the accident that had befallen Bonsall, he shrank away and fled. As for Mohler, he could hardly clear his sense sufficiently to comprehend the calamity that had fallen upon himself. His jaw dropped; he fumbled with his hands. I felt no pity for him—why, I can not tell.

"Maria! What has happened to Bonsall? How did you get in here? Oh! I suppose you understand all now?"

"I do."

"Bonsall is dead!" he murmured. "Yes, I see the wires are broken. Three thousand pairs of plates—it would kill an ox! You say you understand the affair. Hum! You have read the evidence against you in the book?"

"Enough to know that Bonsall, who lies here dead, is the author of these infamous conversations attributed to me."

"How—how?"

"Voices above the mirror are recorded as well as those spoken beneath."

"I never once thought of that!"

"You? You, then, are not an accomplice?"

"No," he said, hesitating, and placing his hand to his forehead, "Indeed it troubles me much. Let us go to your room, Maria, and we will talk it over."

"An insipid, futile smile played over his features. The suddenness of the discovery how he had been duped by Bonsall—the probable loss, in one moment, of wife, honor, friend, all the springs of a good life—smote through and through, and wounded to death the poor brain. I led him away like a child. But why did I feel no pity—none, ever?"

"Mohler's lunacy, as you know, was permanent. To the last moment his brain worked upon inventions."

Two silver tears, moved gently from her large eyes by the remonstrance of a smile, coursed quietly down the cheeks of the beautiful narrator. Ah! soul full of great courage and compassion, it was with thee as with the king who did not change countenance when he saw his son led to execution, but wept grievously when a poor drunken bottle-companion went to his death.

It was a history known only to a few. I first have given it to the world. Under the names and dates I have assumed, a few only will recognize the real persons and events.

CARLSBAD ON CRUTCHES.

I.

IT was a fine morning in the month of May that I embarked on board the steamer Vanderbilt, of five thousand three hundred and odd tons measurement, with walking-beam attachment, to sail from New York, at reduced rates, baggage at the risk of the owner, and so forth, bound for certain ports to be hereafter casually mentioned. Somewhere about noon the mails came in bags, carefully disregarded by the post-office official in charge, on the box of the huge open wagon, and shortly after they were pitched in bulk on to the deck. Then there was infinite but polite yells for friends of passengers to go on shore, which they did; then a sturdy sailor or two was seen squatting beside the stanchion piles of the pier, quietly but skillfully cutting the seizings to the shore fasts; and presently, by some well-understood signal, those sailors shoved the bights of the hawsers clear, and a seething current of foam told us—had we not seen the giant arms, or legs rather, of the walking-beams in motion—that the wheels were beginning to turn.

Then the crowd on the pier became excited—particularly those individuals perched at imminent personal peril on top of shaky posts, who, perhaps, to show their regret at our departure, began to deluge us with a horizontal tropical shower of over-ripe oranges. It was a queer way of exhibiting grief, but fearful of worse treatment, we esteemed it a compliment and remained on the defensive. Half a minute, however, carried us beyond the reach of those missiles, and even out of ear-shot of the news-boys, when, gliding out upon the Hudson, the steamer took a majestic sweep, the gong struck in a clear, liquid tone, once, twice, thrice. Hereupon a pause; the great beams gave a noiseless, hesitating motion, then the rods rose and fell to their utmost depth in their oily throats and beds of steam, the water flashed in rainbow tints from the guards, and we were off. Before long we went rushing with race-horse speed past the Hook, the low sand spits, hummocks, and beacons seeming to spin round in circles as we passed; then out into the broad Atlantic, and as the sun sank behind us the blue hills of Navesink faded away like a dreamy line along the horizon.

We had about three hundred companions of voyage on board, speaking various dialects, and many of them of desultory habits. The Teutonic race, however, prevailed. They wore asphaltum seal rings on their forefingers, ate voraciously, and in the calm and balmy days of the ocean denounced the grub, never having, perhaps, partaken of such luxurious edible matter in their lives before; but when the sea raged they confined themselves to salads, abandoning strong food and suffering great anguish of mind, to say nothing of the pangs of stomach, in not being able to devour the entire worth of their passage money.

There were likewise a good many of the Hidalgo race on board; mostly paper cigar people and retired slavers from Guatemala, Cuba, and the Spanish Main. Believing, did those Spaniards, that tropical heat pervaded the entire globe, they only came provided with gossamer-like raiment, light silk dress-coats, trowsers of most wonderful colors, and beautifully variegated stockings and slippers; relying for warmth, when the fog and coolish weather came, upon mouthfuls of cigar smoke, which they swallowed to create a genial glow within their systems. At the first symptoms, too, of uneasy steamer motion, they utterly repudiated, to a man, good wholesome viands; their skins assumed a pale, bluish, tobacco tint—like a painter's idea of powdered amethysts—and they devoted themselves sedulously, day and night, to their national pastime of monté. One retired trader in colored immigrants produced a bag of doubloons and opened a bank, quite as if it were an incorporated institution. He had large gold rings in his ears similar to a Hindoo idol, and habitually wore a counterpane pea-jacket, borrowed from his berth, with the ship's name, in red worsted, embroidered on the back.

There were Frenchmen, too, who began, the first day after leaving port, to secrete cigars about their persons, in readiness to elude the lynx-eyed vigilance of the custom-house officials in their native land; and they sang, too, in full chorus, the Marseillaise Hymn the first half of the passage; but before the chalk cliffs of the English Channel hove in sight they lost all taste for that sort of music and struck up Partant-ing for the Syria.

We had the usual amount of sea misery—one day fine, the next rain, followed by spirits of gales. No incidents, except pitching overboard a dead man sewed up in a sailor's canvas coffin, who had lived deep down among the firemen in the craters of the ship; but what else connected with his history nobody knew; and so he was "hurled—any where, any where, out of the world."

The ship herself was magnificent, strong and swift, and her two mighty walking beams swung backward and forward with the iron thews of a Titan. So we rushed onward through calm, fog, sea, and wind for about ten days; passed Eddystone Light-house, and that night we screamed and whistled until a pilot came, who threaded us through the Needles to Cowes, where a lot of passengers were gonged up and sent on shore; then we turned round again and dashed across the Channel.

As we cleared the headlands of the English coast, a small two-bladed screw steamer, schooner-rigged, and about a hundred tons burden, swung round to meet us. She was a little, low, white vessel, with a hollow, clipper bow, a beautiful run, and lean as a pin's point aft. They said she was a yacht built by the Emperor Napoleon for the Prince of Prussia, and called the Grille. I was lying on the forward deck as this little fellow screwed along our beam, nearly hidden from view by the broad and lofty wheel-house, and I was rather surprised to see how slowly we dropped her, for it was generally supposed that the Vanderbilt, with her splendid model, was the fastest steamer on the high seas. Something, however, was said by the engineers on board about the ship being light and the coals bad, but at the time we were going at the rate of thirteen sea-knots an hour, in smooth water, with the advantage of striking the water with paddles at an angle of forty-five degrees; to say nothing of the enormous difference in momentum between the two vessels, the game seemed to be entirely on our side. Yet, as we were beginning, though almost imperceptibly, to pass the pigmy beside us, the little witch suddenly gave a regular slide and skimmed six times her length ahead, as if she had been shot out of a gun; then, by a succession of these skips, she soon screwed beyond and fairly distanced us, and in the race of eight miles or thereabouts she was so far ahead that she wickedly described a gyration around our bows and then betook herself off.

With this wet feather in our cap we entered the harbor-ditch of Havre; where, after a gentle and polite tussle with the Douane people, we took the evening train, and sailing rapidly through the lovely fields of Normandy, as the clocks struck midnight—to a minute—we found ourselves in Paris.

No sooner had we unshipped our sea legs than I consulted a surgeon about my malady. He was a distinguished operator at the Hôtel Dieu, and saw every day of his life lots of cases, but he declared mine was one of the most peculiar of them all. There was a good deal of inflammation and partial paralysis, and evidently something serious externally, and grave doubt also existed in his mind lest there was something wrong internally. We both agreed upon this view of the case; but then came the question, What had best be done?

And here let me go back a little—say six months or so—and state parenthetically, that one fine day I caught my foot in the coil of a gun-tackle, or rather the coil caught me around the right ankle joint, and as the tackle was fastened to a piece of ordnance weighing about ten thousand pounds, in the act of being run out in a ship's port, it gave me a twisting sort of jerk, which, in a period of time scarcely possible to compute, laid me flat on my back. A trifling abrasion of cuticle—Anglice, a barked shin—was all the outward and apparent damage I sustained at the time; but a few days later, perhaps a fortnight, I began to experience sharp pain in my side, and week by week the pain got sharper and sharper. I still continued, however, to move about, until, after the lapse of two or three months, I could move nor stand no longer, and so betook myself to a couch. The surgeons, who were as skillful as any the wide world over, and kinder and more attentive maybe than many of their calling, did all that skill and devotion could do for me. I was leeches, cupped, and blistered, with all sorts of inside remedies between whiles, and afterward electro-galvanized—not plated—and chloroformed; but yet I became worse, and as a last resort I was advised to try the medicinal waters of Germany.

It was under these circumstances that I reached Paris; and to give a faint idea of the crippled condition of my leg, an Anglo-Saxon youth, imbibing some grog with a companion at a café on the Boulevard, where I was being dragged along, audibly observed, while pointing to my foot, "There! that's one of the old patents, and a bad one it is: the new improvement has the natural forward motion of the instep!"—their conversation being manifestly on the subject of cork or wooden legs, and my own being a striking example in illustration of the argument.

What had best be done? This was the question I put to the Paris surgeon. He said he would turn the matter over in his mind for a few days—which he did, while I rolled over and howled during the intervening nights—when he would decide, and give an opinion. Well, after a certain time, we held another consultation, and then my surgeon asked me what my own opinion was of the case? of course unprofessional, and without prospective fee or reward. I told him that I thought it was a pretty bad case—which was just where we both started from—and that I intended to try the waters of Carlsbad in Bohemia. My surgeon hereupon stepped back and exclaimed that he quite agreed with me; that he had no faith in drugs, lotions, or frictions; even the anatomical knife was at times a little dangerous in a live subject; and that, in short, Carlsbad was the place of all others on the face of the globe he would advise me to go to. We then cordially shook hands—his was heavier when he put it in his paletot pocket—and seizing my crutch I hobbled away toward Bohemia.

Oh, weary days and sleepless nights! Flying along the grain and vine-clad fields of France; the straight, tall lines of sickly green poplars, the white, dusty, powdered cross-roads, the distant vista of purple hill and winding yellow stream of mid-summer; the pretty stations by the wayside, with an inside peep of the crystal pavilions, brilliant buffets, and blithe girl garçons flitting about amidst the voracious crowds; then away again, with a scream and a jarring shudder across an iron bridge, or swooping over a delta of rails, pouring their iron tribute into some great junction; and yet on, with a screech of a demon, into a long black cavern of a tunnel, and out again with joyous yell, the steam and smoke dancing in cloudy shadows over the plowed fields and landscape; then down a grade, to meet with bellish clatter and blinding, dazzling flash, a passing train; and now a hard, grinding quiver from the brakes as we glide more slowly between the brick-faced bastions, and over the moat of the fortified town beyond. Old ladies poking salts at me all the while, and at intervals kindly fanning away the flies; little children timidly offering bites of pears or brioches, and with wondering, dear, sympathetic looks, exclaiming, "Il est bien malade ce monsieur la! n'est pas mama!" And the good conductor, too, his face a land-and-water map of coal dust and perspiration, looking in, and hoping Monsieur la bas was a little better, and would he like a sip of cold water, or gassy lemonade, or some wine red? Then a tedious halt, and much rolling hither and thither of baggage trucks, and stamping of passports, until at last, by a lumbering omnibus, slowly over a bridge of boats to Manheim, and a weary respite in a hotel on the banks of the Rhine: There through the hot summer's night, when the sun has gone blazing down, after burning up the last vestige of cool air fluttering furtively about my windows, and leaving a tremulous mirage-like glow from every tile of the heated roofs around; there, tossing and watching till daylight comes, and I look out upon the Rhine again. I see great timber rafts, and little deal huts of houses on them, sagging sluggishly past the town, impelled from side to side by huge unwieldy oars; then, Dutch sloops with great spread of sail flapping idly down the varnished mast, the yellow sides reflecting the early rays of morning; then shooting by a steamer or two, with red and white checkered ports, and painting the sky from their black pencil pipes with a coloring of soot; and all the time I see the broad and shining river goes eddying on. Up and to the rails again; first to Frankfort-on-the-Main, and then to Würzburg—the last a fine old city with noble façades of palaces and gardens, all belonging to that devoted lover of ladies and the arts, the King of Bavaria; and then another weary rest. And yet once more to the iron roads, through that lovely country, planted to the square inch, with rippling brooks beside our track, and blue hills in the distance. Skurrying on by the quaint old hamlets with zigzag, parti-colored roofs, or nestling farm-houses beneath the spreading trees, where the stout teams shake their bells a-peal at us as we fly by, or the stupid peasant women, in short petticoats and waists at the arm-pits, vacantly gaze up from their laborious delving in the fields; and so we go until presently a station, where a maze of electric lines meet at a large clock, like a magnified spider in his web; and then a pause. Crowds of people to greet us in their Sunday attire; pointed tailed jackets, red vests with multitudes of flat silver buttons, standing in jack boots, smoking pipes with pendent chains riveted to their button-holes as if they grew there; the other sex, too, in striped corded skirts, and bodices of red, cross-barred at the bosoms like cherry-tarts, gay kerchiefs about their heads, and gold filigree hoops in their ears; all round-faced, rude, and rosy. Kellers, too—German for waiter—rushing out of the restaurations and about the platforms, with trays filled with capacious wooden flagons; or yet with long deep glasses like speaking-trumpets, foaming with beer, returning empty and coming out full again; and still going and coming continually, until with half-empty flagons to still thirsty lips the engine screams enough; and off we glide, away from the nasty atmosphere of pipe-smoke, into the cool breezes of the green-clad valleys, whirling up the grade.

As the night closed around us, having been borne as far on my journey as the rails could carry me, I was left at Hôf. There, at the Golden Stag Hotel, I was received by a portly man in a white choker, which brought out the ruby carbuncles on his nose in bold relief. Behind him stood a thin person in another white choker, and a little boy like a plump spider beyond—all in white chokers. I said, "Can you let us have rooms on the first floor?" "No; very sorry, but the Princess of Swingmaringen Sedlitzwasser was expected, and the grand suite engaged." "Could I have an apartment on the second?" "Very sorry—extremely desolated, but that, too, was taken for the Swingmaringen's mother, the Dowager of Seltzerwasser." "Ah! well, the third?" "Yes, one little room, but the Princess—" I believe I said something altogether so extremely disrespectful of the Swingmaringen family, for many generations back and to come, which so shocked the portly head keller that he had hardly presence of mind to assist me up stairs. As for the thin keller and the spider boy, had it not been for their white chokers they would, I fancy, have been suffocated with indignation on the spot. When I got to bed—that structure being narrow and short, with another little downy bed for covering, and a sheet the size of a napkin—all through the awful night, in my light-headed, troubled slumber, I heard clattering post-coaches, trains of princesses, much din and bustle within, and clocks, too, without, that kept miscellaneous time, striking the hours and chiming away at the halves and quarters the livelong night; and all mingled in my volatile dreams with the perfume of chloroform liniment and German beer. When morning came, and as the sounds of hospitality and horses died away, the ober-kellner appeared before me destitute of white choker, and I knew by instinct that the Swingmaringens had departed. It needed no words from the lips of the keller to announce that the entire Golden Stag, from the very tips of his horns down to his hoofs in the cellar, were entirely at my disposal; it being in the very street, and facing the very house, said that keller, where the Mynheer Sand had pursued his studies previous to proceeding to Mannheim, where then and there he did, patriotically, it is believed, assassinate the Herr Kotzebue, whose infant daughter was clinging to his knees. All this, and much more, did ober-kellner pour into my aching head until the sun set once more in the town of Hôf.

In the evening a comfortable carriage, with a brave team of horses, were in the court-yard, and we continued our journey toward Carlsbad. Out of the broad, cobble-paved street, with volleys of whip-cracks, and the horses all a-jingle with bells, and down a slope, and over a bridge, and up-hill between waving fields of grain, and into a dark forest beyond, with a pale-blue ribbon of starlit sky above us—dozing away the hours till midnight, and we were at the little town of Ach, on the Bohemian frontier. It was at this memorable place, on my second visit last May, when the Italian war was raging, that I was taken for a French spy, and held in pawn for four hours, until some scholar could be hunted up to read the cabalistic seals and writings on my passport, the official bureau at Ach being quite unequal to the task. On our first acquaintance, however, we had no trouble—a paper florin bank-note, of half a dollar denomination, being slipped incidentally in the folds of the passport saved all parties infinite explanation, even to leaving the trunks strapped and unrummaged behind the carriage. The horses had a bite of hay further on, and then trotted square and brisk till sunrise, when we halted for a more general feed at a road-side gasthaus. It had been in former times the schloss or rural palace of some German grandee, but now a wretched old barrack of whitewashed corridors and desolate rooms, with a stagnant fish-pond in the overgrown weedy garden; and a tumble-down little church hard by, capped by a queer flat-domed tower; and a wrought-iron skeleton of a saint, rusty and honey-combed by the little dribbling fountain below.

Of a slatternly old cook, talking polyglot jargon, we ordered a grand breakfast, but she rather overdid the business, and served us a compost of fat sausage soaked in garlic, and a lot of cold oniony pickled trout—as detestable a morning mess as ever a Christian sat down to—served, withal, in a saloon of kingly proportions, which beyond all question had in late years been occupied by wandering students destitute of soap. How glad we were to quit this filthy gasthaus, and roll on again over the smooth roads, where the cool, fresh air of morning greeted us—where the birds were singing and the hares bounding through the bending waves of grain—where, too, in contrast, the wretched-looking peasant women were trudging, sickle in hand, either to be yoked to cows or oxen to plow the earth or to mow the fields, munching the while coarse black bread, and bowing low before us as we rolled by. Further on, clusters of red-tiled buildings, with smoke-stacks and furnaces puffing out streams of black smoke; plenty of peat piled up out of the dark, earthy pits, all smoking or steaming with a peaty odor, infecting the atmosphere for miles around, in spite of the perfume of the hops or the wide fields of new-mown hay. Then, beyond, a venerable schloss again, with its great barns for the harvest, and near at hand its village of ground-down peasantry, with swarms of children at the door-ways; always, too, a toll-house with a white and yellow painted piece of timber to bar the road, like an old-fashioned slung bucket-pole to a well; then lines of large, awkward, ungainly wagons, loaded—Heaven knows where—high up and low down, under the body and outside the creaking wheels, with crates, bales, and barrels of glass, china, pottery, and what not; the drivers slouching and clacking along in their timber sabots, and at every gentle slope chaining up the wheels, or throwing an iron shoe under, so that the jaded horses, perhaps, should not be run over in the descent or the crockery come to grief. All this, and more, with a town or two en route—of which more anon—until toward noon, when we had reached our journey's end at the Hygeia of Carlsbad.

II.

Carlsbad stands, as near as may be, in the centre of Europe and the very heart of Bohemia. It may be reached by several good roads, by the way of Prague or Toplitz on the Eastern frontier, or by a route which taps the main trunk railway to Leipsic from Schwartzberg, or by the road we came from Hôf. The town itself, which has a population of about three thousand souls, is half-hidden on the shelving sides of a steep valley of a little stream called the Tepel, which winds in form of the letter S till it meets, at the end of the town, the River Eger, a tributary to the Elbe. The surrounding hills are of granitic formation, well wooded with pine, with almost innumerable paths and roads leading in every direction to the projecting spurs and heights, which command lovely, though not very extensive prospects of forest, field, vale, and river.

From the bed of this little Tepel stream, and on the immediate banks, spout and bubble up the famous waters. Who discovered them is buried in the mists of German tradition; but it was Charles the Fourth who founded and named the town, built a castle, and is supposed to have resided here for the cure of his wounds received at the battle of Cressy in the fourteenth century. Through all the bloody wars of the Middle Ages which convulsed Germany, and all the changes of rulers and wars of modern times, the great players of the games, when sated with blood and rapine, have come to Carlsbad to rest from their toils, and perhaps to carve out new schemes of future misery and conquest.

It would be difficult to say to what distance below the crust of the earth the mineral basin which supplies the great body of water unceasingly evolved extends; probably, however, within the sinuous course of the Tepel, and perhaps a short distance beneath its left bank. But whatever may be the extent or ramifications of this basin, it unquestionably throws off from the same volcanic or mineral caldron all the water which bursts forth from the various outlets. As to the depth of this parent source, that, too, is unknown; all the boring and sounding experiments hitherto attempted have proved unsuccessful in reaching a solid base. The crust, however, which covers this basin is from one to two yards thick, though, what is a little singular, this crust has never been seriously disturbed or rent asunder by any of the violent earthquakes which—in the memory of man—have shaken the continent. The great chasm beneath, with its fissures, vaults, and caverns, have been so firmly arched by nature herself as to bid defiance to the heaving throes of the earthquake.

There are eight sources or wells in Carlsbad used for drinking medicinally, exclusive of those recently found beneath the new military hospital, which stand in the following order according to their temperature, exactly determined by a long course of observations running through a period of eighty-six years:

Sprudel.....	165°	Fahrenheit.
Bernardsbrunn.....	156°	"
Neubrunn.....	147°	"
Marketbrunn.....	139°	"
Felsenquelle.....	129½°	"
Mühlbrunn.....	127°	"
Theresienbrunn.....	123°	"
Schlossbrunn.....	118°	"

Be it observed that the temperature of the atmosphere has no influence upon the waters, and in the coldest winters, with the thermometer below zero, they retain the same heat without perceptible variation. The problem of explaining this natural heat, as well as the manner by which the waters are supplied with mineral substances, has puzzled the most acute and skillful analysts; and, in spite of all their exertions, none but ingenious theories and conjectures have been elicited. The thermal heat, however, is more easily accounted for, upon the theory that the heat in the interior of the earth augments in the ratio of its depth; and since the water evolved can lose very little of its temperature after the conduits become heated to the open air, the depth of the Sprudel, which is thought to be the parent source, is computed to spring from seven to eight thousand feet below the surface. The Sprudel crust itself seems to cover a space of about sixty yards square, the greater portion being on the bed of the Tepel, and protected from floods in the river by an artificial stone vaulting, in which holes are bored to allow the water to pass freely off. These orifices are about three inches in diameter, and, probably by the escape of carbonic gas, the water spouts out from five to fifteen feet high, in regular jets, beating like a pulse at the rate of about thirty-five ebullitions a minute. Clouds of steam, as from a high-pressure engine, rise around these natural fountains, float in filmy, rainbow hues in the sunlight, or else hang under denser auspices along the stream and its banks, emitting the while a peaty and by no means agreeable odor.

But what is more material are the deposits which are precipitated at the outlets of all the fountains in Carlsbad. This consists of a slimy green and brown sediment, which, layer upon layer, like the freezings of successive overflows of water, solidifies into a mass till it becomes almost as hard as marble. It also clogs and chokes the artificial orifices of the Sprudel, and every month or two they are bored afresh, so as to prevent—what is sometimes feared—an explosion which might blow the entire vaulting into the air. This sediment is called the concreta thermalis, and is thought to be composed of animal matter. Whether it is or not, it admits of a high polish, and is used for a great variety of inlaid and mosaic ornamental work. This water has likewise the power of petrification; and a bunch of grapes, a bouquet of flowers with the most delicate leaves and petals, vegetables, and willow-wood, becomes, after the lapse of a fortnight, when immersed in these boiling fountains, as hard as agate; and often raising misgivings, too, whether the same phenomenon may not take place in the stomachs of those who saturate themselves with the water for a much longer period.

The Carlsbad water partakes almost entirely of the alkaline and Glauber salts genus, and the chemical analysis was determined by Becher in 1770, and afterward by Hugo Göttl. These analyses, together with the volatile ingredients—for which I am indebted to Doctor Mannl, of Carlsbad—are appended below.* They show conclusively that, in the intervening space of eighty-six years, the chemical compositions have undergone very little change—a sure proof of the inexhaustible material at hand in the great natural laboratory below. It is to be remembered, however, that the quantity of gas found in every spring is in an inverse ratio to the temperature and specific weight; therefore, the higher the temperature of the waters the less gas they contain.

Of the various maladies of which the flesh and bones are heir to, and upon which these waters, beyond all peradventure, exercise a salutary effect, I will enumerate a few. For disorders of the liver, kidneys, and urinary organs, whether chronic or temporary; jaundice, indigestion with its whole train of nervous complications; for the rehealing of badly cicatrized wounds, paralysis of the limbs, or for the renovation of the system after long residence in tropical climates. Very many such cases are entirely cured by a proper use of the Carlsbad waters; they stand upon the record, and are beyond doubt or cavil; not a few I saw myself, during the two seasons I passed there: what is more to the purpose, the beneficial effect exercised in my own individual case induces me to state it confidently.

There is, however, another shade to the picture; and there are diseases of the organic order, such as disturbance of the heart, aneurisms, pulmonary affections, and so forth, in which these waters are not beneficial, but are in fact highly injurious and even dangerous, and the farther people so afflicted stay away from Carlsbad the better.

It now only remains to add to the foregoing summary the mode of using the waters. They may be drunk, bathed in, or steamed in, altogether, or separately, according to the advice of the physicians, who are not only numerous, but skillful and experienced. No difference exists in the component ingredients of the various fountains, and it is only by the temperature that the strength and effects produced are measured. In no way, however, should this Carlsbad water be applied for mere pastime; for such experiments have not infrequently created serious illness and disease where none previously existed, and sometimes terminating fatally. The rule seems to be, to begin with the mildest and least stimulating water, and then as the system becomes accustomed to it, to go on drinking till you come to the Sprudel, the hottest and strongest of all. If however, headache, vertigo, or congestions arise, the drinking is either discontinued for a time, or else the patient goes back to the milder stimulant. But once having found the proper "tap"—which you will soon discover—go on in moderation, augmenting the doses as far as you reasonably may, not omitting a daily confab with your doctor until the course is ended.

With respect to bathing, the treatment by absorption seems to exercise nearly a similar effect to that produced by internal saturation. Indeed bathing was used exclusively for two centuries without swallowing a drop; and it is still used by the medium of baths and steam, for cases of paralysis of the limbs, contractions, stiff joints, and badly healed wounds, either gunshot or by steel. Persons, however, who are subject to spasms, fainting-fits, or disposed to apoplexy, should never risk the bath unless they expect to be pulled out dead; nor should any nervous individuals shut themselves up in the baths unattended. At the same time, no one need be afraid of wasting the water, for the supply is inexhaustible, and the enormous overflow from the fountains not only warms the little river itself, but affords a perpetual boiler for all the town.

The fashionable season begins at Carlsbad about the middle of May, and ends with the first days of September, though there is no good reason why a person should not come at any other time when it may be convenient, as the water is always there, summer and winter, served up hot by nature herself. The climate is changeable, and the summers are sometimes very cool—the nights always cool, the elevation being about six hundred feet above the sea; and, therefore, thick clothing is indispensable. And now, having given a general account of Carlsbad and its famous waters—which I hope may prove valuable to whoever thinks of going there—I will descend a little more to detail, and describe what my own actual experience was during my residence there.

III.

On the banks, then, of the little Teipel is Carlsbad built, with the population pretty equally distributed on both sides. On the left is the Prado of the town, called the Old Wiese. There are tall lodging-houses standing with their backs against the Hirschsprung hills, facing a gravelled path, on which, fringing the water, is a dense row of elms—stunted within an inch of their lives—beneath which, as well as the buildings opposite, are nests of pretty shops where all the knicknacks of Europe are displayed, besides the pretty mosaic work of the place and the beautiful china and glass of Bohemia. Here, too, are multitudes of tables beneath the trees, where, in true German style, the ladies sit sipping coffee over their knitting, while the men puff their meerschaums and read the small octavo German newspapers. The Wiese, in fact, is the fashionable lounge where the world of Carlsbad revolves. After a day or two's lodgment at a hotel apartments were found for us at the Golden Cannon, a fine new stone building at the extreme upper end of this Prado, kept by some excellent people named Mattoni. By-the-way, every house in the place has its peculiar name and emblem. Strange too to find, so far up in the bush, nautical names predominate! There is the "Captain Cook," "The Anchor," "The English Fleet," "The Frigate;" then Swans, Storks, Eagles, and Pheasants; one house called "Sevastopol," very high up the hills, and—either in compliment to the Allies or Russians—very rarely taken. Some of the signs, however, admit of a double meaning; and Zum Silburnen Kanne, which I ignorantly presumed was "The Siberian Kane," in honor of that Arctic explorer, turned out to be the Silver Pitcher!

Our windows commanded a pretty prospect of the steep pine-clad hills to the right, a little square of the Kursaal below, the rippling river sparkling in front, where trout turned their speckled sides to the sun from the deep pools beneath; and to the left the long green line of the Wiese, and the distant grain-covered hills beyond. The rooms were clean—as, indeed, are all the lodgings in the place—with a prettily-furnished parlor in front, and a bedchamber in the rear. So soon as I arrived I sent for Doctor Hofferger, one of the most eminent physicians in the whole Austrian dominions, to whom I bore written testimonials of my case and the treatment I had undergone. He listened, and pronounced judgment—which judgment was to begin to drink, to continue to drink, and to drink to the end. And here let me say that the decisions of the Carlsbad faculty are not at all times to the taste or will of the patient; and many are sent away in the most arbitrary manner, without being permitted to drink a drop of the water unless at the risk of their lives. One case of this nature occurred during my first season there. An obstinate Englishman, in spite of a warning, began to indulge in Sprudel libations; but to counteract any unpleasant effects, and despite the advice of the doctors, he mingled a little London-Dock brandy, which he had smuggled into the town, with his tippie; which course of practice killed him, in the space of ten days, as dead as Julius Caesar.

To be on the safe side, I persistently followed the Doctor's directions, as I would recommend all other visitors to this Hygeia to do. It was on the 17th of June that I began my course of the waters; but as I was too ill to walk to the fountains I had a goblet purchased of the regulation pattern—to hold six ounces—and a jug of the water fetched from the spring, standing in a small wooden tub filled with the same element to preserve its temperature. I emptied this jug the first morning. The first tumbler made my head spin; the second, at fifteen minutes' interval, made my eyes dance; and the last created a buzzing sensation in my ears. Then, by way of exercise, I chartered a small donkey-cart, drawn by the smallest of that elephantine-eared class of quadrupeds. The boy-driver walked, pulling the donkey occasionally up hill, and letting the little brute slide down the steep places, for about an hour, when I had breakfast. This course I continued for some days—five, I believe—until I began to experience the most agreeable relief from the pain and swelling in my side, and I was able to pursue the usually-prescribed treatment without invariable donkey assistance.

The general regimen marked out for the Carlsbad patient is simply this: You rise from bed in the morning in time to reach the wells as the clocks strike six, and as the baton of the Herr Labitzky describes a gentle reel in the air, and is followed by as delightful music as is heard any where in the Fatherland. Then you approach the fountains, where are battalions of nice little girls, in tidy aprons, who fill your goblet, and you retire to some tranquil spot to drink it. Sometimes there is a cue of five hundred people in single file, with every one a goblet, many with little bronze dials to mark the time hung to their button-holes, and number of libations; but there is no jostling or hurry, for there is enough for all. The water is drank at quarter-hour intervals, moving about the while, listening to the fine music, chatting, or sniffing the lovely bouquets of flowers offered for sale near by; and the hottest waters are sipped through the medium of glass tubes like those straw throats for sherry-cobblers. At eight o'clock the music ceases, and the heavy drinking is over for the day. For an hour every body is seen rushing about into the bakers' shops, which are very numerous, and each individual buys the particular bread he fancies. It is of great variety in taste as well as in shape: plain, sugared, or with plums; flat, round, or half-moons; with or without salt; with each its peculiar name; and such bread Europe does not elsewhere produce. Whether the secret of its excellence lies in the making, the grain, or the water with which it is made, it is admitted by connoisseurs in that article to be the unrivaled, unapproachable bread of the world. The bread bought, it is put in a brown paper bag, and you wander off to the hundred-and-one pleasant little retreats on the hill-top, in the valleys, or on the Wiese, to consume it at your leisure for breakfast. At these café retreats, too, you find the most charmingly-rosy girls, neat and trim in dress—never a hoop or a starched skirt to conceal their rounded lithe forms—as brisk as bees, as smiling as Hebes, and as fresh in cheek as the bread in your paper bag. The breakfast, however, is no very serious matter—nothing in the eating way is in Carlsbad; it consists simply of bread and coffee. The coffee, too, is more than half rich milk, but such a delicious mixture the Grand Turk, surrounded by his houris, never dreamed of. No butter, meat, or fruit is permitted at this repast, but smoking in moderation is allowed afterward. Even tobacco, I should presume, is hurtful to the treatment; but as its prohibition would no doubt incite a stifled rebellion or open mutiny among the German population the faculty tolerate it. Nor is tea encouraged, especially green tea, which is thought to turn into black ink in the stomach; and butter is also frowned upon, as, when mingled with the water, it resolves itself into soft soap. Chocolate, however, is taken with dry bread in the evening, which leaves the system free from nightmare during the night. After breakfast comes a happy lounging interval, when you may either wander about the hills by innumerable shady paths, or in the grove, where the handsome Tyrolers sell gloves or buckskin raiment; or up and down the Wiese promenade, looking into the pretty shops, where you are tempted by delicate lace of point d'aguille, beautiful inlaid boxes, or mosaic work crusted or polished with Sprudel petrifications, or, what is equally elegant and enticing, Bohemian glass and china. Reading or writing to any extent is prohibited; indeed, the confusing effect of the water on the brain and eye puts a stop to such occupations were one so inclined. The mind must be left free from all care and excitement, so as to give the waters a fair chance with the body. The time, however, slips easily on in this dolce far niente way till an hour past noon, when dinner is to be thought of. Now there are at least fifty places within and around the town where you may dine, and the chances are fifty to one that you find precisely the same dinner at each and all of them. The cookery, however, is of a simple and artless nature, and utterly insipid. I advise you, my fat friends, not to come here for any stimulating luxuries for the stomach, as in that case you will be woefully wasted. There is but one sauce used for every thing, and though it may at times be white or dark, yet the taste is the same. There are, likewise, a variety of colored soups of a mild and fluid mixture, leaving the faintest impression on your mind of boiled napkins. Game abounds, small deer, partridges, and hares; veal, too, palpitating from the shambles, and occasionally, as a rara avis, a beef-steak; plenty of quarter-pound trout as big as minnows, and lots of vegetables. The poultry is not good, and the diminutive size of the chickens is attributable to their drinking the waters, which carries off the gravel from their crops.

The articles rigorously proscribed from the Carlsbad carte are all sorts of acids and fat, salads or raw fruit, pork, goose, duck, sausage, cheese, pastry, strong or acid wines, all spirits, cold milk, beer, or ice. The country wines, of a very thin and innocent quality, are allowed in moderation; but none of the other things enumerated could be had for love or money, since the Medical Board determine what is meet to eat and drink for the guests, and the restaurants are obliged to comply with the rule.

After dinner, which is taken between one and three, there is music by the full orchestra, either on the Wiese or at the Post-höf, a mile beyond, where the ladies sit sociably beneath the shady groves with their knitting. Ah! such charming women you see there sometimes! Russian dames, with soft Mongol eyes and rounded forms; the soft white beauties from Vienna and Prague and the Lower Danube; with here and there a dark-haired brunette from Italy. The only drawback to these pleasant réunions is the absence of children, who are rarely brought to Carlsbad; and indeed I may say to matrons disposed to build their nests at the hibernating periods, that they must give up all hopes of such Malthusian theories while at Carlsbad, and let them know at once that children are never carried away.

When tired of the music or the conversation of the groves you may saunter up hill or down dale in an endless variety of stream and forest landscape, or you may shoot air pop-guns for sugar-plum prizes by the roadside. In the evening, too, there is sometimes a concert or a spectacle in the little theatre, or maybe a Sunday night dance in the Kursaal; but all is over and the lights shut off by ten o'clock, and the whole town sound asleep. It is this strict and temperate mode of life, the entire freedom from care and undue excitement, which contributes so much to the efficacy of the waters. Unlike the fashionable resorts of the Rhine, where the grand duke proprietors are legs and the croupiers princes, here, in Carlsbad, there is no gaming or vice. Nor is the living expensive. Lodgings may be had at moderate rates—say from fifty dollars a month downward—and as much more will cover every expense that a reasonable man or woman may choose to indulge in.

MISS VINTON OF TALLAHASSEE: A ROMANCE OF HYDE'S HOTEL.

WHO that has not seen "Hyde's" can gain any idea of its peculiarities from a verbal description? Who that has once been there can ever forget the visit? "Hyde's" has been the pride and the pet of two generations. When railroads were slumbering deep in the hills of Pennsylvania, and when the pompous stage-coach was in the vigor of its manhood, an inn upon a turnpike-road was a cheerful and bustling place—

I restrain my pen. This topic is not to be lightly treated, nor to be introduced here. Let it suffice that "Hyde's" was a famous stage-house in the time of the last generation. It is clear that it commenced life as a building of moderate size, in days when architecture was not a separate profession, and when the ground-plan of a dwelling was made by bisecting the four sides of a square or parallelogram, and erecting partitions accordingly.

When stages disappeared at the sound of the steam-whistle, like ghosts at the cock-crowing, "Hyde's" took a nap. As railroads were built the American people became migratory; a few families had the good taste to be captivated with the scenery of S—, and consequently "Hyde's" had summer boarders; they spread among their friends the report of good cheer and charming rides; visitors knocked at the tavern door; a piazza was built; a wing was built; another wing was built; a long "addition" was built; and behold, the "Hyde's" of the present day! Trees have grown high about the old sign-post, obscuring the name, but the reputation of the house needs not the adventitious aid of paint and letters of gold. Throughout the long summer the rambling old building is merry with laughter and music and the shouts of children; there is flirtation, and gossip, and dancing, and knitting-work, and whist; all do what they like, and the others talk about them.

It was a warm afternoon—nay, a hot afternoon—in early August that saw me jolting along a dusty road in a "stage," plying between a landing on Lake Champlain and the railway station at Brandon, pausing twice in each day at "Hyde's," whither it was now taking me. The driver, a thorough Yankee, felt an evident interest in the private affairs of all "Hyde's boarders," and gave me much curious information touching them. His horses had plodded on at their own gait for several miles, but as they caught sight of the shade trees in front of the piazza they hustled themselves into a shambling trot, and for a moment renewed their youth. Upon the lower platform stood a knot of men eager for the letters and papers which Spiller brought from the post-office; upon the upper hung a charming group of wives and maidens, peering over the balustrade to watch the distribution of the mail. Hyde himself, like Pickwick of old, with one hand gracefully concealed behind his coat-tails, waved the other in pleasant greeting to the new-comer, with whom a few words were exchanged, and the preliminary business of securing a room was at once accomplished. Tea was soon on the table; soon cleared away; and the younger portion of the female guests, perching for a moment in a lovely flock upon the piazza, flew in different directions for an evening walk. Most of the men lingered nearer home, smoking.

It is always well for a stranger, coming into a house full of people, none of whom he has ever met before, to select, through the magnetism of congeniality, some cicerone, and by him to be informed concerning the internal social politics of the throng. Wherever there are women there will be cliques, and "sets," and rivalries; and woe betide the foolish man who ventures into this forest without having the trees "blazed" for his guidance.

Acting on this plan, I soon put myself on moderately-confidential terms with an open-eyed boarder, and received hints. While engaged in learning of the names, manners, tastes, dispositions, and pursuits of the principal guests; in hearing the description of the battles waged between rival parties, and in gaining information touching the general habits of the place, the fair daughters of careful mothers were returning by two and three to the house. Watching them as they came down the long hill at the foot of which "Hyde's" is situated, I saw an elegant form progressing with that charming sidewise, undulatory motion peculiar to thorough-bred women and horses, and to a well-balanced kite. Now I know as well as any one of the million readers of this story can tell me that I am a brute for this comparison. But it is a true one. Will some kind friend among you mention any movement more perfectly graceful than that of a kite as it tranquilly waves in the quiet air of a summer day?

During my ride in the stage before spoken of, a green wagon, filled with ladies and gentlemen, had passed us and disappeared. One of the female passengers had looked round, and the exceeding beauty of her face had awakened delicious fancies—fancies which I had nursed in secret for years. I certainly believe in sympathy at first sight; love may result, or may not. There was unquestionably a sympathy between that fair creature and myself. The driver told me that the wagon was filled with "Hyde's folks," and then proceeded—being a 'cute chap—to jest with me on my evident internal excitement at sight of the face. I had been watching for this vision to reappear all the while I was sitting on the piazza, and now, as the elegant form came down the hill and neared the house, I recognized my green wagon enchantress.

I will not bore you with talk about dress, for I do not know a basque from a shoe-string; but I must speak of one piece of her costume which was artistically worn: it was the head covering. One of those worsted affairs called Rigolettes, or Nubia, or the—milliner knows what—light and airy and delicate—was confined beneath her chin, and had originally been wreathed about her head; but it had fallen off backward, and now lay like a beautiful flower-cup out from which the erect neck and well-poised head seemed to spring as naturally as if they were indeed the handiwork of Flora. I endeavored to assume a careless air as I asked my companion her name.

"Miss Vinton, from Tallahassee. Her mother sat opposite you at the table; she was not there to-night."

I recalled the image of a short and rather stout dame, by the glitter of whose diamonds my eye had been attracted during the recent repast, and my enthusiasm received a slight rebuff.

"When I say mother I mean step-mother."

"Oh!"

I forgave the diamonds, and resigned myself to a fresh cigar and the anticipation of delightful vicinage for many breakfasts and dinners and teas. Sounds of music from the ball-room were now heard, and as the twilight gave way to the night, I left the corner where I had been sitting and set out on a voyage of discovery to find the entrance to the hall. I think I mentioned that there were many children at "Hyde's." Now, wherever children are there will also be playthings scattered about the floor. The spirit of all evil had prompted some infant to leave one of his drum-sticks in the long entry through which I must go, and upon this abominable gin I placed my foot just as I was turning aside to allow two ladies who approached to pass me. A man who steps unawares upon a rolling thing will undoubtedly go down; the only question is, will he go backward or forward? I quickly decided this point by flinging my right foot straight out behind me, elevating my arms, and plunging madly headlong. I found myself suddenly brought up, not against the wall or the floor, but upon the capacious neck of a short stout woman, who wore a necklace of diamonds. Two screams harrowed my soul: one, a half-strangled cry, as of a hen whose neck is unpleasantly twisted; the other, a fine, almost musical note, as of a startled blue jay. Recovering myself as quickly as possible, the whole extent of the catastrophe burst upon me.

I had cast myself on the neck of Mrs. Vinton, the step-mother of my divinity, and, worse than that, I had dashed my shoulder against her (not Roman) nose with such force that blood flowed from it in a manner disagreeable though not dangerous. Miss Vinton of Tallahassee stood by! She had uttered that first-class note. There was a pleasant situation! As through the brain of a man in sudden peril, so through mine in a twinkling rushed a folio volume of thoughts. I thought of the charming face as seen in the wagon—of the elegant form coming down the hill—of the anticipated delights of sitting opposite my beauty at the table—of imaginary moonlight rides and rambles; and now all these ravishing visions were put to flight by a trumpety drum-stick and an ensanguined nose. Then the lightning of my thoughts took a zigzag turn in another direction; I remembered that my friend on the piazza had a peculiar twinkle in his eye when he said that Mrs. Vinton was the step-mother. Step-mothers are sometimes disagreeable to their daughters—often a deadly feud lies hidden beneath a placid exterior—perhaps a step-mother's nose will not put mine out of joint! Hope budded as I saw the first involuntary expression of fright on Miss Vinton's face give way to a scarcely discernible smile of amusement. As I hinted before, all this passed through my mind even while I was regaining the ordinary position of upright manhood.

"I am bleeding. He has wounded me. Help me to my room," said the stout lady, with a comically tragic manner.

I could of course do no less than offer my arm.

It was very properly rejected, and, leaning on the lovely step-daughter, the injured dame tottered away. To my clumsy and incoherent apologies and regrets the latter said not a word, but the former turned toward me as she departed a single glance, half kind, half of suppressed mirth. I pushed on into the hall and ruminated. Aside from any other view of the case it was most necessary for my comfort that this absurd catastrophe should not be talked about, at least till I could become somewhat acquainted in the house; it would seem rather queer for a stranger to make his début by breaking an old lady's nose. To be sure the deed was done very quickly and quietly, but the victim would certainly make a thrilling narrative of the affair; the young lady, also, having a keen sense of the ludicrous, might amuse her companions at my expense, and all will agree that it is better for any man to be frowned upon or shuddered at than to be made a subject for laughter. I felt that it was most necessary for me to take some action as soon as possible. So I crossed the hall, now well filled with children dancing and with adolescents promenading, and seized upon the only man whose face was at all familiar, him with whom I had conversed on the piazza shortly before. Hastily putting him in possession of the circumstances, I informed him that I desired an introduction to the young lady at the earliest moment after her reappearance in the room. This he agreed to give me, at the same time letting drop some hints which tended to make me feel comparatively at ease concerning the old lady—suggesting that she was an enemy not only implacable but garrulous, but that she could be reached through her vanity, and that in any flattery I choose to administer I need not fear exaggeration, for she was a Cerberus who required continual sopping, and with very rich cake. Just then I heard,

"Where's Mrs. Vinton, Susie?"

"She keeps her room with a slight headache."

It was a splendid voice this last, with just enough of the contralto element to suggest the repose of a deep nature. I turned. My friend advanced.

"Miss Vinton, allow me to present Mr. Ruff, of Albany."

Two bows, pending which my master of the ceremonies vanished. Miss Vinton seated herself; Mr. Ruff did the same. He to her:

"To apologize implies a fault; regrets apply to misfortunes; and I need not assure you how much I regret that I should have been forced to introduce myself to your notice and to that of your—aunt in so disagreeable a manner."

You see that the word aunt was a stroke of delicate policy, as if I had said—I know that woman can not be your mother—and I was not supposed to understand the real relationship. It was appreciated, I knew, by the tone of her reply.

"Indeed, Mr. Ruff, we must be thankful that the mishap was no worse. Mrs. Vinton—she is the widow of my father—is not badly hurt; perhaps a trifle chagrined."

The dialogue so far had been on stilts. Gradually we took to the ordinary mode of conversational locomotion, she being the chief speaker, and discoursing upon the peculiarities and advantages of "Hyde's," sketching some of the guests, describing the various means of amusement, and dropping now and then a hint of charming rides and walks.

Every writer who attempts to present an idea of a beautiful or a bewitching face by a description of its features miserably fails. The true way is to leave the sketch to the imagination of each reader, who will invest the person with those charms which most pleasantly appeal to his own fancy. Let it suffice to say, that the components of this sunny picture which attracted my admiring gaze were: raven dark hair, a low forehead, wicked brown eyes, delicately tinted cheeks, not plump—thank Heaven!—the rosiest of lips, upon which sat that peculiarly alluring expression which I can only describe by saying that it is like the appearance a pretty female mouth takes on when in the act of tasting a ripe cherry, the slight acidity of which pleasantly thrills the frame.

Does any one comprehend me?

Those who have seen and, perhaps—ah—kissed such lips will recognize them by this hint. To those who have never seen them it will convey no idea. I can but say I am sorry for their ignorance.

An hour at a watering-place will do more to put two strangers on confidential terms than a month of city calls; and when we rose to take part in a quadrille we had broken and thrown away the shell of conventionality and were chatting almost confidentially. Among the other incidents to the sans gêne of "Hyde's" is this: we dance without gloves. This gave me an opportunity to try the temper of Miss Vinton's hand: there breeding shows itself more clearly than in any other part of the body.

Now I will not be seduced into a disquisition on the hand. Miss Vinton's was narrow, tapering, nervous, firm. It had life to the very end of the longest finger. Soft, but not pulpy—dry, but not feverish—smooth, but not with a slippery polish: it was a perfect hand. When I resigned it to a callous youth from Boston I went down stairs and smoked a cigar. I will not bore you with my reverie; it was delicious, except when the broken nose of the step-mother thrust itself into the picture; then I writhed in mental torture till the chair on which, Yankee-like, I sat tilting against the wall, groaned with sympathy. The music of the piano-forte had ceased in the ball-room, and evidently some general sport was going on, for a burst of loud laughter dropped down upon us who sat on the piazza.

"Folks seem to be havin' purty fair time up stairs. They 'sociate a good 'eal here."

A farmer said this; he was sitting on the lowest step strapping his knife on his boot. I assented.

"Come from Bost'n t'-day?"

"No."

This plump monosyllable was followed by a short silence. Then—

"Reckon it's considerable hot down 'n New York?"

No response.

"Mebbe yew don't b'long 'n New York?"

"Certainly not."

Now what right had I to answer this honest seeker after truth in such a crusty fashion? Pricked with a sudden remorse, I opened my mouth and informed him of my business, my residence, the probable length of my stay, and divers other matters; nay, more—I gave him tobacco for his pipe. All this so won upon the good-nature of the rustic that, as I rose to go, he volunteered the information that he had "a fust-rate boat down t' the pond," and that if I felt inclined for a ride I had only to inquire for Mr. Meachem's house, and I could have the key.

When I went into the hall again Mrs. Vinton was there! Her nose was exaggerated and looking less Roman than ever. As I entered I saw that the tongue of my victim had been wagging, for several eyes looked at me with a smile in them of most uncomplimentary mirth. There was but one course to pursue. The bull was to be taken by the horns at once. I beg pardon for this threadbare and most inappropriate metaphor, but I have no other. Fortunately there was a vacant place by the old lady, and down upon it I pounced, knowing that a man who sues for forgiveness while standing looks too much like a culprit, and that, being more at ease, I could make a better defense while sitting. So I sat.

"Allow me, madam, to introduce myself; I am Mr. Robin Ruff, of Albany. I have most awkwardly put you to much pain and inconvenience this evening by a careless accident. I have no excuse to offer; but I must, in justice to myself, say that my heedlessness was partly owing to the fact that my eyes were involuntarily and admiringly attracted by the flashes of light from that most superb necklace you wore, and which was especially noticeable in the dim passage-way when we so unfortunately met."

"There!" thought I to myself; "if she can take that without winking, then I am safe."

She was evidently pleased, certainly mollified. Indulging in some feminine imprecations upon the young musician who left his treacherous drum-stick in the path, she returned to a pleasanter topic.

"So you like my diamonds?"

"Even the Baroness of Pumpernickel, as you well know, madam, has nothing to be compared with them."

I flatter myself that I can look pleased while I am murderously bored as successfully as any man; and now for a full half hour was I obliged to bow and smile and murmur as the terrible woman avenged her nose by telling me the history of the diamonds. The tale promised to be as endless as Dumas's story of the Queen's Necklace. At last a round game of some sort, which had been going on in the centre of the hall, was broken up, and I saw my charming maiden of Tallahassee coming toward us. Involuntarily I gave her a pleading look, at which she smiled, and immediately drew nearer. I think that involuntary look of mine did more to break down the barriers of restraint raised between us by the laws of society than a week of ordinary acquaintance would have done.

As she approached and saw on what good terms I appeared to be with the old lady, she made no sign of recognition of me, and the step-mother rather ill-naturedly presented me for the second time to Miss Vinton. The latter scarcely acknowledged my bow, and her first remark to her parent was a sarcasm launched at my devoted head, or rather at my heels, in allusion to the episode of the drum-stick. I was staggered. But an hour before I was her partner in the dance, and the thrill from her taper fingers has hardly yet died out of my frame; and now she is riddling me with shots of wit, at which I should most heartily laugh if they were aimed at any other man, but which almost equally pain and perplex me! What surprised me almost as much was to hear the elder lady at once and openly take my part, remorselessly snubbing my tormentor, and positively taking me under her own protection. I presume my puzzled look struck Miss Vinton, for I noted that she had a curious light in her eye, as from internal laughter, and with a flash the truth—the blessed truth—burst upon me. With the shrewdness of her sex—and let me add, with its kindness also—she had taken the very course to prevent me from having the old lady for an enemy. Consequently, when I was in the presence of the mother and daughter, I must expect railery, and perhaps seeming scorn. Of course not a word was said on the subject, but a single look passing between us put us en rapport, and then for the future, whenever the course of events threw us into the society of the diamonds, I was allowed to behold fire-works of wit, humor, and sarcasm, played off really for my benefit, but seemingly discharged full in my face.

The effect of this strategy may be learned by paying heed to the following scrap of conversation which I overheard as I sat by my window one afternoon. The interlocutors were Mrs. Quincey Romaine, a talkative lady from Boston, and Mrs. Vinton. They sat on the upper piazza. Bostonia speaks:

"Do you know, Mrs. Vinton, I've ben thinkin' that Susie and Mr. Ruff are gettin' just a little attached to one another."

"She! he!" screamed the diamonds. "Why, they hate each other like cats and dogs. I never saw Sue so set against any body before in my life. They!"

And the stout woman fairly snorted with incredulity. I had the further satisfaction of hearing myself shockingly abused by the Boston partner in the conversation because I had such a singular name, and because no one knew me, and because I must be a nobody, since I had never met Mrs. Bulrush, of Beacon Street. My friend with the diamonds battled nobly for me though, winding up a torrent of eulogy by declaring that I had "a most remarkable judgment." I knew that meant that I appreciated her. Nevertheless I thanked her mentally for her zeal, and retired within myself to consult with my heart.

"Gettin' just a little attached to one another" were the words used by the Boston woman. Were they true? When this conversation took place I had been at "Hyde's" four weeks. During that time I had seen Susie (I long before began to think of her as "Susie") at all hours of the day—had ridden with her, walked with her, danced with her, had actually bowled at ten pins with her, much as I detest the sport. I had sailed along thus, never once thinking that I was gliding so far down the stream that I might find it hard rowing back against the current to tranquillity. Now it all came upon me. I was positively in love with Miss Vinton of Tallahassee. Then was explained to my entire satisfaction the feelings of aversion with which I had for some days looked on a young man from Brooklyn, and on another from Troy, the village lying adjacent to my own city, who had vied with each other in showering attentions upon my charmer. I certainly was jealous. How appalled I felt as I thought of the long time I had frittered away, when I might have been making love, and of the very short time remaining before she went to another place!

All young men who have not genius are precisely alike when in love—that is, while they are in doubt as to the return of their affection. If they have genius, they run to poetry and to dramatic recitations in the woods, and to black ribbon in the place of cravats, and to a languid melancholy. But if they have not this divine flame, they spend all their leisure time in going over and over again, in mind, the interviews they have had with their cruel or kind fair ones. They weigh every circumstance, and, according to the state of their bile, they are cast down or exultant. If habitual smokers, their consumption of tobacco is enormous. I passed at least two hours after hearing the above conversation in examining my conscience and my memory. The result may be thus expressed: "Do you love Miss Vinton, Mr. Ruff?" "I do!" "Does Miss Vinton—" "Don't put it into words! I can't tell. I don't know. I think—it just possible that—I know nothing about it!" The court is adjourned.

I have not thought it necessary to give any description of the progress of my acquaintance with Susie during the four weeks I had been at "Hyde's." There were, as usual, bright days and dull days; there were picnic parties and other kind of parties; there were private theatricals and charades; a fancy-dress ball and a "corn dance"—a sort of maize festival peculiar to the aborigines and to "Hyde's." I remembered now that I had sought her whenever I had entered the ball-room in the evening; that I had, somehow or other, found myself on the same seat in the "green wagon" whenever a select six had chartered that for a ride; that I had looked forward to each daily meal with impatience, because then I should see her opposite me; and that I had given but a moderate share of attention to any other young female guest. I knew also that I had steadily suffered myself to be bored by the stout mother-in-law, and that I had resorted to numerous unprincipled artifices to gain ground in her good opinion. But yet, upon my life, I had never till this day paused to think whither I was drifting. Giving myself up to the enjoyment of the hour, I had allowed the intrusion of no thought of the future. It was with a new feeling—a feeling that my happiness was at stake—that I descended to the dining-room for tea, being summoned thither by the hideous rattling of the gong.

Now this climax sounds and looks very much like bathos of the most unfathomable depth. But it is only a reflection of life. No matter what troubles us, provided it be not a sickening grief—no matter if we have lost all, if our love has deceived us, if our friend has proved false, if our book has fallen flat from the press, if our table is covered with duns—we still must go to supper or dinner, and to dinner or supper we do go. And if, perchance, on the way to our food, we meet Tom or Dick or Harry, we speak about the weather, or the latest news, or the current gossip of the house; and no one could imagine that our hearts are like lead within us, and that our minds are full of clouds which would be glad to shed themselves in a rain of tears. And inasmuch as we do not in real life smite upon our breasts and refuse food when weighty thoughts oppress us, why should we pretend to do so when we write of this real life?

So I repeat, I, with a heart full of serious love, descended to my tea.

She was looking charmingly that night! I remember that she wore a dress of delicate white muslin, or some fabric similar, fitting closely to the throat, and relieved by an elegantly-embroidered collar, confined by a knot of ribbon, of what shade I know not. I only know that her very graceful form appeared to even unusual advantage in its modest robe. I presume I looked at her more intently, and perhaps with a warmer expression than I was in the habit of using, for she seemed slightly embarrassed, and I even noticed an evanescent blush upon her cheek. By-and-by she said,

"Why do you look at me so, Mr. Ruff?"

"I am trying to interpret the past, to decipher the present, and to look into the future," said I, stupidly enough.

"And you take me for the philosopher's stone?"

"Stone, indeed! Stone is no word to express the hardness with which you treat those whom you dislike!" This said Mrs. Vinton, the step-mother, with a considerable degree of spite; but I was glad of the interruption, for I really knew not what to say next.

It had been arranged that a party should go to the pond after tea for a moonlight row. Accordingly nine of us soon set off—seven in the green wagon before spoken of and two on the "buck-board." When I say two, I of course mean Miss Vinton and myself.

Pray, do you know what a buck-board is; and did you ever ride on-one? No? Then you have a sensation yet to come. It is simply a wide, elastic board, fastened at each end to an axle-tree, and furnished with a seat placed about midway between the forward and hind wheels. Its elasticity is so great that no unevenness in the road can give it an unpleasant jolt; pebbles and ruts only serve to impart to the board a delightful undulation, and the poetry of motion is illustrated by this rude contrivance.

As Mrs. Vinton saw us preparing to drive off upon the buck-board I fancied that she thought herself in a dream; and as I stepped from the piazza, well filled with guests, to my place beside Susie, I saw Mrs. Quincey Romaine's look of triumph as she "nudged" the step-mother, and emitted that singular sound commonly called a "hem." For some reason, though perhaps neither of us would have acknowledged it, we were almost silent during our drive. It was a delicious evening at the end of August; a brilliant golden sunset had just changed to a sober red; the moon, near its full, was still like silver, and its light struggled with the twilight in a loving contest for supremacy; down in the meadows the reapers, the oxen, and the kine were slowly returning to their rest, and the musical lowing of the cattle came pleasantly to the ear. Susie pensive, slightly embarrassed—as if in expectation of a nameless something—was nervously playing with one of her gloves, thus placing in provoking prominence her taper hand. As if in a fit of abstraction I took this hand, and had opened my mouth to say something, when—Bucephalus kicked up!

Bucephalus was the horse I drove; Mr. Hyde called him 'Ceph for short. He was a new steed to me, for he had recently "come from grass." I remembered that Mr. Hyde had remarked, just before starting, that perhaps he'd been "livin' a little high lately;" but I supposed this a playful exaggeration; for though the worthy innkeeper's horses would not infrequently lie down in the road, and otherwise give signs of an indolent disposition, no one of them was ever known to sport any exuberance of feeling.

Nevertheless, Bucephalus kicked up. Then he stood on his hinder feet. Then he stood on all-fours and looked stupidly over his shoulder at the buck-board. Then he poked his nose down and examined the ground like a near-sighted geologist. Then he burst into a zigzag course, shooting diagonally across the road, shying at every stump, and standing aghast at every puddle. All this was amusing enough, and by no means dangerous; but still one can't make love and drive a horse which prefers a parabolic curve to a straight line; so I postponed a tender of myself and became stern, dropping the soft accents of love for the rough word of command. Fortunately a mile is soon passed over, and at that distance lay our destined sporting water, Lake Hortonia.

I wish it distinctly to be understood that I frown on that name. The sheet of water so called was baptized Horton's Pond. Some Anna Matilda sprinkled upon it a weak infusion of roses, and called it Lake Hortonia, and all the rest cried, "How pretty!"

We had lagged so far behind the others that they had taken to their boats and paddled away, leaving us to follow with the craft owned by Mr. Meachem, above alluded to. I was pleased with this, because the latter was the best boat, and fortunately would hold but two. I put Susie at the helm, placed myself on the middle seat, facing her, and pulled after our companions. By this time the shadows from the woods which bordered the pond on the western side fell dark upon the water, on which the moonbeams elsewhere were trembling. The boat which carried four soon turned aside and went on its separate way. I thought then, and I have always believed, that this was done for purposes of unobserved flirtation, the ages and sexes of the voyagers being favorable. The second vessel bore two spinsters and a romantic youth with spectacles and a flute. They had come down with the avowed design of "hearing Mr. Noyes play on the water; it is so beautiful."

Before long Mr. Noyes rested on his oars, took out the three pieces of his flute, moistened the joints with his mouth—which I thought a foolish waste of the animal fluids while there was so much pond about—tried the instrument, with a great deal of the whang on the low notes, and much of the tootle, tootle, too on the high ones, and then began to warble "Sweet Home"—of course. A fortunate want of ear and a failure of memory combined to break him down before he had arrived at the "place like home;" then he tried "Hope told a flatt'ring tale" and was deceived again; then he played, with more care than expression, quite through "Auld Langsyne." Then he rowed, as if to tone down his system after this success.

During this musical treat our boat was floating idly at the will of nature; I sat looking at Susie, who paddled in the water with her hand. Pretty soon Noyes stopped, took up his flute, and called out to us: "There's a fine echo somewhere about here; if you'll keep still I'll try to find it."

Whang! Tootle—Whang! Tootle
Tootle Tootle! Tootle Tootle! Too!

The echo remained silent.

Too—tle! Too—tle! To-o-o!

No response.

Then Mr. Noyes besought the nymph for the sake of Auld Langsyne—threw open a few bars of "Sweet Home"—invited her to come a very little way "Over the Moonlit Sea"—in broken accents begged her to Meet him by Moonlight alone—set "Roy's Wife" at her—appealed to her patriotism with "Hail Columbia"—tried to touch her devotional feelings with "Greenville" and "St. Martin's." All with no effect. Neither did the noise awaken any echo in my breast; so I pulled rapidly and quietly in another direction. Mr. Noyes had by this time dropped his flute for nature's organ, the human voice, and was addressing to the obdurate echo idiotic questions. As we moved still farther off, I knew he had returned to his oars, shifted the scene, and again taken to his reed; for the last sounds I heard from him were,

Whang!———Too!

We were now alone with the moon, Susie and I, and yet we said nothing. By-and-by, however, she began to talk rapidly, and with something like a forced gayety, as if embarrassed by the silence. We were quite near an island where we had once or twice held a picnic. Susie suddenly remarked that she had left a book there in the "hut" the last time she was at the spot; so we secured the boat and went together up the bank to search for it. We soon found the lost volume, but we still lingered, sitting on a rude bench at the side of the hut. The scene was glorious beyond description. The moon flooded us with a dazzling light; the outline of the distant hills was clear but soft; the farm-house lamps about us twinkled like glow-worms among the grass; the only sounds to be heard were the occasional barking of dogs and the rattling wheels of some rustic wagon. It was one of those nights which fill the memory with a wealth of entrancing recollection. We sat and gazed, nor yet said much. Then we began to speak of the pleasant past, of the rapid passage of the summer weeks, of sure partings and possible reunions; in fine, does not every one know what we talked about? The words of our lips meant very little, but there was surging thought in our hearts. Susie grew more and more embarrassed and seemed most absorbingly occupied in smoothing, with her pretty and neatly booted foot, the gravel on which it lightly rested. With the ordinary pretense of lovers—a pretense ever shallow, always successful—of examining her rings, I took her hand for the second time this evening, indeed, for the second time ever. I valorously determined to do or die; I would learn my fate; and many other mental absurdities uttered I.

Yet, even for the love of Susie, could not I open my lips.

Men who have been in battle, and who have also proposed to some much-adored woman, say that it is about equally difficult to draw trigger for the first rifle-shot and to compel the tongue to move for the pregnant question. I think it likely. But I had never been in battle, and I felt as if I should not have hesitated so stupidly to draw the trigger, even of a pistol pointed at my own head, as I did then to speak of what was in my heart. Two or three times I commenced a halting speech, but the very sound of my voice was unnatural, and I clawed back again upon the safe bank of general conversation, awkwardly endeavoring to make the lame conclusion of my remark bear some reference to its imbecile commencement. And then, when I reflected that my doom was not yet sealed, that if I had only gone boldly on I should have been through by this time, and that I was still shivering hopelessly on the brink of the flood, I inwardly cursed myself. Have not other men been through the same experience—seeing the precious minutes slipping like quicksilver away, yet not daring to speak?

But at last I was absolutely determined. Giving one farewell look at the moon, at the tremulous waves, at the farm-house lights, at all the sleeping world, I opened my mouth and said,

"I can not allow you to go—"

I was interrupted here by a little start and diminutive exclamation from Susie, who caught me lightly by the arm and cried out, pointing to the water,

"Why, there's our boat running away!"

Sure enough, "the blarsted thing," as farmer Meachem was in the habit of calling her, had actually slipped from her fastening, and, driven by a faint night-breeze blowing around the island, had floated away; but a short distance, it is true, yet far enough to put her quite out of unaided human reach. Thus, for the second time in one evening, was my bower of bliss changed into a howling wilderness—first by the freaks of Bucephalus, now again by the defection of the boat.

But something must be done. Slowly but surely the absconding craft drifted away. I first fished for it, by tying a pebble to the end of a trout-line and heaving it out with the hope of catching the hook in the woodwork; but the line was several feet too short. Then I flung large stones into the water beyond the boat, if, perchance, the ripples thus created might not send it toward the shore; this was a miserable failure, effecting only a partial dislocation of my right arm. Then I looked at Susie, and compared myself to Robinson Crusoe, much to the advantage of myself. Then she suggested that Mr. Noyes and his boat might be somewhere in the neighborhood, and that he might be attracted by shouts of distress. Acting on this hint, I mounted a knoll which overlooked the pond, and howled till I was hoarse in voice and ashamed in spirit. No response followed. We were quite alone. The night was warm, the island was uninfested by savages, wild beasts, or reptiles, and we were not hungry. So far as personal comfort was concerned we could have it here; but then the people at "Hyde's!" What a consternation would strike their hearts! What a scandalous chattering would be kept up! No, it would not do; we must have back the recreant boat.

"The water is warm, the distance is only half a dozen rods; I will swim out and bring the miserable thing to shore."

"Oh no! Mr. Ruff." Thus Susie, with a step forward, and with a dismayed countenance.

"But then, what to do? We can not stay here all night." This was a poser.

"You will take cold" (suggestively).

"With your permission I shall leave here my coat, waistcoat, and shoes. The exertion of rowing will keep me warm, and I will soon dry myself at Mr. Meachem's."

The silence which gives consent followed. So I deposited on the bank all the clothing I could with propriety spare, and waded in the water till I was out of my depth, then struck out for the boat. I was going on most swimmingly, had come almost within reach of my prey, when a sudden pang seized my right leg, as if it were gripped by the sharp teeth of some sea-devil. Dire sickness, rushing noises in my head, blazing fires in my eyes, and that horrible knotting pain in my limb, filled my body with anguish, my heart with deathly despair, as I knew that the foul fiend Cramp had me in his clutches. I tried to free myself from him by convulsive kicks; 'twas without avail. He held me fast; he dragged me down; he paralyzed every cord. Then passed before me the swift procession of my life. Flash upon flash of memory brought into most fearfully vivid relief various scenes of my boyhood—the old school-house, the play-ground, the church, the hill I was wont to climb, my college days, class-mates, tutors, the aged boot-black, my office, my present home, my parents, sisters; reminiscences grotesque, humiliating, painful, rushed through my brain in the fearful dance of death. Then I thought of the boarders at "Hyde's," half shocked, half bored by the catastrophe which marred their festivities; I read in imagination the newspaper paragraph announcing my fate; I even thought of old Bucephalus, tied to the fence on the other side of the pond, and wondered whether he might not have become unhitched and taken the buck-board home. Then, last, but most painful, came the thought of poor Susie, compelled to sit there upon the bank and see me drown, herself left to dreary, frightful solitude; and as I remembered the budding love so lately on my lips it seemed as though my heart would burst in an agony of regret. And still the demon Cramp dragged me down, binding me with the chains of paralysis.

Only those who have been in a similar peril can understand or imagine the supernatural, the frightful velocity of thought at such times. A volume of recollection ran through my mind during the five seconds which elapsed between the moment of my seizure and the moment when I sank. As I went down, I remember that through all the net-work of fancy and reminiscence I still had a moment to spare for the outline scenery about the pond; I noted particularly one tall tree which stood up boldly against the sky upon the brow of a distant hill; I remarked that the breeze was freshening, and observed the sudden extinguishment of a light in a house upon the border of the lake. I uttered no sound; I could not call out though I tried; but raising one hand above my head, as if to pluck at some phantom bough, I sank—down—down. Has this pond no bottom? It seemed an age before I touched the gravelly bed and began to rise, aided in my ascent by the slight rebound; I had involuntarily retained my breath, for I was accustomed to sinking in deep water, and I knew my supply would hold out till I reached the surface; but still the devil Cramp held me in his iron gripe, and all hope was dead. As I neared the air again I felt a disinclination to look upon the world once more, and I tightly closed my eyes. My hand, still raised stiffly above my head, had hardly emerged from the wave when it was seized by a firm but delicate grasp, the touch of which dissolved as if by magic the fetters that bound me. With a joyful rush hope came back to me, and I was once more a living man. To discharge my pent-up breath, to dash the water from my eyes, was but an instant's work. Then, with one arm about Susie's waist—for it was indeed her hand that had saved me—I struck forth with the other for the boat. A moment and we were there; a moment more, and I had lifted her over the side, had laid her in the stern, had wrapped about her some spare shawls there lying, and was sprinkling her fair face with water—for she had swooned. It was only a quickly passing faintness, however, and in a few seconds she opened her eyes, and upon her beautiful lips dawned a smile. Shall I ever forget it—that smile of wondrous sweetness?

But there was no time for sentiment. A few strokes of the oars brought the boat to the island, and then, hastily collecting my garments, I spread them over my precious freight, and pulled vigorously for the shore by Mr. Meachem's house. I am convinced, by my performance that night, that I could with very little preliminary training have won the belt in the Champion Scullers' Regatta they excited themselves about the other day in Boston—such rowing had never before been done on Horton's Pond.

Mr. Meachem lived quite near the place where we landed, and taking Susie in my arms I sped along toward the house. Was she not a lovely burden? And did not the blood rush tumultuously along my veins as I pressed her against my heart, and felt the gently encircling arm about my neck? I don't think we spoke a word while rowing from the island, and I well remember that on the way to the house an inquiry whether she was cold, and a softly whispered negative in reply, comprised all our attempts at social intercourse.

It was not yet quite nine o'clock in the evening, and the family of the farmer had not retired for the night. Knowing that the "front door" of a New England farm-house is never used, and that the kitchen is the common sitting-room, I pushed open the door of this and placed Susie on her feet inside the threshold. Mr. Meachem sat "in his stocking feet" by the flaming oil-light, spelling along the columns of a weekly religious paper; his wife, a large—what they call in the country a fleshy—woman, was paring and stewing apples with the aid of a knife, a kettle, and a fire of wood. A great cat was most deliberately washing its face, and yawning in preparation for bed. Altogether it was a pleasant scene.

"Law sakes me! Why! Of all things in this world! What on airth hev yew bin doin' to yerselves?"

"Hain't lost the boat, have ye?"

These were the first words, extorted by surprise at our sudden appearance, from Mr. Meachem and his spouse. But the next moment the good old souls were rushing about the room, the farmer wildly and to no purpose, the wife making every step tell. Susie was hurried to a bed while her apparel could be dried, and there she was given over to the tender mercies of the motherly woman. My own trowsers and so forth were replaced with the fatlings of Mr. Meachem's wardrobe, which, as he remarked, were "not so gay as yourn, but an orful sight more soothin' to the feelin's"—a sentiment most just.

Requesting him to keep the adventure a secret, I told him the circumstances of the affair, and the recital moved him to an unwonted degree.

"Sho! Wa'al, there ain't many gals 's would ha' done that; 'n she's a kinder peaked looking thing too."

This said he when I had closed. It was not later than half past nine when Susie was in perfect condition again and Bucephalus and the buck-board were ready at the door. Mrs. Meachem, in her homely way, begged the young girl to come down and see her before she left the place, and the farmer, going close up to the side of the buck-board, dryly said: "Ef he can't take care of himself no better, I don't see but you'll haf ter look arter him allus."

"What 'n the world ar' yew sayin' on, Mr. Meachum?"

"Nothin' out the way, wife."

And so we drove very briskly off, for 'Ceph had lost all patience at our delay. It was not long before we came to a gentle ascent by a road fringed with forest trees. Susie had been telling me of her view of my sudden sinking, of the different ideas that entered her mind, and how, almost before she knew it, she was in the water herself.

"And did you not think that I might clutch you and drag you also under the water?" We were approaching the woods.

"No; and if I had thought of it, I should have had no fear—of you," with a timid hesitation in her voice.

"I thank you more for that confidence than for my life;" and somehow my arm was around her.

We were in the woods. The heavy gloom contrasting so suddenly with the brightness of the moonlight caused Susie to nestle a little closer to my side—my arm drew her still nearer.

"Susie!"

She looked up. Just then a gleaming moon-beam struggled through the trees and kissed her sweet face, upturned toward me. Should I be blamed for doing likewise?

Bucephalus began to trot. We were out of the woods.

We drove quietly up to the door of "Hyde's." We hastened to our respective rooms and repaired the disorders of our costume. When, some time after, I entered the ball-room, Susie was there, radiant, with a subdued light, as a newborn joy, transfiguring her countenance. Mr. Noyes and the two spinsters were there also. He spoke:

"We heard you shouting to the echo, Mr. Ruff. Did you succeed?"

"Yes, I found an echo!"

I looked at Susie. She looked down. But I knew she took my meaning.

On the third morning after this night I mounted into the "Lake Stage" and set out for Albany, in order to arrange my affairs and prepare for a visit to Tallahassee, where a wedding was to take place some time in the winter. As we drove from the hotel I looked back out of the rear end of the stage and waved my hand. From the half-opened blind of an upper chamber a female hand, white and taper, gave an answering farewell salute. When I turned myself back to my position I saw that "the driver" had been looking behind also; he scratched his ear with a comical expression on his face, but for a long time said nothing. While we were waiting at the gate of the post-office yard for the mail-bag he examined one of his horses' feet, looked scrutinizingly at the axle-tree of his vehicle, took his knife from his pocket, picked up a stick, set one foot on the hub of the forward wheel, and whittled.

Something was on his mind; it must come out.

"Guess yer'v bin cuttin' on't consider'ble fat down 't Hyde's, ain't ye?"

Could any body but a Yankee have given utterance to such a horribly uncouth and, at the same time, such a compendiously expressive speech!

Fortunately, just then the mail-bag was brought out, and with it there came a rosy-cheeked country girl, who mounted by the side of my Yankee and engrossed his attention for the remainder of the stage. Being otherwise occupied, his tongue wagged no more with allusions to my sojourn at "Hyde's."

BEHAVE YOURSELF.

I AM a poor, miserable fellow. At least, I was. Within two months I have felt more confidence in myself, and less enmity to my kind.

The case stands thus: Last year I married a wife—a proceeding so common to young men of a certain age* that I should not have obtruded it here were it not, in this instance, so intimately connected with the wretchedness of which I complain. My wife is a little woman—an extremely nice little woman, I assure you; black hair, brown eyes, and nose and mouth all right, I suppose. I don't know how to describe women, but if you could see her you would be charmed. Now you must understand that we agree very well—no marital differences, visions of divorce, and all that kind of thing. She knows a good deal more than I, as I tell her every day; and she ought, because, as she said only last Tuesday, I am all day in my counting-room studying the market price of cotton bating, whereas she goes out into society, and knows how people do who are people. Of course it's perfectly natural that this should be so; couldn't be otherwise.

But now see how even love will sometimes make people unhappy. My wife, though she knows so much more than I, loves me sincerely, and shortly after our marriage conceived the pleasing idea that she would make of me also a man of society.

"Business is all very well, dear Augustus," she remarked, "but you must have some change. Now that we are married, I shall be always near you to tell you what to say and do; and there is no reason why you should not go much more into society than you did before our marriage. I don't like to go out without you," she added, kindly; and I, who felt that with her to check my mistakes I should be safe, was too glad to go out every evening with a charming woman on my arm.

But see how oddly things turn out! At first we used to enjoy society very much. But presently I noticed a furrow of care in my dear Angelina's face whenever an invitation came for us, and the gloom of annoyance upon her brow whenever we re-entered our comfortable home after spending an evening with our friends, Brown, or Jones, or Smith. Of course I inquired solicitously what was the matter. At first it was a headache—to which, I am sorry to say, my wife is subject when she is annoyed by unreasonable or stupid people in society. But by-and-by, in obedience to my most earnest and solemn request, she unbosomed herself to me. She told me that I had shocked her. She admitted that I had disappointed her by my conduct in society. She owned—not without hesitation though, the dear affectionate woman—that it was torture to her to see me crossing a room, or hear me laugh at a story; and that when I punched Smith in the ribs to show him the point of a joke, or slapped Jones on the back by way of saying good-evening, she could not always repress a sentiment of disgust. In conclusion, she declared, with tears, that it was excruciating to her feelings to see me continually doing the wrong thing at the wrong time in society; that she wondered other people did not make remarks about me, and cease to invite us to their houses—here I stated my conviction that they only invited me on her account—and that she really despaired of ever being able to go out with me with any degree of comfort.

Now bad as I am, and ignorant, I am not such a brute as not to see my faults when they are so plainly told me. I was sincerely sorry. And I determined to do better. I prevailed on Angelina to tell me, after every evening spent from home, all the mistakes I had made in the course of the evening. But this did not answer. My poor wife had no pleasure in society because of my ignorance. I had continually an awkward conviction that I was bowing, speaking, standing, sitting, leaning, or doing nothing just in the very places when I should have done the reverse. In short, we were both wretched.

About this time the season for parties came to an end; and when the summer came, Angelina went off into the country to see her mother, a middle-aged lady, of great experience in life, and for whom I have a profound respect. I was obliged to stay in town on business; and finding my evenings rather lonely, took to reading. Now looking through the catalogue of the Mercantile Library—to which I have for many years been a subscriber—I saw there the titles of a number of works on the very subject that caused my unhappiness, namely, Etiquette, Behavior, Conduct in Society, Manners, Gentlemanliness, etc., etc., etc. An idea struck me. How could I better employ my lonely evenings during Angelina's absence than by studying these works? many of which I found to be written by "French noblemen," by "English clubmen," and by "American gentlemen"—persons who, as all the world knows, move in the very best and most elegant society of their respective countries, and, being the "pink of courtesy" themselves, must speak with authority on a subject which I have found to possess much more importance than a mere business man would think. For three months I have devoted my evenings to the study of these works; and to make evident to the ignorant readers of this Magazine the radical difference between a mere man and a gentleman—to show them how much more delightful, how immeasurably finer a thing "good society" is, than they have before imagined, I shall set down here a few of the leading traits which, according to these books, distinguish a lady or a gentleman from a common man or woman.

And, to begin at the beginning, I find it stated, in a Philadelphia work, "The Laws of Etiquette," that "every man is naturally desirous of finding entrance into the best society of his country; and it becomes, therefore, a matter of importance to ascertain what qualifications are demanded for admittance." To this I agree, cordially, though I confess to have thought that perhaps the first "matter of importance to ascertain" was, what is the "best society." But let that pass. It seems, farther, that whatever other qualifications a man may possess, he will not fit into the best society without "good breeding." "Without this," remarks my Philadelphia friend, "we believe that literature, wealth, and even blood, will be unsuccessful. By it, if it co-exist with a certain capacity of affording pleasure by conversation"—which, it seems, is not essential to "good breeding," whereby that fashionable anomaly, a well-bred ninny, becomes at once possible—"any one, we imagine, could frequent the very best society of America."

So far so good. I do not intend to set down here a compressed manual of "good society" manners, because, in that case, every one of my male readers would at once make himself a gentleman, and this would not be a desirable consummation. I shall only pick out here and there what I might call the salient angles of gentlemanliness, as, for instance, an American writer remarks that, "as a general rule, you" (that is, if you are a gentleman) "should never cut any one in the street; even political and steamboat acquaintances should be noticed by the slightest movement in the world. If they, however, presume to converse with you, or stop you to introduce their companion," then you may deliver the "cut," which is done by "raising your eye-glass, and saying, 'I never knew you.'" From which I deduce two important points: that the American gentleman is always armed with an eye-glass, and that he sometimes indulges in a fib.

In his dress, a gentleman, I find, always aims to unite elegance with simplicity; and in a valuable French work I find that the "simple and elegant" dodge consists in wearing a blue frock coat, white trousers, a black vest, and an azure-colored cravat, fastened with a pin." But an American writer warns me that if I go out in the morning before eleven o'clock I "must not be dressed," though, he adds, "at dinner, of course, a coat is indispensable." I should say so too, unless it were very hot, when a coat might be dispensed with without personal inconvenience.

If I have a weakness, it is to sleep late in the morning. I was therefore much alarmed to find that all my mentors insisted on early rising as a gentlemanly habit. Judge of my relief when I read that "no person in good health should remain in bed, during spring and summer, after seven or half past seven." Since reading this passage I have become a convert to the early rising movement, and confess that I enjoy it vastly; especially as, before this, my wife used to have me up and dressed by half past six.

In making visits—calls, we call them—I read that the gentleman is first to weigh well the object of his visit, which object is stated to be "the exciting a new sensation of a pleasing nature in the person you call upon, or the detracting as little as possible from his pre-existing sensations of the kind." This dreadful sentence I read over for six mornings, before breakfast, before I finally secured it in my memory. As to the hour for calling, I am assured by another writer that "ladies in London are obliged to receive in the morning, because after dinner gentlemen are usually too drunk to be presentable." Reading this to an English friend who has lately arrived here, and who has what he calls "a proper contempt" for the American people, he cried out, in great wrath, "I deny the fact, Sir." From which I gather that "facts" are not such stubborn things in England as they are with us.

As for the minutiae of conduct during that embarrassing process a "call," I find it laid down in the very latest work which discusses the "Habits of Good Society," that "you should never speak without a slight smile;" and that "it is painful to see the want of ease with which some men sit on the edge of a chair"—painful, but natural, I should say. I have tried, on several occasions, to "sit at ease on the edge of a chair," but have to chronicle a lamentable failure in this branch of gentlemanly accomplishments. Also, that "straddling a chair, or tilting it up, is not good conduct in a lady's drawing-room."

My Philadelphia friend—whom I love to read and quote, because I have been assured by Philadelphians of my acquaintance that the Quaker City has the "best society in the United States"—my Philadelphia friend, then, says, "When you call upon a man staying at a hotel, with whom [the man, not the hotel] you are not acquainted, the most convenient method of presenting yourself is this: arrest one of the servants, place your card in his hand, desiring him to give it to the person whom you wish to see, and to let him know you are there. The servant will return accompanied by the object of your visit." Now this whole paragraph seems to me to be intended more especially for a sheriff's officer or constable. I am encouraged in this supposition by what follows: "If the stranger whom you call upon should be a woman, you would probably find her sitting with the other lodgers in the parlor. If so, you should order a servant to carry your card to the person whom you designate, and follow it immediately." Evidently a wise precaution to prevent escape. I think the Philadelphian should have put his "Manual for Policemen" separately, in an appendix.

We all know that "self-possession" is one of the distinguishing traits of an American gentleman. I was glad, therefore, to find this paragraph in the "manual" just quoted. It refers to a predicament—if I may use the word—in which a stranger might find himself in Gotham, as well as in the Quaker City. "If you are intending to enter one house, and have got by mistake into another, it is better, provided you have fairly entered the parlor before perceiving your error, to remain for a short time, as if you intended to pay a visit there, but your visit should not be quite so long."

I confess to a regret that the old and honest way of kissing all the pretty women you meet at a party or call has gone out of fashion. I always liked the Virgin Queen the better for reading that she used particularly to enjoy Leicester's calls and kisses, and the best parts of Mr. Pliny Miles's Travels in Iceland are surely those in which he describes the kissing which took place when he visited his friends in that hospitable region. Indeed, I am at a loss to account for the going out of a fashion which must have been so mutually agreeable as this. I have a bevy of fair cousins, meeting whom I always stick to the good old salutation of a kiss all round. (What would be the use of cousins, I should like to know, if this last privilege were debarred us?) Now, I always noticed that the girls enjoyed my visits exceedingly—all but one. But she had a lover, and some lovers are such stupid creatures that I thought probably he came the jealous dodge over her, poor soul! But I am sorry to say that I have discovered another—possible—cause for her aversion. In one of my manuals of etiquette, I am told that it is very ill-bred to kiss ladies with any degree of vehemence, and this for the reason that such ungentlemanly force sometimes rubs the rouge off the fair cheeks of the kissee! How is this? Did kissing go out because roughing came in? How about good Queen Bess? Did that prudent dame paint in oils? However, says one of my authorities, "though you will frequently find yourself authorized by a certain concurrence of circumstances to kiss a young person of the female sex, this kiss, far from being tinged with gallantry, ought on the contrary to be impressed with all possible respect." To which another adds, that "kissing of the lips is now reserved for lovers, and should scarcely be performed in public."

And speaking of lovers, I am reminded that "good society" gives the gentlemanly swain this caution: "During the period that elapses before the marriage the betrothed man should conduct himself with peculiar deference to the lady's family." This is one of the finest touches I have met, and shows how difficult a matter it is to be a real gentleman.

In all accounts of "good society" great importance is attached to accomplishments. In fact, to quote the elegant language of one of my pet authors, "Though wit and conversation are worth all the amusements a toy-maker could dream of, you [the gentleman, that is] must not forget that the world is mainly peopled with fools, and to appreciate your [gentlemanly] sallies, and join in your [gentlemanly] mirth, requires an amount of sense not to be found in every country bumpkin." And chief among gentlemanly accomplishments, in "good society," is the noble art of self-defense. "Of course," says the latest authority on this point, "to knock a man down is never good manners; but there is a way of doing it gracefully, and one rule should be observed; viz., whether you can command your temper or not, never show it, except by the blow. Never assail an offender with words, nor, when you strike him, use such expressions as, 'Take that,' etc. There are cases in society when it is quite incumbent on you to knock an offender down, if you can, whether you feel angry or not; so that if to do so is not precisely good manners, to omit it is sometimes very bad manners: and to box, and that well, is therefore an important accomplishment, particularly for little men."

Here is the proper place to append a series of hints on matters which would seem to be of minor importance, till it is remembered that the gentleman is known by just such little things; and that good society is rather fond of tripping people up on them, as in the case of an honest English admiral, who incurred the just scorn of all beholders, at an archery meeting, by descending the steps of his carriage stern foremost, as though he had been going down his own main rigging. So an unfortunate habitué of "good society," about whose antecedents nothing definite was known, but whose manners were particularly good, was discovered by an inadvertence in a billiard-room. Entering the room he took up a cue, and placed himself before the marking-board so naturally that at once every gentleman present perceived him to be only a billiard-marker. Now it is as impossible for a billiard-marker to belong to "good society," and be a gentleman—of course unless he were an undoubted millionaire, which alters the case—as it was for Mr. Secretary Craggs, who, having begun life as a footman, once handed some ladies into a carriage, and then, absently, and from mere force of habit, got up behind himself—no doubt to the vast amusement of the gentlemen who looked on.

But to our hints, which should be read with much attention, as they seem to me to contain the very gist and essence of what constitutes "good society."

I find it stated, first, that at dinner, in good society, "soup must be helped with a ladle." My Philadelphia oracle adds that it "should be eaten with a spoon, though some vulgar people make use of a fork!"

Also, it is written, that "gentlemen must never smoke in church;" and that, when dining out, "if your host asks you to smoke, he will generally offer you an old coat for the purpose"—though I should prefer an old cigar. A gentleman "must not smoke in the streets—at least, not in daylight; the deadly crime may be committed, like burglary, after dark, but not before." Thank Heaven, except in Boston, it is not accompanied with the same penalties! And, finally, "you should always smoke a cigar given to you, whether good or bad, and never make any remarks on its quality;" which calls to mind the gentlemanly conduct of an old Scotch peasant, who, having a cigar given him, thought it was to be eaten, and ate it accordingly, much disgusted, but civilly resigned. But I shall never get through if I don't stick better to my text. "Pointing," it appears, "is a habit to be avoided, especially pointing with the thumb over the shoulder, which is an inelegant action."

"A man has no right to take a lady's hand until it is offered. He has even less right to pinch or to retain it;" which I freely admit.

Introductions have a certain awkwardness about them to a man who does not frequent "good society," but all this stiffness is lost when a gentleman is the introducer. "Thus, for instance," a distinguished writer remarks, "in presenting Mr. Jones to Mrs. Smith, you will say, 'Mrs. Smith, allow me to introduce Mr. Jones,' and while they are engaged in bowing, you will murmur, 'Mrs. Smith—Mr. Jones, and escape,'" which I call getting out of a difficulty in the very handsomest manner. It may be well to add that, "in being introduced to a new acquaintance, there should be more dignity and a little more distance in the manner of the married woman than that of the single lady." And as to general manners, it is well to know that "there are modes of salutation which, being too familiar, should be avoided [in good society]; such as clapping a man on the shoulder, digging him in the ribs, etc." Also, "if you go in an omnibus—which a gentleman may do under certain circumstances—it is well to avoid conversation; but if you enter into it, beware of inflammatory subjects. An acquaintance of mine once talked politics to a radical in an omnibus. The two got heated, and more heated, and my acquaintance ended by driving his opponent's head through the window of the vehicle"—which must have been pleasant, to say the least, to the other "ladies and gentlemen" present.

I have already quoted a word or two about "cutting," but am pleased to be able to add some definite rules on the subject. It appears that in good society "a gentleman must never cut a lady under any circumstances. An unmarried lady should never cut a married one. A servant should never cut his master; near relations should never cut one another at all; and a clergyman should never cut any body, because it is at best an unchristian action. Perhaps it may be added that a superior should never cut his inferior in rank; he has many other ways of annihilating him."

This is sufficiently definite, though it rather sadly limits the privileges of the clergy. But the stupid reader will be pleased with the story which follows, and which shows at a glance how a perfect gentleman, and a "Noble Duke" at that, delivers the cut. It appears that an unfortunate "Clerk of the Treasury" of Great Britain, being in the receipt of a good salary, and willing to pay for good company—which I notice is mostly to be had for a sufficient pecuniary consideration—was permitted to dine at the Beef-Steak Club. "He sat next to a noble duke, who, desirous of putting him at his ease, conversed freely with him, yet probably forgot even the existence of such a person half an hour afterwards"—noble dukes having proverbially short memories. "Meeting his Grace in the street some days after, the Clerk of the Treasury accosted him in a familiar manner: 'Ah, my Lord, how do you do?' The Duke looked surprised. "May I know, Sir, to whom I have the honor of speaking?" said his Grace, drawing up. "Oh! why, don't you know? We dined together at the Beef-Steak Club the other evening! I'm Mr. Timms of the Treasury." "Then," said the Duke, turning on his heel, "Mr. Timms of the Treasury, I wish you a good-morning!" I give the story as 'tis written; and surely every well-balanced mind will recognize with delight the fine gentlemanly spirit which actuated both the noble duke and the elegant gentleman who relates the story. The discomfiture of poor presuming Mr. Timms is excessively funny. But if Mr. Timms had possessed the gentlemanly accomplishment of boxing, and had returned the noble duke's "cut" with a knock-down blow? But then Timms was only a common person, and no gentleman. Let us leave him, and turn to pleasanter things—balls and parties, namely.

And here I am able to inform the gentle reader that a gathering of "any number over one hundred constitutes a 'large ball;' below that number it is simply 'a ball,' and under fifty 'a dance.'" It appears also, that, in getting up large balls, young men are at a premium, for which reason it is common to invite your friend to bring his friend—if he dances. But it will be well to intrust this privilege only to young men of tried prudence, for it leads sometimes to disagreeable circumstances, as is shown by a story of a certain Mrs. P——, who had Junot's house in Paris, and in its magnificent rooms gave some of the largest and most brilliant balls, but, owing to the 'friend' system, very mixed. So much so that on one occasion a gentleman went up to her and told her that there was one of the swell mob present. Mrs. P—— was deaf and amiable. "Dear me," she replied, "is there really? I hope he has had some supper." But the disciple of Fagan had taken care of himself; he had not only had supper, but when he had done using his fork and spoon, had, in the neatest manner, put them away in his pocket."

At Mrs. P——'s next ball a policeman stood at the door, and noted the names and descriptions of all who came.

About gentlemanly behavior at balls I find only a few directions worth noting. "If you are prudent you will not dance every dance," advises an English club-man; and another remarks that "a young lady often goes down half-a-dozen times to the supper-room, but she should not do so with the same partner more than once." He adds: "You lead the lady up stairs again, and if you are not wanted there any more, you may steal down and do a little quiet refreshment on your own account. Nothing marks a man so much as gorging at supper." And last, but most important caution of all, "Be careful what you say and how you dance after supper, even more so than before it; for if you in the slightest way displease a young lady, she may fancy that you have been too partial to strong fluids, and ladies never forgive that."

"As to flirtation," continues this sage instructor in morals and manners, "it is difficult to draw a limit where the predilection of the moment becomes the more tender and serious feeling, and flirtation sobers into a more honorable form of devoted attention. I think flirtation comes under the head of morals more than of manners; still I may be allowed to say that ball-room flirtation, being more open, is less dangerous than any other. But a young lady of taste will be careful not to flaunt and publish her flirtation, as if to say, 'See, I have an admirer!' In the same way a prudent man will never presume on a girl's liveliness or banter. No man of taste ever made an offer after supper, and certainly nine-tenths of those who have done so have regretted it at breakfast the next morning."

Be warned, oh young men who "do a little quiet refreshment on your own account." For in such cases regrets are mostly vain.

Balls and parties cost money, and money is sometimes scarce, even in "good society." I am happy to state, however, that provision is made for poor people, and one of the most genial writers on etiquette gives the following charming recipe for cheap yet elegant sociability. "The best way of giving receptions which cost very little, is to fix on some day of the week, and repeat them every time it comes round. You then issue invitations to a very much larger number than your rooms will hold and for the whole course of receptions, so that your friends can choose the weeks most convenient to them. If at the first party you should only have a dozen guests, do not be disheartened. If your rooms are well lit up and well arranged, and yourself agreeable, they will be filled to excess before the middle of the season."

So far I had written, when my old friend Smith came in. I have read that all authors are vain, and I confess that I—if I may for this time rank myself with authors—am but a weak mortal man. In short, I could not help telling Smith that I had been writing an instructive article on Good Society, which I intended to hand in to the editor of Harper's Magazine. I was not so ill-mannered as to read my MS. to Smith, but was desirous to know how it would strike him—he is a fair average sort of man, don't know much, but means well, you know. I therefore handed it to him, when he left me, requesting him to read it to his family, and let me know his opinion. Yesterday morning he returned it to me, by mail, and on opening the parcel I found that he had added what follows below. I do not think what he has written of much importance; but then it would be absurd to expect much of a man like Smith, who, though good enough in his way, is absurdly ignorant of the laws of good society. He writes:

To be a true gentleman is an ambition worthy of the best and greatest men; inasmuch as that term, properly understood, includes the possession of all good and noble qualities of heart and mind. To be gentle to the weak, generous to the poor, and just to all men; to carry the grace of a heartfelt courtesy into all the affairs of life; to restrain the passions and cultivate the nobler sentiments of his nature; to be true without rudeness, honest without self-interest, brave without braggadocio, and polite without servility; to be clean of body, pure of mind, and reverent of heart: this is to be a gentleman. When you meet a man possessed of such qualities, you will care little whether or no his hat be unexceptionable, his neck-tie faultless, his coat from the hands of the alone-fashionable tailor, or his language polished to the smoothness (and inanity) of parlor gossip. Only dandies and other little-minded men—who would have been tailors had not fortune made them geese—are nervous about the cut of a coat or a caper. Napoleon, who, with all his genius, essentially lacked a great soul, and who in his best days was rude to women, could also condescend to prescribe and examine the toilets of his staff and his court ladies; but Washington had a soul above such meanness. Byron wore the finest coat, but Charles Lamb had the truest heart; Burns was a rough plowman, while Beau Brummel was a scented exquisite of “the most perfect manners in the world.” But which of the two is in your mind when you say the word gentleman?

There is a species of rabbit which is valued by fanciers, and raised by breeders, not for its meat, nor for the harmonious beauty of its form or color, but solely for the length of its ears.

So what you, friend Jenkins, call “Good Society” has a way of valuing not the sterling heart, but chiefly the fine coat and silvery speech of its members. But be assured that while money will buy you a tailor, and Mr. Turveydrop and the “American gentleman” (who is ten to one only another dancing-master) may teach you “Deportment,” if you are not honest, if you are not loyal, if your fine manner but hides a cold heart, or your smooth speech a filthy thought, though you may pass current with those who regard a slip from virtue less than an error in grammar, and value bright boots more than a clean heart, you will be, after all, but a wretched donkey, valuable chiefly for your ears.

HOW THE SNOW MELTED ON MOUNT WASHINGTON.

I.

NINE o'clock P.M.

The last stage-coach came rumbling and creaking up to the Crawford House door. Passengers, half roused from torpor, oozed forth, somnambulated with uneven steps, and dreamily performed the act of registration. Avalanches of baggage fell upon the piazzas, and were hurried with something like ferocity by stalwart porters into the spacious hall. Chorus of tinkling bells arose. From drawing-rooms came flocking curious groups to exercise the zealous scrutiny which always on such occasions awaits fresh visitors.

The proprietor stood calmly at his desk, turning over in his mind an oft-recurring problem. Here were a weary dozen to be provided for, and his last apartment had been delivered up a few hours before. Silently he stood, until all names had been recorded, and then spoke thus:

“Gentlemen, I will feed you up to the handle, and you shall stay under my roof; but I can give you no rooms.”

All traces of drowsiness instantly vanished. A confused tumult of expostulation burst forth. Presently indignation took possession of every manly breast.

“Why, landlord, what do you mean?” said one.

“Oh, but you know this is absurd,” said another.

“Perfectly, perfectly,” agreed a third.

“Come, come, landlord, talk sense,” reasoned a fourth, with a momentary show of good-nature.

“Gentlemen,” said the imperturbable proprietor again, “you shall stay under my roof, and I will feed you up to the handle; but I have no rooms.”

The newly-arrived guests, hitherto strangers to one another, were welded into friendship by their common disappointment. They consulted together. Small shot of rage flew about.

“Well, this is infamous.”

“I call it atrocious.”

“It is simply a swindle.”

“He can’t keep a hotel.”

“Not he, indeed.”

All this the lookers-on, who had by lucky accident come in a little ahead, and were now snugly quartered, enjoyed vastly. Perhaps they all had suffered similarly at odd times, which would account for the spirit of Christian sympathy they displayed.

“Gentlemen,” said the landlord once more, “there is not a room to be had; but you shall stay under my roof, and I will feed you up to the handle.”

“The devil take your roof and your handle,” said an aggrieved party.

“And your feed too,” said another.

The end of it was that the landlord had every thing his own way. It is always so, especially in the region of the White Mountains. Six ladies were compressed into one parlor, the floor whereof was densely strewn with mattresses. Five gentlemen were likewise served, to their unspeakable discontent, which they manifested by awful frowns and injurious remarks. These failed to produce effect. The landlord shed insults as the leaf of a cabbage sheds rain drops, leaving not a stain behind.

As soon as this turbulent crowd had dispersed the lookers-on before-mentioned gathered near for purposes of investigation. Each newly-written name was duly weighed and discussed, and its value estimated. Feminine anxiety could be satisfied with no less.

“But there is one vacant room, at least,” suggested a young lady. “It is next mine, and I know it is unoccupied.”

“The only one in the house, mum, and not a good one. Besides, that is kept for Mrs. Wimbleford’s young man, who was to come to-night.”

"For whom?"

"For Aunt Wimbleford's servant," said a second young lady; "that is right."

The inquest ended, and the jury rose.

A few minutes after this a gentleman entered, approached the office, and rapidly wrote his name.

"How are you?" said he, nodding to the landlord.

"How do you do, Sir?" retaliated the landlord.

"Back again, you see," said the new-comer.

"It was stupid on the coach, so I walked the last two miles. What can you do for me? Can you give me number thirty-four? I had thirty-four last time."

"Number thirty-four?" said the landlord, inquiringly.

"Yes, thirty-four, first floor."

"No, Sir, I can not give you number thirty-four."

"Thirty-five, then, or thirty-three?"

"No, Sir; number thirty-five and number thirty-three are occupied."

"Well, something near them, then?"

"I have no room near them, Sir."

"Any thing you have, then; what can you give me?"

"Well, Sir, I can not give you any room at all."

"All gone?"

"All gone, Sir."

The stranger laughed a little, and said:

"Now, old fellow, you're not so much of a brute as you try to make us all believe. You have some close corner somewhere, I know. Come, hunt it up."

The landlord reflected. "There is a small room," said he, with unvarying suavity, "that was held back for Mrs. Wimbleford's young man. Mrs. Wimbleford's young man didn't get off the coach and walk with you, Sir, did he?"

"No."

"Nor before you, I suppose?"

"Nor before me."

"In that case, Sir, I can let you have the room for to-night; but I might have to call upon you to give it up to-morrow."

"All right," said the delighted traveler; "to-morrow I go over the mountain. Fix me for to-night, and I am happy."

II.

Mrs. Horatio Wimbleford never traveled without two (m. and f.) servants. 'Twas a point of dignity she would not relax. Another point was, that she never traveled without her own spoons. The apprehension of at any time admitting spurious metal within her lips constantly beset her.

Mr. Horatio Wimbleford never traveled at all.

Master Horatio, aged sixteen, took charge of his mother and sister in all their rambles. About this time he also exercised protecting influence over his cousin, Miss Mervane, of whom he stood in awe, while at the same time secretly adoring her.

Master Horatio was not firm of temper. Somewhere on the route he had quarreled with man-servant. Man-servant bore much, but at length rebelled. Master Horatio then became irate to that degree that it was necessary to his honor that man-servant be cast adrift. This caused inconvenience, but seemed inevitable. So Mrs. Wimbleford dispatched letters homeward, enjoining Mr. Wimbleford to send a substitute without delay.

Mr. Wimbleford consoled his wandering wife with the assurance that on a certain day the substitute, with credentials, should appear at the point she named, to receive her orders. But before the time or the substitute arrived the Wimbleford family had risen in wrath against the Crawford House proprietor, whose apartments were contracted, and whose manner was not deferential, and had shaken dust from their feet on departure for the other side of Mount Washington. Miss Mervane had declared intentions of crossing the mountain with friends fortunately encountered, and rejoining her cousins in the Glen at the opposite base. She was intrusted with the temporary control of the expected attendant.

III.

Miss Mervane and her friends sat at breakfast.

"Your aunt's servant came, Julia," said one.

"Did he?"

"Yes; I heard him singing opera melodies this morning in the room next mine, and saw him, when I came out, taking in fresh towels at his door."

"Mercy upon us!—the dainty gentleman!"

The dainty gentleman walked in, seated himself close at hand, and was lost in the bill of fare. Next he employed lucre to win the heart of a waiter, and confided to him his desires.

Miss Mervane and Co. found great difficulty in restraining their laughter. This sumptuous conduct on the part of a servant quite overcame them. When the dainty gentleman complained that his napkin was not clean, their mirth was irrepressible. At this he glanced over at them, his eye resting for a moment upon Miss Mervane, who gave her attention to the prospect from the nearest window. It seemed to her that her friend might be in error; the man had hardly the appearance of a menial. She must ascertain.

After breakfast the dainty gentleman immediately accosted her.

"May I ask if this is Miss Mervane?"

"Yes, I am Miss Mervane."

"I am told that you were with Mrs. Wimbleford until yesterday."

"Yes."

"I am anxious to know where I shall find her. I have a note to give her."

It was the substitute, of course, then.

"She has expected you—"

"Indeed!"

"You are to follow her. You will find her at the Glen. I suppose you know the route."

"Well, surely—"

"You can give me the note, if you have it."

"It is for Mrs. Wimbelford; I would prefer to hand it to her."

"Very well;" and the young lady turned her back with ineffable frigidity.

"Excuse me, Miss Mervane; I think you mean to join Mrs. Wimbelford's party again. I have also some hope of joining it. If I can be of any service you must command me. My name is Fletcher."

"None at all, at present;" and Miss Mervane glided away.

"This is airy," said Mr. Fletcher, to himself; and he marched off more erect than was usual or necessary.

"This is worse than the last," said Miss Mervane, "and he was bad enough;" and she amused her friends with a report of the dialogue.

After Mr. Fletcher had been held up to sufficient ridicule, conversation turned upon more important matters.

"We cross the mountain to-day," said one.

"But there are heavy clouds overhead," said another.

"They will pass away by noon."

"And then we shall have no time to descend the other side."

"That is nothing; we will wait all night on the summit, see the sun rise, and go down early to-morrow morning."

At this point guides were consulted. Under pretense of offering occasional opinions, they slyly contrived to agree with the prevailing wish. So the last proposition was adopted, and horses were to be on hand, storms not interfering, just after dinner.

IV.

"The horses are ready," announced the guide.

"And so are we," said four or five ladies, issuing forth in long and hoopless robes.

Mr. Fletcher sat smoking upon the piazza. He beckoned to the guide. "What," said he, "are you going to attempt to take these people up to-day?"

"They want to go," said the guide; "it's no affair of mine."

Mr. Fletcher rose. "Miss Mervane," he said, "I hesitate to offer you any counsel" (with profound emphasis); "but I beg to assure you that I am familiar with these mountains, and that you need more clothing. After the first three miles you will have rain all the way, and the cold will be excessive."

The lady turned to a gentleman of her party: "Is this so?" she asked.

"Let us see what the guide says," was answered.

Mr. Fletcher walked away indignant without saying another word.

The guide admitted that there was something in the suggestion, but refused to acknowledge the probability of rain. This convinced them all that the warning was unworthy their consideration, so they started off, hearts and vesture light.

Half an hour after Mr. Fletcher cleared his brow, settled his bill, and called for a horse, intimating that he was bound over the hills and far away. He made directly for the mountain bridle-path, with which he seemed thoroughly acquainted. The first open space he came to he saw the Mervane party winding and straggling at the distance of about a mile ahead. In little more than an hour he overtook a loiterer. It was Miss Mervane. She turned and saw him.

She was annoyed, and then vexed with herself for being so. What was it about this man that disturbed her? Her impulse at the first was to push on more rapidly; but an afterthought convinced her that dignity would be best preserved by absolute unconsciousness of his presence; which she assumed, but had it not.

Mr. Fletcher, for his part, was turning over a doubtful question. He had observed that, with a carelessness not uncommon, Miss Mervane's saddle-girths had been left precariously loose. Should he tell her? He had been twice rebuffed, and rather badly; was it worth his while to risk a third affront? If the guide had been by he could have directed him to arrange it, but guide and all had disappeared among the turnings of the road. After a while good-nature triumphed. He advanced to the lady's side.

"I think it is proper for me to tell you," said he, as if he had never spoken with her before, and was now mentioning a fact unimportant, but possibly of interest to her, "that your saddle is loose, and you are in danger of falling. If you like, I'll secure it, or I'll send the guide back, if you prefer."

"No," she said, with perfect unconcern; "I like it better as it is."

Fletcher bent his head and hurried forward, less pleased than ever. He astonished his pony by insisting upon a degree of speed wholly at variance with the ordinary rate of mountain travel, and which he did not permit to subside until Miss Mervane had fallen out of view. Soon he came close upon others of her company, and drew rein. As for Miss Mervane, she was now provoked by a pertinacity which, proceeding whence it did, she could not understand, and resolved to check it once for all, next time it should show itself.

Resolutions are good rudders to steer by in a calm.

The air, which for the last half hour had been thick and heavy, now grew rapidly cold. Sharp breezes came sweeping down the mountain, and a little way above great clouds were gathering. Puffs of thinner mist soon descended, and enveloped the ascending party in their damp folds. Mr. Fletcher erected his coat-collar, and drew his shawl closely about him.

As he reached the top of a sudden acclivity the storm beset him. Mingled rain and sleet attacked his face, gusts of wind whistled in his ears and tampered with his costume. It was not comfortable, but still it was not unendurable. He had encountered worse on the same spot, so he whistled a merry defiance to the wind, wiped his eyes clear, and pushed on.

Then a touch of good-nature came upon him again. Likely enough, the young girl behind him was suffering. Spite of her extraordinary temper he would even once more offer her as much comfort as his big shawl could afford. And he pulled up.

He waited so long without seeing her that he became vaguely alarmed, and turning about, began to descend. If he did not meet her soon, he would conclude that the tempest had intimidated her, and that she had returned to whence she had started. But he had gone back only a few rods when he met her, on foot, making her way with difficulty over the loose rocks which filled the path, and looking pale as death.

What Fletcher had foretold had come to pass. On the very verge of the storm-cloud she had attempted to urge her horse to greater speed. He jumped forward a step, the saddle lurched, then slid off to one side, throwing her down among the creature's feet. He, taking advantage of the incident, quietly shook himself, and withdrew in the direction of his stable. Miss Mervane, a little hurt, but more confused and frightened, stood dismayed a moment, and then, gathering up courage and her skirts, strode dauntlessly forward. It was rough work, however, and her spirits sank with each step. Her heart failed her altogether, and she was seized with trembling and terror when Fletcher, returning, came in sight. Then the mouse became a lion again.

The young man, noticing her pallor and apprehending a variety of evils, alighted and approached her. The instant he did this his horse also took opportunity to retreat homeward. Fletcher foreseeing the consequence ran a little distance after him; but four legs being better than two, he soon returned with a very blank face.

"You were right, and I was wrong; it is unfortunate," was the somewhat ungracious remark with which he was received. The wind came screaming down shriller than ever, and he had to shout to be heard in answer.

"Very unfortunate," he said. "I am glad I came back. There is only one thing to be done now. You must consent to be guided by me. Take this shawl, which you need more than I, and I will show you the way down."

Miss Mervane's handsome eyes flashed a little. "No," she said, shortly, "keep your shawl; it is not very cold"—at the same time her shivering lips contradicted her words—"and as for going down, I do not think of it. I-mean to walk up."

"Miss Mervane, this is folly. It is impossible. The storm is now severe, as you see. Well, it will grow worse as you advance. I can not think of permitting you to go on."

Her face, hitherto pale, reddened as she answered, "I intend to go on. They will very soon discover my absence, and send back. I desire that you continue with me, in case of accident."

It was now Fletcher's turn for anger. "I am sorry to find," he said, "so singular an acknowledgment of my thoughtfulness. But this shall not cause me to desert you, because I know you are unconscious of the danger you are venturing into, which is great. If you persist, I will not leave you; but I protest against this folly again and again."

Miss Mervane kept her lips firmly closed, and without speaking again began to ascend. Mr. Fletcher walked near her. For three minutes they struggled and labored onward. The sleet dashed into their faces, piercing their cheeks like needles. The rain penetrated their garments and weighed them down wearily. The winds whirled around them more wildly than before. Their feet failed them upon the slippery rocks.

Suddenly Mr. Fletcher stopped. "This is simply madness," he said; "the path is treacherous, and my eyes are almost blinded. If I were alone, I would not dare to go on. You, Miss Mervane, can not hope to proceed for ten minutes."

"It seems to me, Sir," she said, more chillingly than the bleak wind itself, "that you are afraid."

"Yes," said he, quick and sharp, "I am afraid to see a woman die, with no help near. I am afraid to see a life flung recklessly away!"

For the first time she turned and looked steadily at him. His eye, quite firm and untroubled, met hers; and at the same moment her confidence fell, and she was irresolute.

"I leave it to you," she said; "I think you are right."

"Very well," he answered, quietly, "let us turn."

But at the second step he paused, then glanced nervously around. Then another step, and another pause. Then she saw him stoop down and examine the ground beneath them. After that he stood silently for three or four seconds, and at last thrilled her with these words:

"Miss Mervane, it is no matter which of us leads now. We will do what we can, and that is—nothing. We have lost the path!"

At this the sense of peril overcame her. "What is to be done?" she cried; "what is to be done? Is it hopeless—is there no escape?"

"Not hopeless," he answered; "no, indeed. Our position is awkward, but we must not stand idle. We will try to regain the path, but above all we must not separate. Our voices can not be heard at the least distance, and our eyes will not help us in this storm." Observing a great distress in her countenance, he added, "Don't be disheartened; don't waste strength; but call up all your energies."

Then her better nature showed itself. "I am not a coward," she said; "and for myself, I could bear the result of my rashness. But I feel that I have brought danger, perhaps brought death, upon you. And that," she said, shuddering, "is a crime."

"I have done you wrong," said Fletcher, generously, "and I thank you for putting me right, now. But don't talk of death yet, or at all. We have a great many chances before that."

Although he spoke boldly to reassure her he had no power to conceal his anxiety from himself. The tempest increased, he was benumbed with cold, and the daylight had already begun to fade. Together they groped among the rocks in search of the path, but always unavailingly. The darkness increased. Their eyes were sore with straining.

"I can not stand much longer," said Miss Mervane; "tell me, is there any thing to hope? Tell me the truth."

"We can not find the path," he answered, "but there is one chance left. Come this way," and he led her cautiously down a precipitous ledge of broken rock. Without a question, and without a doubt, she followed.

Without a doubt, so far as his better judgment was concerned; but on another point she began to question herself uneasily.

Was this man what she had supposed him to be?

Had she not been in some way misled? His bearing, his language, his thoughtful devotion were not those of a servant. Oh, it could not be!

And yet he bore credentials for her aunt. She must question him again.

"Was the note you spoke of written by Mr. Wimbelford?"

"What note?" said Fletcher, amazed.

"For Mrs. Wimbelford."

"Oh yes, it was," said he, wondering vastly at the question at such a time.

This, then, was convincing; and yet it was hard to be convinced.

At the foot of the ledge Fletcher paused and took observations.

"What do you mean to do?" asked the lady.

"Do you see," said he, "that the storm comes upon us with less violence? Down here we find a partial shelter. The wind is from our left. We must go to the right. I expect the wall of this ledge shelves in sufficiently to ward off much of its force. At any rate I have no doubt we can escape this distressing sleet."

"And what then?"

"Why then I will seek the least exposed spot. Perhaps we may fall in with some rocky crevice—there are plenty of them near the summit, and plenty here, too, I suppose—tolerably secure from the weather. With my shawl, and overcoat, if necessary, you will contrive to pass the night without severe suffering."

Miss Mervane recoiled with affright. "What! pass the night? It would be as well to reserve your pleasantry, Sir."

Fletcher thought, not very unreasonably, that the time for these exhibitions of feminine humors was gone by; so he said, composedly, "I mean to. Meanwhile, we will go on, if you please."

"Listen a moment, Sir," said Miss Mervane, whose old impulses had taken new possession of her; "this proposition is absurd. I wish you to understand that I know you. I know your position, and I expect you to remember it."

"Miss Mervane," said Fletcher, "you certainly can not expect me to discuss any question whatever at this time. If you do know me, you probably know that, as I am straining every nerve to save both our lives, I can have no thought beyond, whatever you may have. We are too near eternity to be over-delicate."

The retort stung, and she smarted under it. She felt, moreover, that she had compelled it and deserved it; so she only said, "I yield to you, Sir," and inwardly resolved to give over a contest which only revealed her weakness.

After clambering slowly and painfully for ten minutes, they stopped to get breath.

"It is worse," she said; "we are in a hurricane."

"Nevertheless," he answered, "it may be better. By this sudden rush of wind I judge that we are near a sharp corner of the ledge. I look for shelter soon."

And sure enough in five minutes more they stood relieved and much comforted beneath a rugged projecting ridge, around the edge of which, two yards beyond them, the blast sped furiously, passing them untouched.

"See, now, what we have been through," said Fletcher, pointing toward it.

It was now so dark that the nearest objects were but dimly visible. Fletcher prowled a little, and discovered a corner where four or five loose rocks, piled one above the other, gave a slight additional protection. There he conducted Miss Mervane, who seated herself with satisfaction. He handed her his pocket-companion, with a word of advice, "You should drink all you can, at first. Then, if your feet or hands feel stiff with cold, pour a little upon them, without removing boots or gloves. Then drink as much again as before."

She had now time to observe her own extreme discomfort. She shook with cold, head to foot. Seeing this, Fletcher wrapped his great shawl about her, she offering no opposition.

"Do you think they sent back for me?" she asked.

"Who, your friends?"

"Yes, their carelessness is inexcusable; they think only of themselves."

"I suppose they must have sent; but we had lost the path, you know."

"They should have looked to it before. To think that my friends should have deserted me, and that I have only escaped by the aid of a s—stranger."

"That is nothing, Miss Mervane."

"It is every thing, Sir. I assure you that I do not mean to forget it. For a person like you it is noble, and I shall always say so."

"It is nothing. Are you comfortable?"

"Very comfortable now." And then, timidly, "Are you comfortable?"

"Oh yes. I have my coat and every thing; I am well enough."

"Because I do not wish you to deprive yourself of your shawl, if you need it."

"No, indeed." Then, after a pause, "Can you sleep, Miss Mervane?"

"Sleep, no; I would not go to sleep for the world—that is, I could not. I have no desire to."

"The accommodations are spacious, but not luxurious," said Mr. Fletcher. "Nature is not an obliging landlord; we have only beds of granite and sheets of rain."

Miss Mervane was not yet prepared to enter into general conversational relations with her protector, so she was silent. In a few minutes she, who would not go to sleep for the world, was breathing regularly in a sound slumber.

V.

About five o'clock the next morning Miss Mervane moved, stretched out her hand, scratched it against a sharp stone, and with a little cry awoke.

She half rose, and, after a hasty review of some of the strangest incidents of her life, came finally to this, the strangest of all, and began to recognize the real condition of affairs. First she saw with joy that the sun was shining in the distant east. Then she proceeded to disencumber herself of her swathings. What! here was a heavy coat spread over her feet; how came that? The shawl she knew about, but the coat? Ah, it was this man's tender solicitude. What should she do? How was it proper for her to thank him?

Oh, most mean question for her to ask herself. To take thought of how to acknowledge the preservation of her life without self-degradation. Miss Mervane was agitated by a struggle between gratitude and Grundy. Her social education had taught her one thing, her heart told her another. She sprang up and looked for Fletcher.

He was standing at some distance, apparently enjoying the view. As soon as he saw her he drew near.

"I have no words to thank you," she said, with true emotion; "I have no need to thank you, for all that I can say will fall far short of what you know I must feel."

Mr. Fletcher looked around as if anxious to escape. He evaded a reply.

"I hope you are rested?"

"Yes, indeed."

"Were you cold?"

"No, your care prevented that. Take your coat; you were wrong to leave it."

"Oh, my coat—why, so I did. I guess I forgot it."

She looked very benevolently at him. "And how did you sleep?"

"I, why, the truth is, I have not been asleep."

"Not slept at all?"

"No; you see I thought they might be out in search of you, and in that case their shouts might have reached here. It would have saved us a good deal of discomfort."

"Yes, I think I understand."

"Are you able to go down now?"

"Can you find the way?"

"Oh, it's quite clear. I have been over to the path this morning."

"Is it so? Well, let us go down."

Presently they started. Mr. Fletcher stooped and picked up a lump of snow, which he had found a few rods off, and had brought along in his handkerchief. "I thought you would like to see what sort of storm you went through," said he; "this fell and collected last night. Pretty well for August, but not uncommon here. I'll try to take it down, but it seems to be melting."

"Yes," said she, "the snow is melting."

They went a long distance, seldom speaking. When they were well off the rocks, and on solid soil, Fletcher said,

"It is warmer here. You have no need of that heavy shawl. Let me have it."

"When it is useful you give it to me. When it is an inconvenience you take it yourself; no, no."

But Fletcher insisted, and she gave it up.

"We are not far from the hotel," said he, some time after; "fortunately it is yet early. You will not be troubled by so many questions."

He opened his handkerchief. "No use," he said; "see, the snow has melted."

"It has, it has!" said she, with earnestness that astonished him.

VI.

"Sit you here," said Mr. Fletcher, leading her to the parlor fireside, "while I re-engage your room."

But as he turned to go his cheeks and lips whitened, his limbs shook, and he sank down, incapable of motion, on a chair.

"What is the matter? Good Heaven! what has happened?" said Miss Mervane, starting up.

"It is only a little cold," he answered—"a mere chill, a thing of a minute, nothing to be feared"—and, attempting to rise, he showed exactly how little there was to apprehend by falling back, insensible.

A few persons clustered around. One brought water which Miss Mervane bestowed upon his countenance. He revived a little, and she flew to the office, where the impassive proprietor stood levigating his hands as usual.

"What rooms are there?" she asked.

"Very few, mum."

"Is the one I had still vacant?"

"That one is, mum."

"Send at once to the parlor, and have the gentleman who is ill carefully assisted to it. Quick, if you please, there is no time for delay."

"But you will want a room, mum."

"Anything will do for me; only lose no time, now."

All was done as she bade.

"Now," she continued, "is there a physician in the house?"

"There almost always is one with us, mum; I will see."

On investigation, it appeared that there was a physician. Miss Mervane sent for him, and implored him to look most kindly after Mr. Fletcher. "He has saved my life," she said, "by risking his. Last night in the storm, he threw off all his outer clothing to protect me. He is very ill; but not so ill, I am sure, that you can not restore him if you try, Sir."

The doctor was a pleasant old gentleman. "To be sure," said he, "to be sure. He shall be all right as soon as I see him. Where is he? Don't you cry, my dear, but show me where he is. Ah, very well."

Miss Mervane returned to the parlor to receive the congratulations, and answer the inquiries of a feminine crowd that was lying in wait for her. As she stood among them, she remembered for the first time since her arrival that her costume was inelegant, and her condition damp. A tremor passed over her. Never before, within remembrance, had she been for an entire hour heedless of her external self. She was sore afflicted, for her trunks had been sent to meet her at the Glen. She whispered her wants, and a score of sympathetic hearts were opened to her. From the invitations that came upon her she selected one to accept, and disappeared.

Half an hour later she emerged, freshly adorned and blooming. She sought the doctor, and questioned him.

"He is well enough, my dear. A little shaky, but not much. A couple of days' repose will set him up again."

"Oh, thank you, doctor, I am very glad."

"Perhaps it would do him no harm if you should look in upon him a minute."

"Oh no, doctor, I could not do that."

"Very well, he must wait then, I suppose."

"Did he say he wished to see me, then?"

"No, indeed; he seemed to believe you had suffered more than he, and wanted me to look after you most. I thought it might relieve him to see how well you evidently are."

"Doctor, since you say it is necessary to his recovery that he should see me, it would be wrong for me to refuse. I will go with you."

The doctor laughed a little, and led the way. "Here is a visitor for you, Mr. Invalid," he said.

"Ah, Miss Mervane, this is good of you."

His voice was firm enough, but his hand, which rested upon his pillow, shook in a manner which he could not control. It was plain that his strength had been greatly overtaken.

"Is this dangerous?" she asked the doctor, aside.

"Not a bit," said he, "not a bit;" and he went away.

Then Miss Mervane was frightened. It would not do, however, for her to follow without a grateful word.

"What can I do for you, Sir?" said she. "There is nothing you can ask for that shall not be ready for you. I am very sorry to see you thus."

"Nothing, thank you," he answered, "except, perhaps, to look at this note. I hope you will forgive me for saying that I refused to give it up yesterday, because—well, because you demanded it rather oddly. But as we are likely to be acquainted without Mrs. Wimbleford's intervention, I wish you would read it now."

He pointed to it lying upon a table. "With some trepidation she took it and read:

"MY DEAR MARIA,—The gentleman who bears this is Mr. Frank Fletcher, who has just returned from abroad, and whose family I have long known. He would be pleased to join your party. He has a sort of claim on Julia, for he has been traveling with her brother on most intimate terms for many months. I recommend him to your attention.

HORATIO WIMBLEFORD.

"Your letters tell me that your movements will be so uncertain, and your return so speedy, that I have determined not to send the servant. He will remain here.

"New York, August 17."

After the fifth perusal, Miss Mervane took courage and looked up. Meeting Mr. Fletcher's eye, she became once more intent upon the writing.

"Why, it interests you," he said.

"Mr. Fletcher," she said, "I find that I am not the first of my family toward whom you have acted nobly."

"What do you mean?" he asked.

"My brother has told me of much that you have done for him. I have often heard of you, Sir."

"Oh, why speak of that?"

"But why did you let me remain ignorant this while? You should have told me who you were."

"I mentioned my name."

"How could I know? Listen, Mr. Fletcher, there has been a great mistake. It is not a pleasant thing for me to do, but I am going to explain it all to you. I hope I can partly excuse some of my great rudeness."

"Oh, Miss Mervane—"

"Please listen, Mr. Fletcher;" and she laid open to him in a few words the entire mystery. He did not appear to regard it with much concern.

"To think," she said, "that I took you for a servant, and treated you worse than one. I ought to be your servant," she added, with roses in her face, "all my life."

VII

That afternoon Miss Mervane's friends, frightened far away out of their wits, came down the mountain in search of her. At sight of her they melted into tears, and one or two gave hysterical symptoms. Miss Mervane took it quite coolly, and reminded them that this excessive anxiety would have been better shown before. She begged that they would no longer consider her a burden upon them, as she had sent for her aunt to return, and expected her without delay. Then ensued little heart-rending scenes, followed by most affecting reconciliations, and expressions of admiration respecting Mr. Fletcher.

The next day the Wimblefords reappeared. Mrs. Horatio was full of thankfulness for her niece's preservation. She admitted that the young gentleman had conducted himself with much propriety. She would cause her gratitude to be conveyed to him on an enameled card. But one thing there was which shocked her beyond measure. That her niece had passed a night upon a mountain with a stranger, even one so exemplary as this Mr. Fletcher, near her, was a circumstance which carried great discomfort to her breast. She hinted her sufferings to Miss Mervane.

"Perhaps, aunt," said that young lady, with roses in her face again, "perhaps"—and she whispered the rest.

"Oh, if that is to be the case," said Mrs. Wimbledford, pacified, "then I have nothing more to say."

THE THREE GREAT VOYAGES.

THE DISCOVERY OF AMERICA, THE DOUBLING OF THE CAPE, AND THE CIRCUMNAVIGATION OF THE EARTH.*

THE advancement of Europe in civilization did not take place, as is commonly supposed, through the influence of Constantinople and Rome, but through that of the Spanish Arabs. The South of France was first affected, then Sicily was involved, and the movements of Frederick II. in his disputes with the Popes, the establishment of Mohammedan colonies in Italy, the marching of large bodies of Saracen troops in all directions through that peninsula, aided by the propitious state of the northern Italian towns, not only made those places foci of light, but eventually revolutionized the Papacy itself, imparting to it tendencies signally seen in the pontificates of Nicolas V. and Leo X. The Mohammedans were the authors of our physical science, the founders of our modern industrial system.

At the time of which we are speaking the commerce of the Mediterranean was chiefly in two directions. The ports of the Black Sea furnished suitable dépôts for produce brought down the Tanais and other rivers, and for a large portion of the India trade that had come across the Caspian. The seat of this commerce was Genoa.

The other direction was the southeast. The shortest course to India was down the Euphrates and the Persian Gulf, but the Red and Arabian seas offered a cheaper and safer route. In the ports of Syria and Egypt were, therefore, found the larger part of the commodities of India. This trade centred in Venice. A vast development had been given to it through the Crusades, the Venetians probably finding in the transport service of the Holy Wars as great a source of profit as in the India trade.

Toward the latter part of the fourteenth century it became apparent that the commercial rivalry between Venice and Genoa would terminate to the disadvantage of the latter. The interruption of the Tartars and invasion of the Turks had completely dislocated her Asiatic lines of trade. In the wars between the two republics Genoa had suffered severely. Partly for this reason, and partly through the advantageous treaties that Venice had made with the Sultans, giving her the privilege of consulates at Alexandria and Damascus, this republic had at last attained a supremacy over all competitors. The Genoese establishments on the Black Sea had become worthless.

With ruin before them, and unwilling to yield their Eastern connections, the merchants of Genoa had tried to retrieve their affairs by war; her practical sailors saw that she might be re-established in another way. There were among them some who were well acquainted with the globular form of the earth, and with what had been done by the Mohammedan astronomers for determining its circumference by the measurement of a degree on the shore of the Red Sea. These men originated the attempt to reach India by sailing to the west.

By two parties, the merchants and the clergy, their suggestions were received with little favor. The former gave no encouragement, perhaps because such schemes were unsuited to their existing arrangements; the latter disliked them because of their suspected irreligious nature. The globular form had been condemned by the Fathers from Lactantius and Augustine. In the Patristic Geography the earth is a flat surface bordered by the waters of the sea, on the yielding support of which rests the crystalline dome of the sky. These doctrines were for the most part supported by passages from the Holy Scriptures, perversely wrested from their proper meaning. Thus Cosmas Indicopleustes, whose Patristic Geography had been an authority for nearly eight hundred years, unanswerably disposed of the sphericity of the earth by demanding of its advocates how, in the day of judgment, men on the other side of a globe could see the Lord descending through the air!

Among the Genoese sailors thus seeking the welfare of their city was one destined for immortality—Christopher Columbus.

His father was a wool-comber, yet not a man of the common sort, for he procured for his son a knowledge of arithmetic, drawing, painting; and Columbus is said to have written a singularly beautiful hand. For a short time he was at the University of Pavia, but he went to sea at fourteen. After being engaged in the Syrian trade for many years, he had made several voyages to Guinea, occupying his time when not at sea in the construction of charts for sale, thereby supporting not only himself, but also his aged father, and finding means for the education of his brothers. Under these circumstances he had obtained a competent knowledge of geography, and though the state of public opinion at the time did not permit such doctrines to be openly avowed, he believed that the sea is every where navigable, that the earth is round and not flat, that there are antipodes, that the torrid zone is habitable, and that there is a proportionable distribution of land in the northern and southern hemispheres. Adopting the Patristic logic when it suited his purpose, he reasoned that since the earth is made for man, it is not likely that its surface is too largely covered with water, and that if there are lands, they must be inhabited, since the command was renewed at the flood that man should replenish the earth. He asked, "Is it likely that the sun shines upon nothing, and that the nightly watches of the stars are wasted on trackless seas and desert lands?" But to this reasoning he added facts that were more substantial. One Martin Vincent, who had sailed many miles to the west of the Azores, related to him that he had found, floating on the sea, a piece of timber carved evidently without iron. Another sailor, Pedro Correa, his brother-in-law, had met with enormous canes. On the coast of Flores the sea had cast up two dead men with large faces, of a strange aspect. Columbus appears to have formed his theory that the East Indies could be reached by sailing to the west about A.D. 1474. He was at that time in correspondence with Toscanelli, the Florentine astronomer, who held the same doctrine, and who sent him a map or chart constructed on the travels of Marco Polo. He offered his services first to his native city, then to Portugal, then to Spain, and, through his brother, to England; his chief inducement in each instance being that the riches of India might be thus secured. In Lisbon he had married. While he lay sick near Belem an unknown voice whispered to him, in a dream, "God will cause thy name to be wonderfully resounded through the earth, and will give thee the keys of the gates of the ocean, which are closed with strong chains." The death of his wife appears to have broken the last link which held him to Portugal, where he had been since 1470. One evening, in the autumn of 1485, a man of majestic presence, pale, careworn, and, though in the meridian of life, with silver hair, leading a little boy by the hand, asked alms at the gate of the Franciscan convent near Palos—not for himself, but only a little bread and water for his child. This was that Columbus destined to give to Europe a new world.

In extreme poverty he was making his way to the Spanish court. After many wearisome delays his suit was referred to a Council at Salamanca; before whom, however, his doctrines were confuted from the Pentateuch, the Psalms, the Prophecies, the Gospels, the Epistles, and the writings of the Fathers—St. Chrysostom, St. Augustine, St. Jerome, St. Gregory, St. Basil, St. Ambrose. Moreover, they were demonstrably inconsistent with reason; since, if even he should depart from Spain, "the rotundity of the earth would present a kind of mountain up which it was impossible for him to sail, even with the fairest wind;" and so he could never get back. The Grand Cardinal of Spain had also indicated their irreligious nature; and Columbus began to fear that, instead of receiving aid as a discoverer, he should fall into trouble as a heretic. However, after many years of mortification and procrastination, he at length prevailed with Queen Isabella; and on April 17, 1492, in the field before Granada, then just wrenched from the Moors by the arms of Ferdinand and Isabella, he received his commission. With a nobleness of purpose he had desired no reward unless he should succeed; but, in that case, stipulated that he should have the title of Admiral and Viceroy, and that his perquisite should be one-tenth of all he should discover—conditions which show what manner of man this great sailor was. He had bound himself to contribute one-eighth to the expenses of the expedition: this he accomplished through the Pinzons of Palos, an old and wealthy seafaring family. These arrangements once ratified, he lost not a moment in completing the preparations for his expedition. The royal authority enabled him to take—forcibly, if necessary—both ships and men. But even with that advantage, he would hardly have succeeded if the Pinzons had not joined heartily with him, personally sharing in the dangers of the voyage.

The sun, by journeying to the west, rises on India at last. On Friday, August 3, 1492, the weary struggles and heart-sickness of eighteen years of supplication were over; and as the day was breaking Columbus sailed with three little ships from Palos, carrying with him charts constructed on the basis of that which Toscanelli had formerly sent, and also a letter to the Grand Khan of Tartary. On the 9th he saw the Canaries, being detained among them three weeks by the provisioning and repairing of his ships. He left them September 6th, escaping the pursuit of some caravels sent out by the Portuguese Government to intercept him. He now steered due west. Nothing of interest occurred until night-fall on September 13th, when he remarked with surprise that the needle, which the day before had pointed due north, was varying half a point to the west, the effect becoming more and more marked as the expedition advanced. He was now beyond the track of any former navigator, and with no sure guide but the stars; the heaven was every where, and every where the sea. On Sunday, 16th, he encountered many floating weeds, and picked up what was mistaken for a live grasshopper. For some days the weeds increased in quantity, and retarded the sailing of the ships. On the 19th two pelicans flew on board. Thus far he had had an easterly wind, but on September 20th it changed to southwest, and many little birds, such as those that sing in orchards, were seen. His men now became mutinous, and reproached the King and Queen for trusting to "this bold Italian, who wanted to make a great lord of himself at the price of their lives."

On September 25th Pinzon reported to him that he thought he saw land; but it proved to be only clouds. With great difficulty he kept down his mutinous crew. On October 2d he observed the sea-weeds drifting from east to west. Pinzon having seen in the Pinta a flight of parrots going to the southwest, the course was altered on October 7th, and he steered after them west-southwest—he had hitherto been in the parallel 26° N. On the evening of October 11 the signs of land had become so unmistakable that, after vesper hymn to the Virgin, he made an address of congratulation to his crew, and commended watchfulness to them. His course was now due west. A little before midnight Columbus, on the forecable of his ship, saw a moving light at a distance; and two hours after a signal-gun was fired from the Pinta—a sailor, Rodrigo de Triana, had descried land. The ships were laid to. As soon as day dawned they made it out to be a verdant island. There were naked Indians upon the beach watching their movements. At sunrise, October 12, 1492, the boats were manned and armed, and Columbus was the first European to set foot on the new tropical world.

The chief events of the voyage of Columbus were—1st. The discovery of the line of no magnetic variation; which, as we shall see, eventually led to the circumnavigation of the earth. 2d. The navigability of the sea to the remote west, the weeds not offering any insuperable obstruction. When the ships left Palos it was universally believed that the final border or verge of the earth is where the western sky rests upon the sea, and the air and clouds, fogs and water are commingled. Indeed that boundary could not actually be attained; for, long before it was possible to reach it, the sea was confused with inextricable weeds, through which a ship could not pass. This legend was perhaps derived from the stories of adventurous sailors, who had been driven by stress of weather toward the Sargasso Sea, and seen an island of weeds many hundreds of square miles in extent—green meadows floating in the ocean. 3d. As to the new continent, Columbus never knew the nature of his own discovery. He died in the belief that it was actually some part of Asia; Americus Vesputius entertained the same misconception. Their immediate successors supposed that Mexico was the Quinsay, in China, of Marco Polo. For this reason I do not think that the severe remark that the “name of America is a monument of human injustice” is altogether merited. Had the true state of things been known, doubtless the event would have been different. The name of America first occurs in an edition of Ptolemy's Geography, on a map by Hylacomylus.

Two other incidents of no little interest followed this successful voyage: The first was the destruction of Patristic Geography; the second was the consequence of the flight of Pinzon's parrots. Though, as we now know, the conclusion that India had been reached was not warranted by the facts; it was on all sides admitted that the old doctrine was overthrown, and that the Admiral had reached Asia by sailing to the west. This necessarily implied the globular form of the earth. As to the second, never was an augury more momentous than that flight of parrots. It has been well said that this event determined the distribution of Latin and German Christianity in the New World.

The discovery of America by Leif, the son of Eric the Red, A.D. 1000, can not diminish the claims of Columbus. The wandering Scandinavians had reached the shores of America first in the vicinity of Nantucket, and had given the name of Vinland to the region from beyond Boston to the south of New York. But the memory of these voyages seems totally to have passed away, or the lands were confounded with Greenland, to which Nicolas V. had appointed a bishop A.D. 1448. Had these traditions been known to or respected by Columbus, he would undoubtedly have steered his ships more to the north.

Immediately on the return of Columbus, March 15, 1493, the King and Queen of Spain dispatched an ambassador to Pope Alexander VI. for the purpose of insuring their rights to the new territories, on the same principle that Martin V. had already given to the King of Portugal possession of all lands he might discover between Cape Bojador and the East Indies, with plenary indulgence for the souls of those who perished in the conquest. The pontifical action was essentially based on the principle that pagans and infidels have no lawful property in their lands and goods, but that the children of God may rightfully take them away. The bull that was issued bears date May, 1493. Its principle is, that all countries under the sun are subject of right to Papal disposal. It gives to Spain, in the fullness of apostolic power, all lands west and south of a line drawn from the Arctic to the Antarctic pole, one hundred leagues west of the Azores. The donation includes, by the authority of Almighty God, whatever there is toward India, but saves the existing rights of any Christian princes. It forbids, under pain of excommunication, any one trading in that direction, threatening the indignation of Almighty God and his holy apostles Peter and Paul. It directs the barbarous nations to be subdued, and no pains to be spared for reducing the Indians to Christianity.

This suggestion of the line of no magnetic variation was due to Columbus, who fell into the error of supposing it to be immovable. The infallibility of the Pontiff not extending to matters of science, he committed the same mistake. In a few years it was discovered that the line of no variation was slowly moving to the east. It coincided with the meridian of London in 1662.

The obstacles that Patristic Geography had thrown in the way of maritime adventure were thus finally removed, but Patristic Ethnology led to a fearful tragedy. With a critical innocence that seems to have overlooked physical impossibilities and social difficulties, it had been the practice to refer the peopling of nations to the legendary heroes of mythology, or to the patriarchs of Scripture. The French were descended from Francus, the son of Hector; the Britons from Brutus, the son of Æneas; the genealogy of the Saxon kings could be given up to Adam; but it may excite our mirthful surprise that the conscientious Spanish chronicles could rise no higher than to Tubal, the grandson of Noah. The divisions of the Old World, Asia, Africa, and Europe, were assigned to the three sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japheth; and the parentage of those continents was given to those patriarchs respectively. In this manner all mankind were brought into a family relationship, all equally the descendants of Adam, equally participators in his sin and fall. As long as it was supposed that the lands of Columbus were a part of Asia there was no difficulty; but when the true position and relations of the American Continent were discovered, that it was separated from Asia by an impassable waste of waters of many thousand miles, how did the matter stand with the new-comers thus suddenly obtruded on the scene? The voice of the Fathers was altogether against the possibility of their Adamic descent. St. Augustine had denied the globular form and the existence of Antipodes; for it was impossible that there should be people on what was thus vainly asserted to be the other side of the earth, since none such are mentioned in the Scriptures. The lust of gold was only too ready to find its justification in the obvious conclusion; and the Spaniards, with an appalling atrocity, proceeded to act toward these unfortunates as though they did not belong to the human race. Already their lands and goods had been taken from them by apostolic authority. Their persons were next seized, under the text that the heathen are given as an inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for a possession. It was one unspeakable outrage, one unutterable ruin, without discrimination of age or sex. They who died not under the lash in a tropical sun died in the darkness of the mine. From sequestered sandbanks, where the red flamingo fishes in the gray of the morning; from fever-stricken mangrove thickets, and the gloom of impenetrable forests; from hiding-places in the clefts of rocks, and the solitude of invisible caves; from the eternal snows of the Andes, where there was no witness but the all-seeing sun, there went up to God a last cry of human despair. By millions upon millions whole races and nations were remorselessly cut off. The Bishop of Chiapa affirms that more than fifteen millions were exterminated in his time! From Mexico and Peru a civilization that might have instructed Europe was crushed out. Is it for nothing that Spain has been made a hideous skeleton among living nations, a warning spectacle to the world? Had not her punishment overtaken her, men would have surely said, "There is no Retribution, there is no God!" It has been her evil destiny to ruin two civilizations, Oriental and Occidental, and to be ruined thereby herself. With circumstances of dreadful barbarity she expelled the Moors, who had become children of her soil by as long a residence as the Normans have had in England from William the Conqueror to our time. In America she destroyed races more civilized than herself. Expulsion and emigration have deprived her of her best blood, her great cities have sunk into insignificance, and towns that once had more than a million of inhabitants can now only show a few scanty thousands.

The discovery of America agitated Europe to its deepest foundations. All classes of men were affected. The populace went wild at once with a lust of gold and a love of adventure. Well might Pomponius Lætus, under process for his philosophical opinions in Rome, shed tears of joy when tidings of the great event reached him; well might Leo X., a few years later, sit up till far in the night reading to his sister and his Cardinals the "Oceanica" of Anghiera.

If Columbus failed in his attempt to reach India by sailing to the west, Vasco de Gama succeeded by sailing to the south. He doubled the Cape of Good Hope, and retraced the track of the ships of Pharaoh Neco, which had accomplished the same undertaking two thousand years previously. The Portuguese had been for long engaged in an examination of the coast of Africa under the bull of Martin V., which recognized the possibility of reaching India by passing round that continent. It is an amusing instance of making scientific discoveries by contract, that King Alphonso made a bargain with Ferdinand Gomez of Lisbon for the exploration of the African coast, the stipulation being that he should discover not less than three hundred miles every year, and that the starting-point should be Sierra Leone.

We have seen that a belief in the immobility of the line of no magnetic variation had led Pope Alexander VI. to establish a perpetual boundary between the Spanish and Portuguese possessions and fields of adventure. That line he considered to be the natural boundary between the eastern and western hemispheres. An accurate determination of longitude was therefore a national as well as a nautical question. Columbus had relied on astronomical methods; Gilbert at a subsequent period proposed to determine it by magnetical observations. The variation itself could not be accounted for on the amusing doctrine vulgarly received that magnetism is an effluvium issuing forth from the tail of the Little Bear, but was scientifically though erroneously explained by Gilbert's hypothesis that earthy substance is attractive, that a needle approaching a continent will incline toward it; and hence that in the midst of the Atlantic, being equally disturbed by Europe and America, it will point evenly between both.

Pedro de Covilho had sent word to King John II., from Cairo, by two Jews, Rabbi Abraham and Rabbi Joseph, that there was a South Cape of Africa which could be doubled. They brought with them an Arabic map of the African coast. This was about the time that Bartholomew Diaz had reached the Cape in two little pinnaces of fifty tons apiece. He sailed August, 1486, and returned December, 1487, with an account of his discovery. Covilho had learned from the Arabian mariners, who were perfectly familiar with the east coast, that they had frequently been at the South of Africa, and that there was no difficulty in passing round the continent that way.

A voyage to the south is even more full of portents than one to the west. The accustomed heavens seem to sink away, and new stars are nightly approached. Vasco de Gama set sail July 9, 1497, with three ships and 160 men, having with him the Arab map. King John had employed his Jewish physicians, Roderigo and Joseph, to devise what help they could from the stars. They applied the astrolabe to marine use, and constructed tables. These were the same doctors who had told him that Columbus would certainly succeed in reaching India, and advised him to send out a secret expedition in anticipation, which was actually done, though it failed through want of resolution in its captain. Encountering the usual difficulties, tempestuous weather and a mutinous crew, who conspired to put him to death, de Gama succeeded, November 20, in doubling the Cape. On March 1 he met seven small Arab vessels, and was surprised to find that they used the compass, quadrants, sea-charts, and "had divers maritime mysteries not short of the Portugals." With joy he soon after recovered sight of the northern stars, for so long unseen. He now bore away to the north-east, and on May 19, 1498, reached Calicut on the Malabar coast.

The consequences of this voyage were to the last degree important. The commercial arrangements of Europe were completely dislocated; Venice was deprived of her mercantile supremacy; the hatred of Genoa was gratified; prosperity left the Italian towns; Egypt, hitherto supposed to possess a pre-eminent advantage as offering the best avenue to India, suddenly lost her position; the commercial monopolies so long in the hands of the European Jews were broken down. The discovery of America and passage of the Cape were the first steps of that prodigious maritime development soon exhibited by Western Europe. And since commercial prosperity is forthwith followed by the production of men and concentration of wealth, and, moreover, implies an energetic intellectual condition, it appeared before long that the three centres of population, of wealth, of intellect, were shifting westwardly. The front of Europe was suddenly changed; the British islands, hitherto in a sequestered and eccentric position, were all at once put in the van of the new movement.

Commercial rivalry had thus passed from Venice and Genoa to Spain and Portugal. The circumnavigation of the earth originated in a dispute between these latter kingdoms respecting the Molucca Islands, from which nutmegs, cloves, and mace, were obtained. Ferdinand and Magellan had been in the service of the King of Portugal; but an application he had made for an increase of half a ducat a month in his stipend having been refused, he passed into the service of the King of Spain along with one Ruy Falero, a friend of his, who, among the vulgar, bore the reputation of a conjurer or magician, but who really possessed considerable astronomical attainments, devoting himself to the discovery of improved means for finding the place of a ship at sea. Magellan persuaded the Spanish government that the Spice Islands could be reached by sailing to the west, the Portuguese having previously reached them by sailing to the east, and if this were accomplished Spain would have as good a title to them, under the Bull of Alexander VI., as Portugal. Five ships, carrying 237 men, were accordingly equipped, and on August 10, 1519, Magellan sailed from Seville; the Trinitie was the admiral's ship, but the San Vittoria was destined for immortality. He struck boldly for the southwest, not crossing the trough of the Atlantic as Columbus had done, but passing down the length of it, his aim being to find some cleft or passage in the American continent through which he might sail into the great south sea. For seventy days he was becalmed under the line! He then lost sight of the north star, but courageously held on toward the "pole antartike." He nearly foundered in a storm "which did not abate, till the three fires called St. Helen, St. Nicholas, and St. Clare, appeared playing in the rigging of the ships." In a new land, to which he gave the name of Patagoni, he found giants "of good corporature" clad in skins, one of them, a very pleasant and tractable giant, was terrified at his own visage in a looking-glass. Among the sailors, alarmed at the distance they had come, mutiny broke out, requiring the most unflinching resolution in the commander for its suppression. In spite of his watchfulness, one ship deserted him and stole back to Spain. His perseverance and resolution were at last rewarded by the discovery of the strait named by him San Vittoria in affectionate honor of his ship, but which, with a worthy sentiment, other sailors soon changed to "the Strait of Magellan." On November 28, 1520, after a year and a quarter of struggling, he issued forth from its western portals and entered the great south sea, shedding tears of joy, as Pigafetti, an eye-witness, relates, when he recognized its infinite expanse—tears of stern joy that it had pleased God to bring him at length where he might grapple with its unknown dangers. Admiring its illimitable but placid surface, and exulting in the meditation of its secret perils soon to be tried, he courteously imposed on it the name it is forever to bear, "The Pacific Ocean." While baffling for an entry into it, he observed with surprise that in the month of October the nights are only four hours long, and "considered, in this his navigation, that the pole antartike hath no notable star like the pole artike, but that there be two clouds of little stars somewhat dark in the midst, also a cross of fine clear stars, but that here the needle becomes so sluggish that it needs must be moved with a bit of loadstone before it will rightly point."

And now the great sailor, having burst through the barrier of the American continent, steered for the northwest, attempting to regain the equator. For three months and twenty days he sailed on the Pacific, and never saw inhabited land. He was compelled by famine to strip off the pieces of skin and leather wherewith his rigging was here and there bound, to soak them in the sea and then soften them with warm water, so as to make a wretched food; to eat the sweepings of the ship and other loathsome matter; to drink water gone putrid by keeping; and yet he resolutely held on his course, though his men were dying daily. As is quaintly observed, their gums grew over their teeth, and so they could not eat. He estimated that he sailed over this unfathomable sea not less than 12,000 miles.

In the whole history of human undertakings there is nothing that exceeds, if indeed there is any thing that equals, this voyage of Magellan's. That of Columbus dwindles away in comparison. It is a display of superhuman courage, superhuman perseverance—a display of cold intellect not to be diverted from its purpose by any motive or any suffering, but inflexibly persisting to its end. Well might his despairing sailors come to the conclusion that they had entered on a trackless waste of waters, endless before them and hopeless in a return. "But though the Church hath evermore from Holy Writ affirmed that the earth should be a wide-spread plain bordered by the waters, yet he comforted himself when he considered that, in the eclipses of the moon, the shadow cast of the earth is round; and as is the shadow, such in like manner is the substance." It was a stout heart—a heart of triple brass—which could thus, against such authority, extract unyielding faith from a shadow.

Such unparalleled resolution met its reward at last. Magellan reached a group of islands north of the equator—the Ladrões. In a few days more he became aware that his labors had been successful; he met with adventurers from Sumatra. But though he had thus grandly accomplished his object, it was not given to him to complete the circumnavigation of the globe. At an island called Zebu, or Mutan, he was killed; either, as has been variously related, in a mutiny of his men, or—as they declared—in a conflict with the savages, or insidiously by poison. "The General," they said, "was a very brave man, and received his death-wound in his front; nor would the savages yield up his body for any ransom." Through treason and revenge it is not unlikely that he fell, for he was a stern man; none but a very stern man could have accomplished so daring a deed. Hardly was he gone when his crew learned that they were actually in the vicinity of the Moluccas, and that the object of their voyage was fulfilled. On the morning of November 8, 1521, having been at sea two years and three months, as the sun was rising they entered Tidore, the chief port of the Spice Islands. The King of Tidore swore upon the Koran alliance to the King of Spain.

I need not allude to the wonderful objects—destined soon to become common to voyagers in the Indian Archipelago—that greeted their eyes:

elephants in trappings; vases, and vessels of porcelain; birds of Paradise, "that fly not, but be blown by the wind;" exhaustless stores of the coveted spices, nutmegs, mace, cloves. And now they prepared to bring the news of their success back to Spain. Magellan's lieutenant, Sebastian de Elcano, directed his course for the Cape of Good Hope, again encountering the most fearful hardships. Out of his slender crew he lost twenty-one men. He doubled the Cape at last; and on September 7, 1522, in the port of St. Lucar, near Seville, under his orders, the good ship San Vittoria came safely to an anchor. She had accomplished the greatest achievement in the history of the human race. She had circumnavigated the earth.

Magellan thus lost his life in his enterprise, and yet he made an enviable exchange. Doubly immortal, and thrice happy! for he impressed his name indelibly on the earth and the sky, on the Strait that connects the two great oceans, and on those clouds of starry worlds seen in the southern heavens. He also imposed a designation on the largest portion of the surface of the globe. His lieutenant, Sebastian de Elcano, received such honors as kings can give. Of all armorial bearings ever granted for the accomplishment of a great and daring deed his were the proudest and noblest—the globe of the world belted with the inscription, "Primus circumdedisti me!"

If the circumnavigation of the earth by Magellan did not lead to such splendid material results as the discovery of America and the doubling of the Cape, its moral effects were far more important. Columbus had been opposed in obtaining means for his expedition, because it was suspected to be of an irreligious nature. Unfortunately the Church, satisfying instincts impressed upon her as far back as the time of Constantine, had asserted herself to be the final arbiter in all philosophical questions, and especially in this of the figure of the earth had committed herself against its being globular. Infallibility can never correct itself—indeed, it can never be wrong. Rome never retracts any thing; and, no matter what the consequences, never recedes. It was thus that a theological dogma—infallibility—came to be mixed up with a geographical problem, and that problem liable at any moment to receive a decisive solution. So long as it rested in a speculative position, or could be hedged round with mystification, the real state of the case might be concealed from all except the more intelligent class of men; but after the circumnavigation had actually been accomplished, and was known to every one, there was, of course, nothing more to be said. It had now become altogether useless to bring forward the authority of Lactantius, of St. Augustine, or of other Fathers, that the globular form is impious and heretical. Henceforth the fact was strong enough to overpower all authority, an exercise of which could have no other result than to injure itself. It remained only to permit the dispute to pass into oblivion; but even this could not occur without those who were observant being impressed with the fact that physical science was beginning to display a fearful advantage over Patristicism, and presenting unmistakable tokens that ere long she would destroy her ancient antagonist.

THE BATTLE OF NEW ORLEANS.

A BALLAD OF LOUISIANA.

BY THOMAS DUNN ENGLISH.

HERE, in my rude log-cabin,
Few poorer men there be Among the mountain ranges
Of western Tennessee.
My limbs are weak and shrunken,
White hairs upon my brow;
My dog—lie still, old fellow!
My sole companion now;
Yet I, when young and lusty,
Have gone through stirring scenes,
For I went down with Carroll,
To fight at New Orleans.

You say you'd like to hear me
The stirring story tell
Of those who stood the battle
And those who fighting fell.
Short work to count our losses;
We stood and dropped the foe,
As easily as by fire-light
Men shoot a buck or doe;
And while they fell by hundreds
Upon the bloody plain,
Of us fourteen were wounded,
And only eight were slain.

The eighth of January,
Before the break of day,
Our raw and hasty levies
Were brought into array.
No cotton-bales before us—
Some fool that falsehood told—
Before us was an earth-work,
Built from the swampy mould;
And there we stood in silence,
And waited, with a frown,
To greet with bloody welcome
The bull-dogs of the crown.

The heavy fog of morning
Still hid the plain from sight,
When came a thread of scarlet,
Marked faintly in the white.
We fired a single cannon,
And, as its thunder rolled,
The mist before us lifted
In many a heavy fold.
The mist before us lifted,
And, in their bravery fine,
Came rushing to their ruin,
The fearless British line.

Then from our waiting cannons
Leaped forth the deadly flame,
To meet the solid columns
That swift and steady came.
The thirty-twos of Crawley,
And Bluche's twenty-four,
To Spotts's eighteen-pounders
Responded with their roar—
Sending the grape-shot deadly
That marked its pathway plain,
And paved the road it traveled
With corpses of the slain.

Our rifles firmly grasping
And heedless of the din,
We stood in silence waiting
For orders to begin.
Our fingers on the triggers,
Our hearts with anger stirred,
Grew still more fierce and eager
As Jackson's voice we heard—
"Stand steady! waste no powder!
Wait till your shots will tell!
To-day the work you finish;
See that you do it well!"

Their columns drawing nearer
We felt our patience tire,
When came the voice of Carroll,
Distinct and measured—"Fire!"
Oh! then you should have marked us
Our volleys on them pour,
Have heard our joyous rifles
Ring sharply through the roar;
And seen their foremost columns
Melt hastily away,
As snow in mountain gorges
Before the floods of May.

They soon re-formed their columns
And, mid the fatal rain
We never ceased to hurtle,
Came to their work again.
The Forty-fourth is with them,
That first its laurels won
With stout old Abercrombie
Beneath an Eastern sun.
It rushes to the battle,
And though within the rear
Its leader is a laggard,
It shows no sign of fear.

It did not need its colonel,
For soon there came instead
An eagle-eyed commander,
And on its march he led.
'Twas Pakenham in person,
The leader of the field;
I knew it by the cheering
That loudly round him pealed.

And by his quick, sharp movement
 We felt his heart was stirred,
 As when at Salamanca
 He led the fighting Third.

I raised my rifle quickly,
 I sighted at his breast—
 God save the gallant leader,
 And take him to his rest!
 I did not draw the trigger,
 I could not for my life;
 So calm he sat his charger
 Amid the deadly strife,
 That, in my fiercest moment,
 A prayer arose from me—
 "God save that gallant leader,
 Our foe-man though he be!"

Sir Edward's charger staggers,
 He leaps at once to ground,
 And, ere the brute falls bleeding,
 Another horse has found.
 His right arm falls! 'tis wounded!
 He waves on high his left;
 In vain he leads the movement;
 The ranks in twain are cleft.
 The men in scarlet waver
 Before the men in brown;
 And fly in utter panic
 The soldiers of the crown.

I thought the work was over,
 But newer shouts were heard;
 And came with Gibbs to lead it,
 The gallant Ninety-third.
 Then Packenham exulting,
 With proud and joyous glance,
 Cried, "Children of the tartan!
 Bold Highlanders advance!
 Advance to scale the breast-works,
 And drive them from their hold,
 And show the stainless courage
 That marked your sires of old!"

His voice as yet was ringing,
 When quick as light there came
 The roaring of a cannon,
 And earth seemed all aflame.
 Who causes thus the thunder
 The doom of men to speak?
 It is the Baratarian—
 The fearless Dominique!
 Down through the marshaled Scotsmen
 The step of death is heard,
 As by the fierce tornado
 Falls half the Ninety-third.

The smoke passed slowly upward,
 And as it soared on high
 I saw the brave commander
 In dying anguish lie.

They bear him from the battle,
 Who never fled the foe;
 Unmoved by death around them,
 His bearers softly go.
 In vain their care so gentle—
 Fades earth and all its scenes;
 The Man of Salamanca
 Lies dead at New Orleans.

But where were his Lieutenants?
 Had they in terror fled?
 No! Keane was sorely wounded,
 And Gibbs as good as dead.
 Brave Wilkinson commanding,
 A Major of Brigade,
 The shattered force to rally
 A final effort made.
 He led it up our ramparts—
 Small glory did he gain;
 Our captives some, while others fled,
 And he himself was slain.

The stormers had retreated,
 The bloody work was o'er;
 The feet of the invaders
 Were soon to leave our shore.
 We rested on our rifles,
 And talked about the fight,
 When ran a sudden murmur
 Like fire from left to right.
 We turned and saw our chieftain,
 And then, good friend of mine,
 You should have heard the cheering
 That rang along the line.

For well our men remembered
 How little when they came,
 Had they but native courage,
 And trust in Jackson's name;
 How through the day he labored,
 How kept the vigils still,
 Till discipline controlled us,
 A stronger power than will;
 And how he hurled us at them,
 Within the evening hour,
 That red night in December,
 And made us feel our power.

In answer to our shouting,
 Fire lit his eye of gray;
 Erect, but thin and pallid,
 He passed upon his bay.
 Weak from the baffled fever,
 And shrunk in each limb,
 The swamps of Alabama
 Had done their work on him;
 But spite of that and fasting,
 And hours of sleepless care,
 The soul of Andrew Jackson
 Shone forth in glory there.

TURY; OR, THREE STORIES IN ONE.

IT is nearly sunset of a clear, golden day early in September; and we would request our readers to transport themselves, in imagination (which is a pleasant, easy, and unexpensive mode of conveyance, and not on the whole an unsafe one—as, though it does sometimes run off the track or break down, these accidents are not usually attended with any disastrous loss of life or limb, as is the case in the blowing up of a steamboat, or the collision of rail-cars), to a pleasant country seat in the vicinity of B—.

Passing up the broad, well-kept carriage drive, the graceful sweep of which is shaded by fine old trees, and adorned with vases and statuary, we come in front of a handsome brown-stone edifice; but this front, though fitly embellished with column, capital, and frieze, is not the point of interest. Passing round the house, we come to the “back-front,” as some of the architects lucidly call it, and here is the “locale” of the following story.

Across the back of the house, which was carried out in two wings or projections, was a broad piazza, which, supported on arches, ran the length of the centre building, terminated at either end by the projecting portions. From this piazza a broad flight of easy stone steps led to the gravelled walk below, and although of very simple construction, and of no distinguished merit in an architectural point of view, these steps were, nevertheless, a very important feature in the domestic arrangements of the inmates of the mansion; for, the piazza being upon the principal floor, the back drawing-room, dining-room, hall, etc., all opened upon it, and its sofas and its upper steps were the accustomed lounging places of the family and their guests; while, the kitchen department being situated in the basement under the arches, the lower steps, which came down to its level, were the resting-places of the servants, whenever their more active duties were over; and thus, by the long and habitual usage of the family, these steps had become a sort of neutral ground, a connecting link, bridging the space between “the House of Lords and the House of Commons.”

But although the different members of the household were often by these means brought into a visible communication with each other—which was perhaps for the good of both parties—there was no republican leveling in the arrangement; “the upper and lower houses” met, but never mingled; the steps being what the old grammarians would have termed “a conjunction-disjunctive,” and uniting only to separate, like an iron rail between two stone posts, which connects yet at the same time keeps them asunder; for the etiquette of quarter-deck and fore-castle is not more rigidly observed than the unseen but fully understood barrier between the upper and lower steps; and while the servants would seat themselves on the latter with all the nonchalance of prescribed right, even when the members of the family were gathered at the top, they would, one and all, as soon have invaded the sanctity of the drawing-room couches, or the tabooed comforts of the guest-chamber, as to have allowed themselves to occupy the upper steps for a moment, even in the known absence of all the family.

Upon the particular afternoon alluded to above five persons were met at this trysting-place. Upon the upper step sat Master Herbert, a fine manly boy of about sixteen, the only son of the family: he was busily engaged in cleaning his gun, a somewhat elaborate performance, always attended to with great pomp and circumstance, and with a frequency which appeared, to common observers, not exactly commensurate with the amount of game which his shooting expeditions produced. But that is his affair, not ours.

Close to Herbert's side, nestling so close that her soft, waving curls almost impeded his important occupation, sat his youngest sister, the little fairy Effie, in whose loving eyes Herbert was a great man, full of profound wisdom, and capable of—any thing! These were the only members of the upper house then present. Upon one of the lower steps, perhaps the third from the bottom, sat Keturah (or, as she was more familiarly called, Tury) Hapgood, a genuine, true-born, Yankee maiden, and a “strong-minded woman,” as most of her class are. But in attempting to describe our friend Tury a difficulty meets us at the very outset in regard to stating her age; there were no data to go upon—facts were unknown, and appearances are proverbially deceitful. Certainly no one would for a moment have thought of calling Tury young; yet to look at her strong, square-built, athletic figure—her crisp, wiry, black hair, scarcely invaded by a silver thread—her bright black eye, vigorous, elastic tread, and the wintry cheek, which, though wrinkled and seamed like what children call “a froze and thawed apple,” had yet a frosty bloom upon it, like the autumnal tints of her native woods—one would as certainly have hesitated to call her old.

It was a face which wore a good-natured but defiant look; and there was in her whole person a sort of noli me tangere expression, which was, perhaps, partly the cause and partly the effect of her long years of single blessedness. She had an easy, off-hand, good-humored manner; and yet there was a certain puckery look about the lips, and an occasional quick flash of the eye, that made one feel that, though she had an abundance of the milk of human kindness in her nature, a sudden thunder-storm might possibly arise to sour and turn it all into bonny-clabber. In her dress Tury was always scrupulously neat, as far as that word expresses cleanliness; but her tastelessness in matters of this nature actually reached the limits of the sublime and terrible. Strange combinations of colors were her delight: hideous unions of dull indigo blues with coarse brick-reds, or an opaque purplish pink with a flaming brimstone yellow; and unnatural and grotesque patterns, which awakened less contempt of her for buying them than of indignation at the artist whose weird fancy had designed such nightmare shapes, and made one instinctively shudder to think what such a pencil might produce if devoted openly to the creation of the horrible.

Besides this, Tury had a way (not entirely peculiar to herself, I am afraid) of joining the seams of her fabrics without any regard whatever to the pattern; and thus half of a turkey-red flower would be united to half of a blue-green leaf, or half a huge pink square or diamond would be joined to half a golden circle, like some ill-assorted couples in the galling bonds of matrimony; or, if the pattern happened to be, as it often was, a plaid of gigantic size and rainbow hues, it would be met in such a provokingly disjointed manner as to give a spiral, corkscrew look to the wearer, fascinating the unfortunate gazer's eye and tormenting his ingenuity by a pertinacious, vain, and insane desire to match it, and try to bring order out of confusion. The starched petticoats, hoops, double skirts, and flounces—the cheap pins, and imitation earrings of modern serving-maids, offered no temptation to Tury; her only and invariable ornament was a string of dummy gold beads worn close around her throat. This, before the comparatively modern days of Savings Banks, was the universal trust fund in which industrious females were wont to invest their little savings—a sure deposit, always under their own control, available as cash at any moment of need, and which, while worn as a personal ornament, was at once the preserver and the exponent of its owner's wealth, so that the rustic admirer might count up the solid charms of his fair one while he "told her beads."

Upon the occasion in which she is presented to the reader's notice Tury, having got through her more arduous and active duties, was dressed for the day; she was then attired in a stiff, scant, black woolen skirt, over which she wore a calico gown, of the peculiar fashion then known in the country as "a long-short" (possibly because it was neither one nor the other), which reached about half-way below the knees. This garment was in all the gloss of its newness, and being of very marked colors and of an unusually ugly pattern, in which an unlimited number of terrific-looking red and yellow comets, aided and abetted by a running accompaniment of jagged lightning, seemed to threaten the immediate destruction, soul and body, of any amount of blue tomatoes, with pinkish-brown leaves, was of course an especial favorite with Tury. It was gathered in around the waist, and confined by the strings of a clean coarse apron. Her shock of thick, strong, black hair was parted and combed back as smoothly as its wiry nature would admit of, and a red cotton pocket-handkerchief, with black and yellow spots on it, was folded cross-wise and thrown over the back of her head, the corners being knotted under her chin. She was sitting on the steps, with her garments tucked closely about her in a way quite the reverse of modern fashion, and held a large tin pan upon her lap containing pease, which, with sleeves rolled up above the elbows displaying her sturdy mottled arms, she was busily shelling.

On the lowest step of all, sitting half sideways, with his back to the balusters so as to look up into Tury's face as she spoke, sat old Prince, an antiquated black man, who, born in Africa, and imported at a very remote period, had once been a slave in the family of his present mistress's father, and had, in course of time, descended as an heir-loom, with other goods and chattels, to her: but it must be remembered that slavery, even while it existed in New England, was a very different thing from what it was and is at the South. Our agricultural operations and produce being widely different, they were rarely employed in field culture here, but were almost universally house-servants, and thus brought more within the circle of domestic sympathy; and old Prince, who had been a faithful servant to his early employer, was now a petted dependent in the same family.

Prince was of unknown age, coal-black, short, and square-built in figure; his natural stature, which was less than the average height, being lessened by a stoop. He was considered as past his labor, and spoken of as a supernumerary; in fact, beyond feeding the pigs and the poultry, polishing the knives and bringing in the vegetables (or, as he always called them, "the sass") for dinner, no service was actually claimed from him. But if his duties were not clearly defined, nor indeed exactly definable, "their name was Legion;" he made it his peculiar province to fulfill the duties neglected by others, and any good American house-keeper knows this is no light task. To shut neglected gates, to lock forgotten doors, to cover up pork tub and flour barrel, to sweep the cellars, sift the coal-ashes, take in the clothes-line, and fifty other things which no one notices if performed, but the non-performance of which would be like the withholding of oil from the domestic machinery, causing it to strain and jar, or possibly to stop altogether.

Opposite to the steps in front, seated upon an inverted box, was Andy M'Gee, a healthy, blue-eyed, curly-headed son of Erin, who, under the guidance of old Prince, performed such manual services for the household as Prince's own decaying strength was unequal to. And now, having given the Time, Place, and Scene, and introduced the dramatis personæ, it may be as well to let them speak for themselves, and literally "tell their own stories."

"Dat yare b'y, dare! he's a top-sawyer uv a b'y!" said old Prince, addressing himself to Tury, but looking up with loving admiration at the young sportsman on the upper step; "I 'clare, I 'spect he'll be suthin one uv dese yere days—I do; he's a real gem'leman born, he is! and he's a mighty great ninnny, too, I tell yer now, dat yar b'y! he is."

"What am I, Prince?" asked the amused boy, looking up from his occupation at hearing himself thus complimented, "What did you say I was?"

"A ninny! Mas'er Harbard; a real, mighty great ninny! isn't yer now?"

"Well! I don't know; I hope not," said Herbert, laughing; "but what made you call me so—what made you think I was a ninny?"

"Oh! cos I knows yer is; oh, lors, yis! I allers knowed yer was dat; I guess dare ain't no greater ninny uv yer age nowheres round dan you be! Oh! lors, yis; I allers knowed yer was one; and 'sides dat, I heered yer Onkle John tell Sar yer was. Oh! yer needn't be so drefful modest—yer is a ninny, sartin now."

"Uncle John said so, Prince?"

"Yis, Sar; oh! lors, yis! I heered him say yer was; and it's true, yer is! I knowed it 'fore ever he sed it; he can't tell me nuffin 'bout you, I guess; but he sed so, too, he did."

"Said what?" asked Herbert; "what did Uncle John say?"

"Sed yer was a mighty great ninny," persisted Prince.

"He did? Why, Prince! and what did papa say?"

"Well, Mas'er Harbard, Sir he look kinder tickled like, and he laff, and he say, "'e dun no 'bout dat."

"Why, Prince! I don't believe a word of it," said the boy, his cheek flushing as he spoke. "Papa and Uncle John both said I was a great ninny? You must be mistaken, Prince! they would not have said that of me, I know; think again."

"Did too; I 'clare now! Why! ain't it good, Mas'er Harbard?" said the wondering Prince, who, in his simplicity, really thought he had been the transmitter of a welcome compliment to the boy he half idolized.

"Good? No!" said the indignant young gentleman, "I guess it is not! Ninny! Why, don't you know that ninny means a fool, Prince?"

"It do?" said the bewildered black. "You a fool, Mas'er Harbard! I guess yer isn't—not by a long sight! I 'clare! I dunno what Sar and yer Onkle John was a thinkin' on, for dem to come to go to say dat yare of you! Why, Mas'er Harbard, I never!"

"Tell me just what they said, if you can, Prince," said Herbert. "When was it?"

"Wa'al, I 'clare now, I dunno 'zactly; yis, do too. Don't yer know dat day we ketched dem two old skunkses out by de hin-coop yare?"

"Yes, I know," said Herbert.

"Wa'n't dat a real spry trap yer make? He! he! Mas'er Harbard! Didn't it done well?—ketched the two uv um? I never!"

"Yes, yes, Prince, I know; but about papa and Uncle John?"

"Oh! lors, yis; 'twas dat werry nex' day, after dinner. Yer onkle he dined dinner here—yer remember dat?—and Sar he tell yer onkle all 'bout dat trap, and how 'twas yar own invent, and how yer made it all yerself (and me), and how yer ketched dem two old fellars in't de werry fustest night we sot it; and den yer onkle he laff, and he say, 'Why, Jim' (dat's to Sar, yer know)—'Why, Jim,' he say, 'dat yare b'y'll be a mighty great ninny!' he say. I 'clare! I dunno what dey could meant, no how!"

"I dare say he said a 'Nimrod,'" said Tury, who was great in biblical knowledge, and who had thus far listened without appearing to take any interest in the conversation. "I don't doubt but that he said a 'Nimrod,'" she continued, with a glance of contemptuous pity at her sable companion; "for the good book says, 'Nimrod was a mighty hunter.'"

"Wa'al! I dunno but he did," said Prince; "I 'clare I dunno but he did sed dat; but I tort he sed a ninny."

"And I think," continued Tury, speaking with some asperity, "it would become you, Prince, not to make so free with the Bible as you do, seeing you are a poor blinded heathen, and ain't a professor!"

"I doesn't make free wid it, Tury," said Prince, warmly; "I never does; I 'clare! dere ain't a man in dese United States uv 'Merica 'spects it more nor I does. I doanno what you mean—why, Tury!"

"Yes you do, Prince. Didn't you say, only t'other day, that I was like Nebuchadnezzar?" asked Keturah, sternly.

"No! niver; I 'clare! I niver done dat yare. Why, Miss Tury! I's s'prised at yer! I niver done sed sich a word. I isn't 'quainted wid 'Nezzer. I niver sed so. Where did I sed it, hey?"

"Didn't I ask you for some sparrowgrass day before yesterday?" said Tury, asking this apparently irrelevant question with the most appalling impressiveness.

"Wa'al, yes; I 'spects yer did. Yer does most allers; I 'lows dat."

"And didn't I ask you to fitch in more a-days, and tell you there warn't no more than was eat in the parlor, and that I was fond of it myself?" This was said with the air of a petty lawyer who is badgering a timid witness.

"Wa'al, I dunno—yis, I guess yer did," said poor Prince, who, unable to see to what this cross-questioning might lead, was afraid to commit himself, and sat in a state of nervous trepidation, with his great saucer-eyes fixed on Tury's face, and a look of helpless anxiety on his coarse features, at once laughable and pitiable.

"And what did you say, Prince, I should like to know?" continued the pertinacious questioner.

"I 'clare! I dunno what I sed. Yis, I 'spects, cos I got it—I knows dat. What did I sed, Tury—hey?"

"You said that I eat grass like an ox," said Tury, triumphantly.

"Wa'al, so yer does, Tury; yer knows yer does, whenever yer can git it; and s'pose I did sed so, that yare ain't noffin 'ginst the good book, as I knows on—is it?"

"Yes, it is," said Tury, solemnly; "yes, it is, Prince. Don't the Bible say, 'Nebuchadnezzar eat grass like an ox?'"

"Wa'al, I niver! Why, Tury! I should think yer'd gone foolish. I's s'prised at yer! I niver sed a word 'bout 'Nezzer; I dunno noffin 'bout him; I dunno if he eat sparrowgrass, anyhow—how should I know?"

"Don't the Bible say that Nebuchadnezzar eat grass like an ox? Answer me that," repeated the stern Bible Christian, with impressive reiteration.

"Wa'al, I 'clare, I dunno what he eat. I dunno noffin 't all 'bout 'Nezzer, I tell you. Mebbe he eat sparrowgrass; mebbe he didn't. I dunno noffin 'bout it—I niver wint in's garding—I dunno what sass he raises—I don't—there, now! and I niver sed yer was like him, and I niver tort yer was; I doesn't tink yer the leastest mite nor bit like any body in de good book that I iver heer tell on—not a mite, I doesn't—sartin true! Dare, now; will dat do?"

But it did not do at all. This wholesale denunciation and utter excommunication from all fellowship with the dramatis persone of the Bible—who were the only literary and historical personages of her very limited acquaintance, and held much the same place in her imagination that the heroes and heroines of modern romance do to young novel readers, or the deities of ancient mythology to the classical scholar—instead of proving the soothing palliative which poor Prince evidently intended it to be, only roused still farther the indignation of the irascible Tury; and drawing herself up into a pucky condition of face and temper, she poured out upon the innocent offender a perfect torrent of vituperative wrath, accusing him, in no measured terms, of insolence, folly, stubbornness, willful waste, and idleness.

Poor Prince, who, if he was not "a professor," as Tury termed it, was certainly a practical Christian according to the full extent of his limited light, and whose meek spirit, childlike simplicity, and gentle gayety of temper had endeared him to all the family, listened to this tirade in mingled grief and astonishment. The charges of insolence, folly, and stubbornness he was too meek to resent—his own estimate of himself was so humble that it was scarcely in the power of another to lower it; but to accuse him of willful waste and idleness was assailing him in his weakest point, for the simple creature, in his single-hearted devotion to his employers, had entertained the honest belief that his services were important, if not absolutely necessary, to their well-being; and he was not exempt from the universal self-esteem which makes all mankind, wise or simple, hug to their bosoms the flattering idea that their removal from this scene of action must, in some way or other, sadly interrupt the progress of affairs—in fact, that the world could not go on so well without them, even if it managed to go on at all!

Laying down from his trembling old hands upon the step above him the bit of harness he had been cobbling at, Prince took off his hat, wiped the moisture from his brow with his faded cotton pocket-handkerchief, deposited it in his hat, and deliberately placed his hat on the step beside him, and then, rising slowly, stiff, and shambling, he stood before the steps, facing his accuser, his bowed figure raised as much as the burden of years would allow, his outstretched hands held out, with their pinky palms turned toward her, as if to show that no dishonest gains adhered to them, and the big tears rolling, like great shining beads, down his dark face.

Prince was not handsome. He was an African born, and had all the strongly marked peculiarities of his race; and these are not commonly considered types of physical beauty! And Prince was old—the "image in ebony" which the Great Master's own hand had created years ago had been knocked about the world, in heat and cold, in wet and dry, till, battered and crumbled by years and servitude, its original comeliness had been defaced and worn. But as he stood there, painfully striving to lift himself erect and stand firm, while his great, coarse features were all twisting and working with deep and troubled emotion, there was an innate dignity about the man which touched the sympathy in spite of all his unfortunate surroundings, and made one instinctively feel that the poor untutored black was emphatically "an honest man," although the Great Creative Spirit had chosen, for his own wise ends, to inclose his "noblest work" in a rough and unsightly casket.

"Miss Tury!" said Prince, speaking in a voice which, all broken and tremulous with age and feeling, had yet the sweet, musical fall and cadence which the voices of so many of the blacks possess in a remarkable degree; "Miss Tury! I is s'prised at yer!" (This was the most bitter form of invective to which Prince was ever known to give utterance, and must stand, from him, as equivalent to a whole host of indignant disclaimers.) "I 'clare now, I niver did—niver! Why, Miss Tury, what for yer go say dat yare for? I knows I isn't a professor—de good Lord above, he knows I wishes I was—and I isn't a grand scholard like yer is, Miss Tury. I doesn't know hardly nuffin—I niver larned no gogriphy; and I is a haythen—I knows I be; but I 'clare I loves Sar and Marm, I loves ebery one ob dem blessed childun just as if dey was all my own—no, I doesn't nuther; I 'clare I loves um more and greater! I niver wastes dere share—I doesn't, I wouldn't, I couldn't; I hasn't de heart to—yer knows I couldn't. If I tort dey say so—if I tort dey tort so—I 'clare I'd niver look in dere faces agin. I doesn't waste nuffin. I isn't idle. I's allers at work—allers! I's allers willing to work. If I tort Sar or Marm 'cused me in dare hearts of dem yar tings, I'd go 'way dis blessed day—I'd go creep into a hole in de ole quarry, and stay dare, and niver kim out agin till I was stick-stock stone-dead! I would, too. Dare now!"

Here, as poor Prince, completely overcome by his own eloquence, broke down, and stopped short as if choking, there was a little rustle on the upper step, and fluttering down with the lightness of a rose-leaf, a little fairy figure descended noiselessly, and drawing Prince back on to the step again, seated herself upon his knee.

"Why, Prinsey—my own dear, good Prinsey!" said the sweet little comforter, "they don't think so; you know they don't. They was only teasing you. (Oh! Tury, how could you?) Why, papa and mamma both think every thing of you! Why, Prince, when papa's horse was sick, last spring, papa said he would have died only for the good care you took of him. I heard papa tell Mr. Mason, only the other day, that the Young Duke was the most valuable horse he ever owned, and that you saved him; and he said there was not another such good horse doctor in the States as you. Yes, indeed! And mamma—why, she thinks nobody can raise cauliflowers only just you; and she says she doesn't relish strawberries, nor raspberries, if these dear, nice, old, long fingers have not picked them for her. Don't you know she does? And there's Herbert, too; why, Herbert would give up his gun and his traps, and would not care half so much for his vacations, if he hadn't you to help him. Would you, Herbie dear? And I—why, Prinsey, what should I do without you? No dear, good, kind Prinsey to get chickweed for my birdies, and help me take care of my chickens, and tell me such nice long stories. Why, if my dear old Prinsey was dead in the old quarry, I'd cry the quarry full of tears for him."

"Bless you!—de Lord bless you!" said poor Prince, smoothing down the child's shining curls with his trembling old hand; "de good Lord bless dis chile, and keep um!"

"Tury was only in fun," pursued the little peace-maker; "only in fun, you know—all in fun. Wasn't you, Tury?" she said, reaching over from her seat upon Prince's knee, and laying her little white hand upon Tury's sturdy arm. "Tell him so, Tury dear," she continued, coaxingly. "I wonder who it was that went for the doctor that awful cold night when Tury had the croup—wading all through the deep snow till he almost lost his own breath—and then over to grandmamma's, a mile farther, to bring some goose-grease? Prince was not idle and lazy that night—was he, Tury? Ah! poor Tury, she was very sick that night," said the little one, her sweet face growing serious at the solemn thought, and her voice sinking in unaffected awe. "Mamma said, afterward, she did not think poor Tury could have lived till morning."

Blessed be little children! Ay, rather say blessed are little children; for surely the blessing with which the Sinless One blessed them on the hills of Palestine lingers about them yet, and makes them angel messengers and ministrants of mercy. Call it intuition, inspiration—what we will—wonderful is the power which little children wield, all unconsciously. No rhetorician, no subtle casuist, no "learned counsel on the other side," versed in all the tortuous windings of what we call human nature, could have gone straight to Tury's heart as did the simple words of the little child.

Tury had been always strong and healthy; she was one of those dried-up specimens of humanity which seem to offer the enemy no vantage-ground; a sort of physical locomotive, which seemed as if it could run on, without even oil-ing, until the Millennium; and having no aches and pains of her own, she had had little sympathy for the aches and pains of others—not that she was, or meant to be, unkind, but simply that being, as she termed it, "tough as a pine-knot" herself, she looked upon all physical weakness as a sort of modified sin, and her mental reflections, had they taken the form of words, would probably have been, "I don't see why in the world folks need have the headache. If I had that cough, I guess I'd soon cure it. I guess if folks would only muster up and bustle 'round as I do, they would not have so much back-ache."

But Tury, though strong, was not invulnerable; and this happy normal condition was for once invaded by that dread visitant, the croup, and Tury, who had hitherto contemplated "death at a distance," felt herself suddenly called to meet him in a face to face, hand to hand encounter. Her life was spared, but it was a fearful conflict, and Tury was not communicative as to her mental experiences upon that memorable occasion; but it was a marked event in her life's history. "That time I had my sickness;" it was the date by which she reckoned all minor events—"before, when, or after I had my sickness." Marathon and Waterloo were not greater in the memory of their surviving heroes; and had the child run, with a professionally skillful hand, over all the keys of Tury's intellectual gamut, she could not have struck one more responsive to the occasion.

"Well," said Tury, after a moment's silence, and with a manner half-conciliatory, half-angry, as if ashamed of her fault, and yet more ashamed to acknowledge it, "I didn't mean to say he was just exactly lazy; I donno as he is. He's always pottering about something or other, I know. To be sure, it don't amount to no great; but I s'pose he does the best he can, poor creter! But I vow he does kinder rile me sometimes. He's the provokingest toad I ever see in my life—he's so horrid stupid."

"Yis, yis, I knows dat, Miss Tury," said Prince, humbly. "I be awful stupid, and werry provoktious—I knows I is. But I wouldn't waste, nor I wouldn't harm, nuffin as belongs to dis yere family, if I died for't. I's honest—I is dat."

"Honest! laud of goodness; yes, to be sure you be. I didn't say you stole nothing, did I? I guess you're honest enough! There now—shut up. Don't say no more. I'm sorry I said it; but, you see, Daffy-down-dilly! he made me kinder mad, he's so—so conceited like!"

Conceited? poor humble Prince! surely that was a misnomer. But little Effie, glad to obtain even this ungracious apology from Tury, whose unyielding temper she well understood, clapped her hands together triumphantly.

"There, there, Prince! you hear that; she didn't mean it, she was all in fun. I knew she was, only you did not understand her—that was all. I told you so; and now we must all forget all about it—'forgive and forget,' you know. Don't let us say another word about it, that is the best way: papa always says, 'The less said the sooner mended.' And now suppose we all tell stories—that will be so pleasant, and make us all forget, and feel comfortable again: and Prince shall begin, because he is the oldest, you know, and he tells such beautiful stories."

Poor Prince, who would have sooner thought of telling the sun not to shine or the wind not to blow than of refusing any thing which little Miss Effie asked of him, wiped away his tears, and branched out into a long and often told story, in which the Fetish and Obeaman theology of his youth was dimly discernible—a wild, disconnected legend, of somebody or something (whether angel, man, or devil did not clearly appear), who had the power (for some equally unrevealed purpose) to transform himself at will into various shapes of wild beasts, etc.; and in the course of which the cabalistic refrain of was of frequent recurrence. The meaning of this African gibberish (if indeed it ever had any meaning) Prince had probably long forgotten, and his listeners never knew; but still it was wonderfully effective, suggestive—as it was of hoofs and horns, teeth and claws, lashing tails, and glowering red eyes! And as Prince gave it, con amore—now hooking, pawing, and roaring like a mad bull; now prowling and growling like an angry bear; now chattering and mowing like an ape; or creeping round with the stealthy tread, sudden spring, and half-human cry of a panther—it was really a very pretty exhibition in its way, and perhaps none the less attractive to his auditors because it was utterly incomprehensible.

When at last the wild fiction, mystic and barbarous in its construction and in its details, plunging headlong through a succession of horrors and absurdities, during which blood and thunder, flame, earthquakes, lightning, and tornadoes were freely administered, arrived at its conclusion—which happy event was made known to the listeners in the astounding and almost incredible words—

"Den him's brudder and him (the mystic hero), dey sot to and eat each udder all up to nuffin, intirely, 'till dere worn't noffin left ov um; and den dey wint away and niver kim back no more, and niver plague dem yar folks no more forever, never! and dats de hull on't."

Little Effie, who had sat alternately laughing and shivering in nervous terror, clasping in both her little soft white hands the long, big-jointed, bony fingers of her old friend, which in shape and color more resembled a turkey's claw than a human hand, gravely declared that was a beautiful story—a real beauty of a story—nobody could tell such pretty stories as dear old Prinsey—nobody in the world. No; not if they tried ever so hard, all day and all night, and to-morrow and next day!

"And now, Andy," continued the self-constituted little mistress of ceremonies, turning abruptly to the big burly Irishman, who, though he was ostensibly, professedly, and theoretically engaged in making a stable broom, was practically idle, and had been sitting with wide, wondering eyes, and open mouth, swallowing the grim fantastic terrors of Prince's weird narration. "Now, Andy, it is your turn; and you must tell us a story."

But Andy, drawing in his head, which had been thrust out like a turtle's in his eager listening, and shuffling his great feet, promptly declined the proffered honor. Andy was shy, diffident; perhaps Miss Effie's unlimited eulogium on the last speaker had discouraged him; or, it might be, that, with an Irishman's intuitive quickness in all that relates to the glory of "dear Ireland," he had a perception that the banshee, and "the good little green people" (the fairies), of his native land, however good in their way, would appear tame and rapid after the gorgeous Orientalisms of Prince's glowing narrative, and he said, quickly and resolutely, he did not know nary a story in the world, and hadn't nothing at all to tell.

"Now is not that too bad?" said little Effie, turning with a grieved face to her brother. "Andy is going to spoil all; he won't tell me a story; you make him, Herbie dear: do."

"Never mind, Effie darling!" said Herbert, speaking in a loud whisper, artfully intended for Andy's ear; "I would not mind it, he hasn't got any thing to tell. You see (I suppose) he never lived with any body respectable 'till he came here."

"Faith! thin and I did, Master 'Erbert!" said poor Andy, falling headlong into the trap so adroitly laid for him; "sure! and there's not dacenter people in the States, nor I lived wid, afore iver I come here. Didn't I come to yez from Colonel Frazier's itself; and isn't he respectable? And it's mesilf was three years and five months wid Doctor Thorn and his mither; and isn't they quality? And more nor that, wasn't I eight months wid the Governor himsilf; and wouldn't he be a dacent kind of a man, ony-how?"

"A Governor!" said Herbert, with an assumed air of incredulity. "And what sort of a Governor was that, I wonder?"

"Faith! then, and I did," said Andy, proudly. "And it's a ra'al Governor he was! and better nor that, too; he wasn't jist a common Governor at all, it was himsilf as was more than a Governor, and greater!"

"More than a Governor?" said Herbert, laughing, "how was that, Andy? What in the world was he?"

"True for ye," said Andy, his honest face all aglow with vicarious pride and importance, "he was a Lift-tenant-Governor! ye mind."

"You don't say so!" said Herbert, gravely. "And you lived with him? A Lieutenant-Governor! Was he really? Why, Andy?"

"Faith, then, and it's himself was jist that same, and no two ways about it. And wouldn't ye be calling that quality, now?"

"What is a Left-tenant-Governor, Herbert?" asked little Effie, who had, like Andy, been deceived by Herbert's grave look of admiration. "What does Left-tenant-Governor mean?"

"Ask Andy, my dear, he knows," said Herbert.

"Faith! and why wouldn't ye be able to be telling her yerself, Master 'Erbert, wid yer fine collidge larning? Don't yer know that much? Sure what's the use of all the eligunt sums the master is after spinding on yer eddication if ye don't know more and better than a poor Irish lad that niver yit cost the father of 'im the fust red cint for the wit that's in him?" said Andy, good-humoredly.

"Oh! but I am not through college yet, Andy; wait till I get through, and then I'll know every thing, and more too. But now, really, I don't know that I ever even saw a Lieutenant-Governor; and if you really have (as you say) lived eight months with one, you can certainly tell Miss Effie what it means."

Here was poor Andy fairly caught and tossed on the horns of a dilemma. If he said he did not know, it would impeach the veracity of his whole story, and deprive him of all the honor he had just won, and the impress of which was distinctly visible on the faces of Miss Effie, Tury, and Prince. But the emergency must be met, and gathering up his courage for the desperate leap, he said, gravely:

"Lift-tenant-Governor? Well! Lift-tenant-Governor means—and sure, don't ye know yer own self, miss? A Lift-tenant-Governor! why, what wud it be but a governor as has lift being tinant and lives on his own estate, to be sure? And that was the way it was wid his Honor—sure he had used to rint the Corry place tul he bought his own and left being tenant. Yes! and a fine place his was, too, as pretty land as iver yer laid eyes on, a hundred acres or more, and not a bit of bog as big as yer pocket-handkerchief! Ye might go on the dry foot over the whole on't. Ah! and he was the fine man, too; a fine, portly, free-spoken, open-handed, honorable gentleman he was; not a one in the place but picked pride out of him, he was so noble-like and generous!"

"But how came you to leave him, Andy, if you liked him so much?" said Herbert.

"I didn't, Sir; sure I'd never have lift him while he'd kape me; I didn't lave him, he jist left me. He died, one day, the poor gentleman; sure I couldn't live wid him no longer, and he dead! Ah, well, we must all die once in a while."

"Not so often as that, I hope," said Herbert, smiling, in spite of the solemn nature of Andy's communication. "Died, did he? And how did that happen?"

"Well, then," said Andy, "and it happened very quare intirely. The way it was, I jist met him one evening after dinner. I was coming out ov the garden, and he meets me just opposite the gate, right forenent me on the walk, and he going down to the summer-house, wid his cigars in his hand. And, 'Andy,' he sez to me. 'Yes, yer honor,' I sez to him. 'I shall ride this afternoon,' he sez; 'ye may tell Tom to bring round the horses at six o'clock,' he sez, 'and ye call me at half past five; maybe I'll be getting a nap, and I done wid me cigar,' he sez. 'Yes, yer honor, Sir, I shall do that same,' I makes answer; and he walks away, and I jist went to the stable and done his bidding, and thin I went to me work. Well, at half past five I goes to the summer-house, and there I seen him, and he sitting jist opposite me, wid the cigar in his mouth and his head on his hand; sure, I didn't take perticular notice of him, for the summer-house was kinder dark and shady like, and I jist out ov the sun. 'Half past five, yer honor,' I sez, and I bowing to him; but he didn't move a wink. 'Yer honor bid me call yer at half past five, Sir,' I sez again; and when he didn't move or speak, I went a thought nearer to 'im, and then I seen he looked mortal pale; and I jist laid me hand on his, and oh! by the powers, he was sitting there, jist as well and as hearty as ever he was in his life, and the cigar in his mouth as nate as yer plaze, and he stone dead!"

"Dead?" said Herbert and Effie, starting.

"Oh! lors a massy! soul sakes alive! Oh, dearie me!" droned out old Prince.

"In the midst of life we are in death," moralized Tury. "That now, I consider a remarkable providence; it oughter be a warning to all of us; I should say that was dreadful sudding!"

"Suddin it was, yer may say that," continued Andy. "Well, I runs to the house, and I bawls out, and Tom and me runs for the doctör; him run one way, and me another, and Jim, the house-lad, another, and betune the three of us we raised five doctors in less than no time; but it warn't no use; the poor, dear gentleman was dead, and all the doctors in Dublin couldn't cure that, supposing we could have had them, which we couldn't, nohow!"

"But what was it?" asked Herbert. "What killed him so suddenly?"

"Well," said Andy, scratching up the hair at the back of his head, "that was the quarest thing of all! Them doctors was the best in the town, knowledgeable men, all of them; but they sed, and stuck to it, through thick and thin, that he had died of a pear-alasis, or an apple-plexey! Look at that now, and itself early in July, and not a pear, or an apple ripe in the State, nor hadn't been for months; and more betoken, his honor was not overly fond of them whin they'd be ripe. Now, wasn't that a dirty, mane thing, to be saying of a poor, dear, dead gentleman, and he not to the fore, to spake and defend himself?

Oh! these big bugs of doctors! they think they knows a dale, intirely; but they was out in their guess that time, I know. Apples and pears, indeed; his honor had not touched um!"

"And so, after the Governor was dead, you left, Andy, did you?"

"I did thin! Sure I wasn't wanted no longer: the Governor's wife, poor lady, she had no children; her father and mither they cum to the funeral, and they tuck her home wid them for a little, and the place wor shut up, and so I had to quit, and I did."

"Well, Andy!" said Herbert, smiling, "I think you have told us a very good story, after all."

"Indade! and it's not a story at all, Sir. Sure there's not a word of lie in it, it's all as true as preaching; and if ye doubt me word, ye can jist ask Tom Blunt, as was the coachman there; he's hostler now, down at the tavern here, and he'll tell ye the vary same. Sure, it's not a story it is; I'll go bail for it, it's true ivery word on't."

"There! and now it's Tury's turn," said little Effie, clapping her hands joyfully; "and I know she will tell me a good long story: won't you, Tury?"

"Oh! pshaw—no, child!" said Tury, laughing; "I ain't got nothing to tell: I didn't come from furrin parts like Prince and Andy there, and ain't got no wonders to tell; and besides, I ain't no spokesman, and never was."

"Oh, yes—yes—yes," said the little pleader, coaxingly. "Oh, Tury! do now—you will, I know; tell me something about a great while ago, Tury, ever and ever so long ago, when you was only a little girl like me."

"I guess that was a good while ago, for sartin, you little pond-de-lily, you!" said Tury, looking fondly at the pretty child, and thoughtfully sifting the pease through her fingers as she spoke; "and I guess I warn't much like you, even in them days. I ain't got nothing to tell; nothing wonderful don't happen to me ever. I'm one of the real old-fashioned sort; I jist jog on, year after year, jist about so. I've lived with yer ma this fifteen years; and come to think on't, I guess it's nigher on to twenty, fur's I know!" Then, as little Effie continued to look beseechingly at her, she added, "I s'pose I've told you 'bout our great snow-storm, hain't I?—oh, pshaw, yes! I know I must have, often and often, afore now."

"No, no!" said the eager, little listener. "No, Tury, you never did."

"Didn't I, now, apple-blossom! Sartin, true? I guess I have too, hain't I?"

"No, no, never! Did she, Herbert?"

"No," said Herbert, "I don't think she ever did; I never heard it. I go in for the snow-storm; so begin at once. Let us have it; snow away, Tury."

"Laud of goodness! what a boy you are!" said Tury. "Lor, well! it ain't mitch to tell, after all: only it seemed a good deal to me then, because I was young, and hadn't no experience; for old as I am now, I was young once! Lor sakes! it ain't nothing to tell, only little bob-o-link here wants a story, and I can't think of nothing else to tell her, and so I kinder thought of that."

"Well, you see, when I was a young gal, and lived home at father's, we lived up in New Hampshire, in a kind of a lonesome place, jist out of the woods, five miles from the nearest town, and that worn't no great of a place then, though it's pretty considerable of a town nowa-days; to be sure, the meetin'-house and the school-house, they warn't more than a mile off, and we had some neighbors within half a mile of us, but it was a lonesome kind of a wooden place after all, there's no mistake about it!"

"Well, there was Sir and Marm to home, and Eben, and I, and the baby—you see, Marm, she warn't our own mother, Eben's and mine, only mother-in-law: own mother she died, and left seven children; but Eunice, and Nabby, and Elnathan, they was all married off and out of the way, and Nancy lived with grandmarm's folks, and Seth he had gone to sea; and so when Sir married Marm there warn't only Eben and I, the two youngsters like, at home. Well, I was a strong, hearty gal, about fourteen then, I guess, and our Eb he was about twelve—or, come to think on't, no, I guess he warn't more than eleven, nuther—but he was a smart chance of a boy, and 'peared older than he ac'tilly was."

"That was a real cold winter, and 'twas a plaguy cold place there, up 'mong them hills and woods; but we didn't mind it much in them days; we was used to it, and we was young, and strong, and healthy, and we had a plenty to do to keep our blood stirring, and then there was lots of wood all round to be had for the having—the more you'd burn the better! and we kept up rousing fires! why, the way we wasted wood up there was a caution! I guess to see the fires we kep would make yer pa wink, and he ain't one, nuther, to count the cost and hold back when his folks' comfort is concerned. I jist wish you could see one of them fires we used to have! The house we lived in was—well, it was a poor man's house—it was low, only one story to it; but father owned it himself, and it was real comfortable, I tell you, good enough for poor folks; for we was poor folks, and poor folks didn't calculate to live then as they do nowa-days; Lor! no; I guess they didn't! poor folks then didn't think they must have carpets, and centre-tables, and sofas, and rocking-cheers, and picters; and gold-paper fixin's; no, indeed! and I don't see but what they was jist as well off without um. We never had a rag of carpet in father's house, but only sanded floors, and pine tables and cheers, and so on; but, laud of goodness! they was as good as our neighbors had, and we never thought of wanting any better. We didn't have no ranges, nor cook-stoves, nor furnaces, nor coals—we had great open fire-places as big as the meetin'-house door, pretty near; father could 'most have driv his team into one of um; and we had great, heavy fire-irons (dogs, we used to call them), a yard or two apart; and our Eb and I used to drag in great logs, as big as we could master, the two of us, and build up a fire that was a fire!

"Well, one day—'twas a Wednesday—father he was going to market, to the market-town about fifteen miles off, about some grain. He was going with his own team, for them was before the days of railroads; steam-cars didn't come shriekin', and pantin', and rushin', and wrigglin' by like mad dragons, ringin' their bells and scamperin' out of sight before one could say, 'Why, who be you?' No, indeed! railroads they warn't thought of then. Twice a week, maybe, the stage-coach kim by, and blow'd its horn, and brought the mails to the largest towns; but the common folks went in their wagons, or drove their oxen, or went on Adam's mare. Well, we was up early times that morning; for Sir he had to start early, and I got up before daylight and got his breakfast, as I mostly allers did; 'fact, I had mostly all the housework to do; for mother-in-law had a young baby—and she mostly allers had; for her babies they warn't healthy, and kinder chipper-like—they was allers kinder weakly and ailing, and never grew to be old, but jist hung round, whining and pining for a year or so, and gen'rally dropt off 'bout the time another one come. I guess 'twas partly 'cause Marm didn't know justly how to tend 'em; but she took time enough for it, I know. Why, I've seen people with a young one four or six months old, kind of catch it up on their hip and do a most of a day's work with it; but, Lord! that wa'n't Marm's way; she'd jist set round and rock the baby, and sossle with catnip-tea, and rub its back, and trot, trot, trot, all day long! Laud of goodness! I've heered um tell that nobody never found out perpetual motion—I guess if Marm's babies didn't, nobody ever will. Rock, rock! trot, trot! pat, pat! I used to think they must be glad to die and lay still a while, even if it was in the grave-yard.

"Well, as I was a saying, it was a real cold morning, and I had got breakfast. I had made some coffee, hot and strong, and biled some eggs, and fried a rasher, and baked a johnny-cake, and got all ready, when father come in from the barn, where he had been doing his morning chores.

"'Ain't it real cold, father?' says I.

"'Stingin' cold, Tury,' says he.

"'I thought so,' says I. 'What makes you go to-day, father? Can't you put it off?'

"'What, Tury?' says he, ''cause it's cold? That would be a good one! I guess I hain't lived through forty-five winters to be scared of a cold snap at my time of life. You give me a good hot breakfast, and enough on't, and I guess I'll stand the cold. I reckon a man never froze yet who had a full stomach, an easy conscience, and a warm heart.'

"Well, after breakfast father he went into t'other room to change his coat, and put on a clean collar, and brush up a little; and when he come back mother-in-law had come out of the bedroom, and sot by the fire with the baby.

"Marm was real good-looking. She would have been master pretty if she would only have taken pains and spruced up a little; but she was dredful slack, and hadn't no 'ambition. And there she sot by the fire. She wa'n't more than half awake, and she wa'n't more than half dressed. She had on her day-gown, to be sure; but it was put on over her night-clo'es and all open at the neck, and over her shoulders she had the baby's patch-work cradle-quilt. She was in her stocking-feet, and her hair was tucked behind her ears under her cap; and there she sot, rocking and trotting, with the baby on her lap, leaning for'ard over her left hand, druling and puling, and she a patting its back, and kinder polishing up the back of its head in the holler of her right hand. Seemed to me mother-in-law's babies' heads needed a terrible deal of chafing and polishing—leastways, they got it; whether they needed it or not that's another matter.

"Now father he sot great store by Marm, as men allers do by sich helpless, shiftless, do-little women. If a gal is smart, and bright, and willing to help herself and others, you may be sure she's got it to do—that's her portion all her life through; but come along one of your slack, helpless, dead-and-alive kind of women, that ain't got sense enough to pull her stockings on straight, nor ambition enough to comb her own hair smooth, and you'll see she'll get the best of husbands, and be made much of, and be tended and cared for all her days. That's the way it is—allers!"

Here Tury, probably fearing she was becoming too personal in her remarks, paused, took a long sniff of air with her head uplifted like a greyhound, and gave the tin pan a vigorous shake, which served the double purpose of "pointing a moral" and bringing all the unshelled pease to the surface. Then she went on:

"'Do tell!' says father, when he come in and seen her. 'Sakes alive! why, Susie dear, is that you? You ain't up, be you? Well, I declare! I want to know! And how are you to-day?'

"'Very miserable,' says mother-in-law.

"'You don't say so!' says father. 'Why, I want to know? Had a pretty consid'able good night, hadn't you?'

"'No, dreadful poor!' says Marm. 'I didn't sleep hardly none; and when I did catch a nap, it didn't seem to rest me none.'

"'Dear heart!' says father. 'Well, I declare, that's too bad! And how's Tot?'

"'He's very poorly,' says Marm. 'I never see a child so tendsome. I'm most wore out with him, and I reckon he's going to be real downright sick.'

"'Poor, dear little lambie! I hope not,' says father. 'What can I get for you, Susie? I'm off to town this morning, you know; what shall I bring you?'

"'Well, I donno of nothing as will do ither of us any good, I'm sure; only you may as well bring some more "Soothing Sirup" for the baby, and another bottle of "Stoughten's Elixir" for me.'

"I declare I couldn't hardly help laughing; for we had had so much of them two kinds of doctor's stuff that we might have paved the doorway with the empty bottles; and the worst on't was, the babies never was soothed, and Marm never called herself any stronger, and I used to wonder how her faith in them two things held out so. But father, he was used to it, and he only said, 'Yes, dear, I guess I'd better;' and then he come back and begun to put on his woolen comforter.

"Ain't it cold, father?" asked Marm.

"Pretty cold now, Susie," says he, "but I think it begins to moderate a little."

"If it does, it will snow," says mother-in-law, who was always on the look-out for trouble, and always saw the dark side of every thing.

"Well, I dunno. What makes you think so?" says father, pulling up his collar over his ears.

"The fire says snow," says Marm; "and so it did last night."

"Oh, well," says father, laughing, "the fire has got a many tongues, I know, but I rather guess they ain't all on um tongues of prophecy. So good-by, Susie, dear; take good care of yourself and little Tot here till I get back. Good-by, Tury, child. Come, Eb!" and he was off, taking Eben to ride with him as far as the school-house.

"Well, I had to knock round pretty spry, I tell you. I washed and cleared away all the breakfast things, and tidied up the room, and made the beds, and baked some pies, and got dinner; but it seemed to me there never was such a long morning made as that one was. Marm didn't do an arthly thing only fret—she never scolded; I used to kinder wish she would, now and then, jist for variety; it would have been rousing-like to both of us, and mebbe we'd a' felt better after it was over." Here Tury directed a saucy but meaning glance of her eye at old Prince and at little Effie, who still kept her place upon the old man's knee, and who returned the telegraphic communication by a silent but deprecatory shake of her shining curls.

"But she never did," continued Tury; "her temper was like a long, dull, drizzling rain-storm, wearing out your patience with its everlasting drip, drip, drizzle, drizzle, till you felt as if a clap of thunder or a small hail-storm would be welcome, and clear up the air a little. Every airthly thing I done was wrong, and whatever I didn't do was allers sure to be wanted, or would be. If the pot b'iled, the noise on't worried her and put her out; and if it stopped b'iling, she knowed we shouldn't have no dinner. If I laid on any wood, she was roasted and the baby half baked; and if I didn't, the fire was all going out—as black as her shoe. I never see any body so contrary. And then her health! Why, as sure as you're alive, I do think there wasn't a single bone in her whole body, from the crown of her head to the soles of her feet, nor yet an inch of her flesh, that she didn't enter a complaint agin that blessed day! Why, to hear her, you'd say Job and Jeremiah warn't no account for suffering in comparison to her! And the poor little baby was jist like her, as like as two peas. He didn't cry out a real, good, satisfying screech, and adone with it, but kep up a poor, little, weak, wailing kind of a cry all day long—worry, worry, worry, worry—as if it hadn't speret enough to cry up handsome, nor yet to hold its tongue. I used to wish it would do one thing or t'other. I declare, at noon, when our 'Eb come home to dinner, if I didn't feel fairly tucker'd out.

"Why, Tury," says Eb, "what in the world's the matter with you? You look real beat out."

"Oh, nothing," says I. "Is it as cold as it was?"

"No," says he, "not nigh so cold. I guess we shall have snow; it spits a little now."

"Shouldn't wonder," says I.

"After dinner Eben went off to school agin. And 'bout one o'clock, as Marm seemed lower than ever, and drefdful worrisome and fussy, I told her she had best go lay down and try to get a nap, and I'd keep the baby a spell; and she did, though she said she knowed she shouldn't sleep a wink, she should be so oneasy to trust him with me; but lor! I got him warm and comfortable, and kep him still, and after he got over his surprise at not being jerked, and trotted, and patted, and rocked, he went off to sleep jist as good as pie, and I had a nice quiet afternoon with my spinning. 'Bout fife o'clock, Marm she come out agin, and I asked if she had had a good nap.

"No," says she, "I guess I didn't sleep none. I was real cold, and your great wheel makes sich a noise; no great rest for me, ever, I guess," says she.

"Jist at dark Eben come home. 'Snows like any thing, sis,' says he, 'and blows, too, like Jehu! a real snow-storm. I guess we're going to have it now, Tury.'

"Do tell!" says I; "dare say. Less go get in some more wood, Eb."

"Well, I got supper. Marm said my pumpkin-pies was too gingery, and my dough-nuts too sweet, and my flap-jacks tough; but she eat enough of each of um to find out all its faults, though she said she hadn't a mite of an appetite, and only eat jist enough to keep soul and body together; but it seemed to me that took a good deal.

"After supper 'twas dreadful dull and lonesome; the wind howled, and blowed, and roared in the big chimby, and the windows rattled and shook, and the snow beat up agin um, and the house creaked and jarred, and I kep thinking of father, and how long it would likely be 'fore he was at home; not that I was oneasy 'bout him, but I allers felt more careful and sort of scarey when he was gone.

"Well, we kinder worried along till 'bout seven, and then Marm said she guessed she'd as good go to bed, as she hadn't enjoyed no rest of late; but she didn't s'pose she'd sleep a wink all night, with the wind a-blowing like that, and father away.

"Eb and I, we was glad enough to have her go; but we didn't darst to let her know that, so we didn't let on one word; but I says, 'Well, if you think you'd better go, I would, and Eb here and I we'll see to things.' So I tuck up some hot coals in the warming-pan and warmed her bed for her, nice and hot; and I took and biled up some molasses and water, and put in some ginger and butter, and a sip of speret—this was what Marm allers took for a cold (and, indeed, it never seemed to come amiss at any time)—and I carried it in for her, steaming hot; and I trimmed her lamp, and tucked her up, and bid her 'Good-night!' and then Eb and I went in for our own comfort.

"Fust, we made up a roaring fire; and then Eben got his lesson and I knit; and then I read the newspaper to him, and he whittled—and that took us along to eight o'clock.

"'It's an awful storm, sis,' says Eb.

"'Well, I donno, Eb,' says I; 'I guess it snows pretty fast; but it don't blow near as much as it did.'

"'Don't know as it does,' says he; 'but I'm thinking what'll father do?'

"'Oh, pshaw! don't you worry about him,' says I; 'he's a real live Yankee, father is, and I guess he can take care of himself without your help or mine!'

"'I donno,' says he; 'the lane must be all blocked up, chock-a-block full, by this time, and he's on wheels, you know, Tury.'

"'I know,' says I; 'but I calk'late the travel on the high road will keep that open; and when he gets into town of course he'll go right to El-nathan's, and maybe shift onto Nath's pung to come the rest of the way, or, like as not, stay there till morning.'

"'And then I went and got some apples, and we sot over the fire and eat them; and then we played checkers a while—and then 'twas 'bout nine o'clock.

"'What shall we do now, Tury?' says Eb. 'Suppose I go get some nuts to crack.'

"'I guess you'd better,' says I. 'How do you think Marm would stand the noise?'

"'Oh, Jerusalem!' says he, 'I didn't think of that. Well, I guess that little notion won't do; and I s'pose we can't have a sing, either; but, tell you what, Tury, we'll bile some chest-nuts—that can't disturb her, nohow.'

"'Well, we biled the chestnuts and eat um, and then we didn't know what in the world to do next.

"'Less make some candy, sis,' says Eben; 'will we?'

"'Goodness, no!' says I; 'I can't have ev-ery thing stuck up with molasses this time of night, I can tell you! S'pose we go to bed; 'tain't no airthly use our setting up. If father's coming he'll come, and if he ain't he won't; and what's the use of our being up? I'll rake up fire enough to keep till morning, and set out a lamp and the tinder-box, and if he does come he'll be sure to knock us up. I don't believe it storms much now; the wind seems to have all died away.'

"So we covered up a grand bed of coals, and I sot out a lamp and the lantern and the tinder-box; for, you see, we didn't know nothin' 'bout lucifer matches in them days—goodness, no! Lucifer himself warn't round in the land as he is now; and if he had been, folks wouldn't have cared then to make a match with him!" Here Tury indulged in a loud laugh at her own wit. "Lor, no!" she resumed. "We used to have a tin tinder-box, with a bit of flint and steel, and knock, knock, knock; and sometimes you'd strike fire, and more times you wouldn't, 'specially if you was cold, or hurried, or scared, and your hand shook any.

"Well, we went off to bed 'bout ten o'clock; and I laid awake a good spell, thinking of father, and where he was—whether he was out on the road or safe in at Nath's—though I can't say I was jist real oneasy 'bout him, nuther, for he was a hale, hearty, middle-aged man, and used to taking care of himself and others all his life. Then the poor little baby in the next room cried and fretted, and that kep me awake another spell; but I got to sleep at last, and slept a good while, and when I waked up I thought it must be morning; but no, it was pitch dark, and so I went to sleep again. Well, so I did three or four times. Thinks, says I, 'this is the longest night I ever did know!' Bimeby I felt hungry, and kinder restless, and sorter faint like at my stomach, and I thought I'd jist slip up and light the lamp, and see what time o' night 'twas. So, you see, I slipped on some of my clo'es and opened the door; but—laud of goodness!—the kitchen was as dark as a pocket—not a ray of light from the hearth. I groped round and got hold of the tongs, and opened the ashes—not a spark left of all the bed of coals I had covered up so carefully! All dead out! I was bewildered; but I felt my way to the settle, and got the tinder-box and lamp, and in 'bout ten minutes I struck a light and lit my lamp. Just then the other door opened, and Eben, he come in, half dressed.

"'For the laud's sake, Eben!' says I, 'what in the world are you up for?'

"'Cause I can't sleep,' says he. 'I never knew sich a night; and I'm real hungry, too. I guess we didn't eat s'rpper enough after all, Tury. What o'clock is it?' and he took up the lamp and held it up to the face of the old clock.

"'Hullo! Tury,' says he, 'only twelve o'clock now, and we sot up till after ten!' says he.

"'What in thunder does it mean?' says he.

"'Maybe the clock's stopped,' says I; but I trembled as I said it, I didn't know why.

"'No, it ain't nuther,' says Eben; 'the old feller's all alive and swinging. Look at father's watch, you, Tury, will you?'

"'But the old silver watch said twelve, too.

"'Well, I donno,' says Eben, 'if that don't beat all. Only two hours, Tury? Impossible; and the fire all dead out, too; why that would have kep twelve hours good. How long have we slept? Oh, Tury! what is it? By George, I begin to think we've slept over to-day and into to-morrow!'

"I was too scared to laugh, and I could not answer; I was all of a tremble with the cold and the fright. I went to one of the windows, and opened the wooden shutter—not a ray of light! Then I held up my lamp—a solid body of snow kivered the winder. Eb sprung to the door and half opened it—a solid body of snow reached above it. We both of us see in the same moment what had happened. Buried up in the snow we had slept all night, and—how much more I couldn't tell. Twelve o'clock, and it was pitch dark! Was it twelve at night or twelve at noon? I couldn't tell. Then I was scared. 'Buried alive!' says I, and I sot right down and kivered up my face in my hands, and cried. I knowed I hadn't oughter, but I couldn't help it, nohow. 'Twas a bad fix now, warn't it? I only a gal of fourteen, and with the care of a feeble woman and a sick child—and a boy of eleven all I had to depend on.

"But, there! our Eben was a manly boy—I'll say that for him—and he wasn't easily daunted.

"'Lor, Tury, don't you be scart!' says he. 'What if we are banked up in the snow? Father and Nath are both alive and stirring, and they'll dig us out, never you fear. I think it is precious lucky father was outside to scratch for us. If he had been here with us, nobody mightn't have thought of looking for us for days and days; but, you see, we're all right with father to look out for us.'

"'Father can't do every thing, Eben,' says I, a-sobbing.

"'No, but we have a Father who can,' says he. 'When father fails us, there's God, Tury.'

"I declare 'twas as good as preaching to hear that boy.

"'You're a good boy, Eben,' says I; 'and I oughter been ashamed to let you be the first to say that, and I three years older than you; but I'll put my trust in Him, and do the best I can.'

"'All right, sis,' says he; 'and now let's make a fire, and get some breakfast right away, for I'm tremendous hungry; ain't you?'

"'Well, don't you make no noise to wake up Marm for dear life,' says I; 'for, sure as you do, she'll worry the skins off of us—that ever I should say so.'

"And so then him and me begun to make a fire; but jist as it begun to kindle, Eb, who was standing looking on, poked his head up chimblly, and then, quick as thought, what does he do but pull the fire all apart, and stamp it all out.

"'Why, Eben Hapgood, what under the sun did you do that for?' says I. 'What sort of mischief are you up to now?'

"'Mischief?' says he. 'Look up the chimblly yourself, Tury.'

"Well, I looked, but I couldn't see a thing.

"'What is it?' says I.

"'Covered with snow,' says he. 'We mustn't make a fire.'

"'Mustn't?' Pshaw, nonsense,' says I; 'I guess so. Won't the heat melt the snow? You'll see the fire will do the business in a few moments.'

"'Stop, Tury,' says he. 'Before the fire melts that snow it has got to burn, hain't it? and in the mean time, if there ain't no draught, where is the smoke to go to? Don't you see we are packed in as tight as in a box, and if the smoke can't go up chimblly, won't it come out into the room here, and choke us? Don't, pray, make a fire, if you don't want to make a regular smoke-house of the place, and bacon us all by wholesale.' Now warn't that smart for a boy only eleven years old to have thought of?

"'But, Eben,' says I, 'sha'n't we freeze here without any fire?'

"'Oh! I guess not,' says he. 'We're so banked up that the wind can't get in; and if we are a little coldish that's better than being choked with smoke. But what shall we do for breakfast, Tury? I'm most awful hungry. I never could stand nothing with an empty stomach,' says he.

"'Well,' says I, 'Eb, we've got cold meat, and baked beans, and bread, and cake, and pies in the house; so you see we sha'n't starve, any way.'

"'No,' says he, 'sha'n't starve; but I kinder want something hot. I vow I'd give my best jack-knife for a cup of hot tea or coffee.'

"'Can't have it, I guess,' says I, looking at the great, yawning, black fire-place. 'Stop a minute though, Eb. Come to think out, there's the old nurse-lamp father bought when little Martha was sick; couldn't we manage to kinder cook with that?'

"'Well thought of,' says Eben. 'You go get it, Tury, and get on the rest of your clo'es, and then we'll try our hands at it. I guess we'll make it work.'

"So I rummaged out the lamp, and, sure enough, we managed to heat some water, to make some tea, and bile some eggs, and we had quite a breakfast.

"'Well,' says Eb, 'my condition is wonderfully improved by that. Now, Tury, wouldn't it be well to give poor Marm a feed? I reckon she must be hungry, too, by this time.'

"So we fixed up a nice breakfast for mother-in-law—a bowl of hot tea, two biled eggs, two crackers split, and dipped in hot water, and buttered, a piece of pie, some cold meat, and so on—and I took it into her room for her.

"'It's dark and stormy,' says I, 'and I thought, mebbe, as you wan't very well, you'd like your breakfast in here, Marm,' says I.

"'What time is it?' says Marm, rousing up.

"'Well, I don't exactly know,' says I, 'but I reckon it's early.'

"'Look at my lamp, Tury,' says she, 'it didn't burn half the night. I do wish you was more careful about things.'

"I looked at the lamp; the oil was burned clean out.

"'Well, I'll get another for you, Marm,' says I; and I shed out the empty one, and then fetched in a full one.

"'What in the world did you bring me tea for?' says Marm. 'Ain't you got no coffee?'

"'No,' says I; 'I didn't make none to-day, and I thought you liked tea better.'

"'That's when I have the headache,' says she. 'Hasn't father come home yet?'

"'No,' says I, 'he didn't come.'

"'It's real onfeeling in him,' says she, 'to stay out when he knows how sick I am.' I didn't say nothing—I darsn't. 'This is pretty poor toast,' says she next. 'I shouldn't think it was toasted at all! It looks as if it hadn't seen no fire!'

"'Thinks I, 'Then its looks don't belie it,' but I didn't say it had or it hadn't.

"'So I waited till she'd eat up all I'd brought her, and then I asked how the baby was.

"'Miserably enough,' says Marm; 'and I guess when you come to have a sick child yourself, and learn what it is to be broke of your rest, you'll remember your carelessness about my lamp and be ashamed of it.' Well, mebbe I might have been, but that time never come yet.

"'Oh! what a long, dreary day or night (for we couldn't tell which to call it) that was! Bitter cold! My hands too chilled to spin or knit, I hadn't nothing to do. I couldn't cook, or wash, or iron for want of a fire; and I couldn't sweep or clean house by lamplight. Then the house seemed so onnaturally still—not a sound from outside, and every little noise we made, if it was only to move a cheer, or drop a spoon, it had an unnatural, choking sort of sound. Now and then the poor little baby would wail out, or we'd hear Marm hushing and lullabying to him, and their voices sounded holler, as if from a tomb!

"'Bimeby Marm she called me, and told me to take a blanket to the fire and warm it for the baby, and I had to tell her I couldn't.

"'You can't?' says Marm. 'Do tell! And why not, I'd like to know?'

"'Fore I could think of any excuse—for I didn't want to worry her with the truth—our Eben he stepped right in and told her the whole out.

"'So you needn't find no fault with Tury, Marm,' says he; 'for she's done the very best she could for you; and we ha'n't had a mite of fire for I donno how long!'

"'No fire!' says Marm, starting up. 'Why, children! you don't mean you've been in the cold all that time?'

"'Every mite of it,' says Eben, 'and Tury's all but froze to death now. Look at her—she's all purple!' Marm didn't say another word.

"'When it come six again we made some more tea, as much for something to do as any thing, I guess; for we hadn't much appetite then; and I took some more in for Marm. She drank it, but never said a word, only, 'Let me know when father comes.'

"'How is the baby now, Marm?' says I.

"'The baby?' says she; 'oh! he is quiet now. Let me know the minute father comes.'

"'Well, after that seemed to me it grew colder and colder; but maybe it was only 'cause our hope was all dying out, and nothing was left to warm us but our love for each other and our trust in God. Eben and I got the blankets and comforters off of our beds and wrapped them about us, and we nestled close together, with our arms about each other's neck. Once Marm opened her door and asked me for a drink. She looked paler than usual, and very ghastly.

"'At last—I donno how long it was, we didn't keep no reckoning, for we had grown drowsy with the cold, and were asleep in each other's arms—I heered a dull noise.

"'What's that?' says I, starting up. 'Eb! Eb! rouse up! What was that?'

"'Father!' says Eben, kinder dreaming like.

"'Another louder noise—a sorter scraping sound—and then Eben heard it too, and we both jumped up, and stood holding each other by the hand, and almost afraid to draw a breath. Then came a dull, heavy blow on the top of the chimney, and a whole lot of snow came flounce down into the fire-place, and jist then Marm come out and stood by the hearth pale and trembling.

"'Then father's voice (for it was father, sure enough) called down the chimney: 'Wife! children! are you safe? Speak! in mercy, speak!'

"'I looked round for Marm to answer; but I see she couldn't. Her lips moved, but didn't make no noise. She was pale as a ghost, and a-trembling all over, and she made a sign for me to speak.

"'All alive and well, father,' says I, 'only 'most froze. Make haste.'

"'Thank God! thank God!' says father, heartily. 'Now I can work!' And then such a scraping and digging! you never! We found out afterward that father, and Nath, and a dozen of the neighbors—strong, stout men—with four pair of cattle, had been most of two days in getting up to us from Nath's!

"'It was Wednesday night the snow fell, and it was Saturday morning when they dug us out. Oh! how good the fresh air and sunshine seemed to us agin! Eben he stood all ready, and sprung out with a shout as soon as the door was cleared. Father laid his hand on the boy's head as he passed by him, and said 'God bless you, my gal!' to me, and then he hurried on to mother-in-law, who still stood, pale as a sheet, trembling and silent, on the hearth. Just as he reached her she kinder wilted right away, and sallied over, and would have dropped right down on the hearth if father hadn't caught her.

"'Why, Susie dear!' says father, 'why, Susie! what is it, lovie? Why, she's in a dead faint! Open the door, Tury. We'd best lay her on the bed, I guess.'

"'Ah, poor Marm! When we got into the bedroom then we knew well enough what it was; for there, on Marm's bed, lay a little white heap—cold and still as the snow outside!

"'Poor Marm! She knowed we children couldn't help her, nohow, and so she had kept her own sad secret. Ah, well! there was some good in mother-in-law, after all! I s'pose there is in most every body; at least folks says there is—I dunno!"

A CHRISTMAS HYMN.

MONTH after month, sublime and calm,
The moon repeats the mystic birth,
And, with her new-born "on her arm,"
Walks forth before the silent earth.

So when the Year grows dim and cold,
With faded form and lifeless face,
The New Year starts, all fresh and bold,
Like a young hero, for the race.

By quickened seed, by dawning light,
Is the same prophecy retold;
The Morning cometh of the Night,
The New is daughter of the Old.

"So," says the doubter, "comes your creed,
So is the human heart enticed;
The hope, the prophecy, the need,
Ye give it shape, and name it—Christ.

"The eager, asking heart, forthwith,
By Nature's answering voice beguiled,
Grasps in fond faith the lovely myth
Of the fair mother's heavenly child."

"Nay, Christ is come!" our heart replies;
"More real than the wakened earth,
More radiant than the morning skies
This glory of the second birth."

Yea, and herein is all our hope.
No light-restoring morn can cheer,
No life-restoring spring can ope
The heart grown old, and dark, and sere.

But Christ is come! and, lo! around
This sunless, cold, and barren night
His shining arm of strength is wound,
Drawing the darkness to the light.

What though the old shall perish? Still,
Fresh from its wintry grave shall start
A life renewed, a nobler will,
A stronger and more steadfast heart.

And more than this: the blasted fruit,
The fallen leaf, the year's regret,
Shall feed the soil from which shall shoot
The harvest of our being, yet.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

THE Harper's Ferry insurrection has, to a great extent, engrossed public attention during the past month. As noted in our last Record, Brown was sentenced to be hung on the 2d of December. Four of his associates, Coppie, Cooke, Green, and Copeland, the two latter colored men, were tried, found guilty, and sentenced to be hung on the 16th of December. Stephens has been handed over for trial to the United States courts. The State tribunals can only compel the attendance of witnesses within the Commonwealth, while the United States courts can bring them from any part of the country. If, therefore, Brown had accomplices other than those actually engaged in his attempt, the fact will probably be shown at the trial of Stephens. Thus far nothing has appeared in any way implicating any persons except Colonel Hugh Forbes, an Englishman, who came to this country some years since in consequence of his connection with various revolutionary movements upon the Continent—he has been engaged partly in literary pursuits, and partly as a teacher of military tactics and fencing; and Frederick Douglass, a colored man, known as an Abolition speaker. Both of these have left the country to avoid being summoned as witnesses. It was reported that papers were found in possession of Brown implicating Gerrit Smith, of Peterborough, New York, at one time a Member of Congress, and known for a long time as a devoted Abolitionist; and that the Governor of Virginia had made a requisition upon the Governor of New York for the surrender of Mr. Smith. These reports, for which there appears to have been no foundation, affected Mr. Smith in such a manner as to cause an attack of insanity, which compelled his removal to the Lunatic Asylum.—In Virginia the excitement was intense, especially in the neighborhood of Charlestown, the shire town of the county, where the prisoners were confined. Reports were circulated that an attempt would be made to rescue Brown before or on the day of execution. Considerable bodies of military were therefore quartered in Charlestown, a vigilant watch was kept upon all strangers, and all who presented any suspicious appearance were sent away. As the day of execution approached these precautions were still more rigidly enforced. On the 28th of November Governor Wise issued a proclamation announcing that on the 1st, 2d, and 3d of December the railroad trains would be taken possession of by the State for the sole use of the troops. All citizens of the Commonwealth were warned to remain at home on the day of the execution, and to abstain from going to Charlestown, and strangers were cautioned that it would be dangerous for them to approach the place. On the same day the military and civic authorities at Charlestown issued a proclamation announcing that until after the 2d of December "all strangers found within the county of Jefferson and counties adjacent, having no known and proper business there, and who can not give a satisfactory account of themselves, will be at once arrested. On and for a proper period before that day strangers, and especially parties approaching under the pretext of being present at the execution of John Brown, whether by railroad or otherwise, will be met by the military and turned back or arrested; and during the said period the citizens of Jefferson and the surrounding country are warned to remain at their homes, armed, and guard their own property. No women or children will be allowed to come near the place of execution."—There seems to have been no necessity for these strict precautions. A few persons at the North, known for their extreme hostility to slavery, have given expression to feelings of sympathy for Brown, and have justified his attempt; but there is no evidence that any effort to rescue him was ever contemplated from any quarter.—Brown showed great firmness throughout the whole affair. On the 1st of December he had a long interview with his wife, who had just arrived, and gave directions for the disposition of his little property. He had the day before written a long letter to his family, giving them religious counsel, but ending with an adjuration that they should “abhor with undying hatred that sum of all villainies—slavery. On the morning of his execution he was allowed to visit his confederates in their cells. At eleven o'clock he was brought out for execution, guarded by six companies of infantry and one troop of cavalry. Only the military and some reporters were allowed within the field where the gallows was erected. He ascended the gallows with a firm step, and at a quarter past eleven the drop fell. After hanging a time sufficient to make it certain that life was extinct, the body was taken down and delivered to his wife, by whom it was carried away for interment.

The thirty-sixth Congress convened on Monday, December 5, the day on which our Record closes. In the Senate, forty-eight of the sixty-six members were present. The Vice-President, Mr. Breckenridge, took the chair. Mr. Mason, of Virginia, offered a resolution for the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the facts attending the late seizure of the armory and arsenal at Harper's Ferry by a band of armed men; to report whether this seizure was made under color of an organization to subvert the Government of the United States; the character of such organization; who were in any way implicated in it; and also what legislation is necessary for the future preservation of the peace and the safety of public property. Mr. Trumbull, of Illinois, gave notice that when the resolution came up, he should move to amend by extending the inquiry to the seizure of the arsenal at Franklin, Missouri.—In the House, 230 out of 237 members were present. A ballot was taken for Speaker. Mr. Boccock, Democrat, of Virginia, received 86 votes; Mr. Sherman, Republican, of Ohio, 66; Mr. Grow, Republican, of Pennsylvania, 43; Mr. Boteler, American, of Virginia, 14; the remainder being divided among ten candidates; 116 votes being necessary for a majority, there was consequently no choice. Mr. Grow then withdrew his name as a candidate. Mr. Clark, of Missouri, then offered a resolution to the effect that The doctrines and sentiments of a book called “The Impending Crisis at the South,” the circulation of which had been recommended by many persons at the North, were incendiary and hostile to the peace and tranquillity of the country; and that no person who recommended or indorsed it was fit to be Speaker of the House. A desultory debate upon this resolution occupied the remainder of the day, and no further ballot was held for Speaker.

In New York the election for members of the Legislature, Secretary of State, Treasurer, and other State officers, was held on the 1st of November. In the Legislature the Republicans have a majority of nearly three to one, in both branches. For State officers the Americans, as before noted, selected five of the candidates nominated by the Republicans, and four of those of the Democrats. The candidates supported by Republicans and Americans were elected by average majorities of 48,000; three of those supported by Democrats and Americans had majorities of 300, 1100, and 1500; while the Republican candidate for State Prison Inspector was chosen by a majority of 672 over his opponent, supported by Democrats and Americans. About 503,000 votes were cast, of which 251,000 were Republican, 227,000 Democrat, and 25,000 American.—In Massachusetts N. P. Banks has been re-elected Governor by a majority of 23,000 over B. F. Butler, Democrat; G. N. Briggs, Whig, received 15,500 votes.—In New Jersey C. S. Olden, Republican, was elected Governor by a majority of 1600 over E. V. Wright, Democrat. The Legislature is Democratic, by a small majority.—Governor Wise, of Virginia, in his Message, dwells at length upon the Harper's Ferry affair. He says that he had been compelled, by the apprehension of a most unparalleled border war, to place the State in as full military defense as if foreign enemies had invaded the country. The reports of organized conspiracies to obstruct the execution of the laws were from so many sources, at such distances from each other, that they could not proceed from a desire to hoax. One of the most irritating features of the predatory war against the South, the Governor says, is that it has its seat in the British provinces, which furnish asylums for fugitives, and send them and their hired outlaws from rendezvous in the neighboring States. There is no danger from our slaves or colored people. The slaves seized refused to take up arms, and the first man killed by Brown was a respectable free negro, who was running away from him. The South, he says, must demand of each State what position it means to maintain in the future in respect to slavery, and the provision of the Constitution, and laws for its protection, and be governed according to the manner in which the demand shall be met.—Governor Gist, of South Carolina, in his Message, advocates the secession of the South from the Union, in case of the election of a Republican President. A resolution was offered in the Legislature of that State on the 30th of November, to the effect that “the State of South Carolina is ready to enter, together with the other slaveholding States, or such as desire present action, into the formation of a Southern Confederacy.”—The Attorney-General of Virginia, in response to a request from the Governor, has given an elaborate opinion that the power of the General Government over matter transmitted through the mails does not extend to its distribution by postmasters; and that consequently local laws respecting such distribution may be enforced. This opinion has special reference to the circulation of “incendiary documents” in the South.

During the year the hostilities of the savage tribes upon our northwestern frontier have been unusually frequent. A report from the War Department gives in detail official accounts of nineteen separate actions between September 20, 1858, and October 19, 1859. In these engagements between three and four hundred Indians were killed, wounded, or captured; between fifty and one hundred of our troops were killed and wounded; and a large number of animals of various kinds were taken from the Indians.—Serious disturbances exist on the frontiers of Texas and Mexico. Brownsville, on the Rio Grande, has for some time been threatened by a desperado named Cortinas, who has gathered about him a considerable band, threatening the whole surrounding region. Forces had been dispatched thither, and at the latest dates a decisive action seemed imminent.

General Winfield Scott reached San Francisco on the 9th of October, and after being properly welcomed proceeded to the scene of his mission, arriving at Portland, in Oregon Territory, on the 29th. He has submitted the following proposition to Governor Douglass: "Without prejudice to the claim of either nation to the sovereignty of the entire island of San Juan, now in dispute, it is proposed that each shall occupy a separate portion of the same by a detachment of infantry riflemen, or marines, not exceeding one hundred men, with their appropriate arms, only for the equal protection of their respective countrymen on said island, in their persons and property, and to repel any descent on the part of hostile Indians." Governor Douglass replied that he had not as yet laid the proposition before his official advisers, but was satisfied that no obstacle existed to a satisfactory arrangement as to the occupancy of the island while negotiations were pending.

The British iron screw-steamer Indian, bound from Liverpool to Portland, was wrecked on the coast of Nova Scotia, about seventy miles from Halifax, on the 21st of November. Of one hundred and fifteen persons on board, passengers and crew, twenty-seven were lost.

Washington Irving died at his residence, Sunnyside, on the 28th of November. He finished his Life of Washington some months ago, since which time his health had been somewhat impaired, though no immediate danger was apprehended. On the day before his death he attended church. He spent the next evening with his family, as usual, and retired to his room at half past 10. He had scarcely reached the apartment when he fell to the floor and died instantly, without a word. He was born in the city of New York on the 3d of April, 1783, and was, consequently, past the middle of his seventy-seventh year.

SOUTHERN AMERICA.

From Mexico the accounts are not favorable to the Liberals, who had been defeated at Queretaro and Tepic, with considerable loss. They, however, gained a victory at Tudancingo, where 400 men were killed and half the town burned.

In Haiti a conspiracy had been formed against President Geffrard. Madame Blanford, the daughter of the President, was shot at her residence, with the design of attracting her father to the spot, so that he might be assassinated. Twenty of the conspirators had been sentenced to death, of whom sixteen were executed; one was respited, and three escaped from the country. The President issued an order directing that all persons detected in exciting hostility toward the Government, by word or writing, should receive warning from the police; and on a repetition of the offense should be sent into the interior or banished from the country.

In Venezuela the insurgents suffered a severe defeat on the 25th of October. They had intrenched themselves, to the number of 450, in the town of Campano, where they were attacked by 800 Government troops. The place was taken, after a combat of twenty-seven hours. The rebel leaders at Cumana fled, and attempted to escape, but were taken.

From Paraguay we learn that President Lopez, in reply to an inquiry of Commander Page, granted permission to ascend the Paraguay River, and said that after this had been done the Government would consider his proposition to explore the Pilcomayo, with the design of finding a navigable water-course across the Grand Chaco to the mountains of Bolivia. Notwithstanding the permission to explore the Paraguay, many vexatious restraints were laid upon the expedition. All the wood of the country is the property of the Government, who demanded twenty dollars a cord for it, and it could only be purchased at points where there were Government officers to sell it. Lopez hoped that the expedition would find itself obliged to cut wood for itself, and thus give a pretext for the refusal of permission to prosecute its explorations. But this necessity was avoided on the ascent by a judicious use of a small quantity of coal on board the steamer, and on the descent the steamer was loaded with wood from the Brazilian provinces.

EUROPE.

The treaty, negotiated at Zurich, between France and Austria, has been signed, and formal ratifications were to be shortly exchanged. The affairs of Italy are to be settled by a Congress of the European Powers, summoned by invitation of France and Austria. The English papers discuss the question whether Great Britain will take part in the Congress.—A letter, whose genuineness is affirmed to be undoubted, from the French Emperor to the King of Sardinia, has been made public. The question, Napoleon says, is not whether he did well or ill in making peace at Villafranca, but rather to obtain from that treaty the results the most favorable for the pacification of Italy and for the repose of Europe. The essential elements of Italian regeneration are set down as follows: Italy to be composed of several independent States, united by a federal bond. Each of these States to adopt a particular representative system and salutary reforms. The Confederation to have but one flag, one system of customs, and one currency. The directing centre to be at Rome, which should be composed of representatives named by the sovereigns, from a list prepared by the Chambers. By granting to the Holy Father the honorary presidency of the Confederation the religious sentiment of Catholic Europe would be satisfied, the moral influence of the Pope would be increased throughout Italy, and would enable him to make concessions in conformity with the legitimate wishes of the populations. Although the rights of the sovereigns of Tuscany, Parma, and Modena have been reserved for the consideration of the Congress, the independence of Central Italy has been guaranteed, as all idea of foreign intervention has been set aside, and Venetia is to become a purely Italian province. "It is the real interest of your Majesty," adds this significant letter, "to second me in the development of this plan, in order to obtain from it the best results; for your Majesty can not forget that I am bound by the treaty, and I can not, in the Congress which is about to open, withdraw myself from my engagements. The part of France is traced beforehand."—The same general ideas are elaborated in a circular addressed by Count Walewski to the French diplomatic agents. Austria, says the circular, in ceding to Sardinia a territory containing three-fifths of its ancient possessions beyond the Alps, and increasing the population of that kingdom by one-third, renounces the principal basis of her influence in Italy. Her position is no longer aggressive or preponderating, and is of a character which may coincide with the free development of Italy. It was but just that Sardinia should receive Lombardy, charged with its obligations as well as its resources. The difficulty in fixing the amount of debt chargeable to the province delayed the negotiations for a month. Austria demanded 600,000,000 francs; but the amount was finally fixed at 375,000,000. France, in return for her many sacrifices, only asks from Sar-india an indemnity of 60,000,000 francs—only about one-sixth of the expenses of the war. The treaty of Zurich also stipulates an amnesty, as extended as possible, for all individuals compromised in the war. The Government of the Emperor, continues the circular, "has already received from the Holy Father assurances that he only awaits a favorable moment to make known the reforms which he proposes conferring upon his States, and which will have the effect, by assuring a laical government to the country, of giving it guarantees of a better distribution of justice and of a control over the financial department, by means of an elective Assembly."—The States of Central Italy, however, seem quite indisposed to submit the choice of their rulers to foreign powers. Parma, Modena, Romagna, and Tuscany formally offered the Regency of these States to Prince Carignan. He declined it, "for weighty reasons of political propriety," and on account of the approaching European Congress; but named the Chevalier Buoncampagni for the post, who has signified his readiness to accept; but the French Government is affirmed to be opposed to the project of a regency for Central Italy.

From Great Britain the main intelligence of interest is the growing conviction of the probability of hostilities, at no distant day, with France, and the consequent activity with which military and naval preparations are urged on. The Government has formed a plan for the enrollment of volunteer seamen, to be called into service when necessary. Every able-bodied British subject, not exceeding 35 years of age, who has within the last ten years been five years at sea, may be enrolled in the Reserve naval force. Each volunteer receives an annual payment of six pounds. If he continues as long as he is physically able, he will, when incapacitated for earning a livelihood, receive a pension of not less than twelve pounds. He must attend drill for twenty-eight days each year, during which time he receives the pay and rations of a seaman in the fleet, in addition to his retaining pay. He must report himself every six months, and must not, without permission, engage for a voyage that will occupy more than six months. This Reserve may be called into actual service by Royal proclamation; but it is intended to exercise this authority only in case of an emergency which requires a sudden increase of the navy. When called out for actual service, the volunteers are placed in every respect on an equal footing with regular men-of-war's men. These measures of precaution appear to be justified by the general tone of the French press, which can hardly be supposed to speak without the tacit concurrence of Government. It assumes almost daily a tone of increasing hostility toward Great Britain.—It is at last decided that the Great Eastern will not cross the Atlantic during the present season. Her trial trips, as a whole, have shown that too many defects existed to render it advisable to send her to sea at present.—A violent storm prevailed all over England during the night of the 25th of November. Great damage was done to the shipping. The iron screw steamer Royal Charter, from Melbourne, was wrecked on the coast of Anglesea, and out of 511 persons on board, 455 were lost.

THE EAST.

One of the officers of the United States steamer Powhatan, who accompanied our Minister, Mr. Ward, to Peking, gives an amusing account of the visit. After leaving the vessel, the embassy were conveyed for the first forty-five miles in wheeled carriages, accompanied by an honorary guard, who manifested the most officious politeness. They then struck the River Tien-tsing, and five days' slow tracking against the rapid current brought them to Teng-choo, the entrepôt of Peking, a single stage from the capital, where they arrived on the 27th of July. The Chinese officials made a persistent effort to induce Mr. Ward to perform the kotow, or act of prostration, on being presented to the Emperor. He said that this ceremony had been waived in the case of the English treaty. They replied that the English had violated that treaty, and it could not be quoted as a precedent. Mr. Ward said that he had not asked an audience of the Emperor, and desired the Commissioners to proceed to the ratification of the treaty. They replied that the Emperor could not ignore the presence of a foreign Minister, and that the question of an audience was the first thing to be settled. Mr. Ward said the kotow was an act of homage inconsistent with the equality of an independent nation. They offered to recognize this independence by reducing the prostrations from nine to three. He said that he would as willingly prostrate himself a hundred times as one; he objected to the prostration itself, not to the number of repetitions. The Chinese then proposed that the subject should be deferred to another meeting, and in the mean while each party should study the rites observed in the country of the other, and they would arrange an audience after the forms used in our country. At this next meeting it was difficult to convince them that in our country prostration formed no part of the ceremony of presentation to the Chief of the nation. A kneeling posture was indispensable; and so the interview closed. The next day the official came back with a proposition which would, he said, "save the dignity of both nations." A table should be placed between our Minister and the Emperor. On approaching, Mr. Ward should bow, when a couple of court chamberlains should rush up, saying to him, "Don't kneel, don't kneel!" This was agreed to, with the distinct understanding that our Minister had no intention of kneeling. The next day, however, the Chinese official insisted that, on being presented, the Minister should at least touch the floor with one knee. This was promptly refused, and the negotiations appeared to be at an end. Two days after, the Chinese official said that all difficulty would be removed in case Mr. Ward would give assurances that in his course he had been influenced by no feelings of disrespect for the Emperor. He thereupon added a paragraph of respect to a document which he had just prepared; this was given to the Chinese Ministers, upon condition that they should apply the same expressions of respect to the President of the United States. A communication was received, containing the required expressions of respect, and inclosing the copy of an Imperial edict, contrasting the conduct of the envoys of Great Britain and America; appointing the Prime Minister to receive the President's letter; ordering the seal of state to be applied to the treaty of Tien-tsing; and directing the copy thus ratified to be transmitted to the Viceroy of Chih-le, to be exchanged at the sea-port of Pei-tang. The audience with the Emperor and the ceremony of the kotow were thus evaded; and unless the characteristic faithlessness of the Chinese should interpose some new obstacle, we may consider the treaty with China as fully confirmed and ratified.

Literary Notices.

Reminiscences of Rufus Choate, by EDWARD G. PARKER. (Published by Mason Brothers.) The late Mr. Choate, both in his professional character and his personal habits, was one of the most original men whose fame has become the property of their countrymen. His voice, his selection of words, his illustrations, his mode of reasoning, his manners and address, his appearance in the street, even his wonderful handwriting, were stamped with the deepest impression of individuality. In every thing that gave him his high distinction before the public he was unlike all other men. Not that he had a passion for notoriety, or desired to gratify an absurd vanity by being singular; but he was constructed on a unique model; his rich and peculiar nature demanded a manifestation of its own. There was something weird and mysterious in his presence, which always excited a romantic interest. "With his disheveled locks waving about his head; his gloomy countenance, in which grief and glory contended—the signature of sorrows and the consciousness of acknowledged power—the Oriental complexion speaking of an Asiatic type of man; his darkly-burning eyes; his walk swaying along in that singular gait which made his broad square shoulders careen from side to side, like the opposite bulwarks of a ship; his moody loneliness—for when off duty he was rarely seen other than alone; his self-absorption of thought producing a sort of impression as of a mysterious silence around him—he moved about more as a straggler from another civilization than a Yankee lawyer of New England growth and stature."

Mr. Choate was born in Ipswich, Massachusetts, October 1, 1799, and was brought up in Essex County, with but ordinary advantages of schooling. He entered Dartmouth College at the age of sixteen, having already won the reputation of brilliant talents and precocious acquisitions in the neighborhood where he lived. His college course fully sustained the promise of his earlier years. He at once took the highest rank in his class; and before he graduated was deemed qualified to be a professor in any university in America. He took no interest in the youthful sports of his companions, but would sit or stand under the big tree, gazing and talking to himself, while the other boys were kicking foot-ball. He preferred his beloved books or lonely walks. He used to sit with his books, reading and meditating, until long after midnight, and sometimes far into the morning.

Soon after leaving college he commenced the study of law, spending a few months at the Cambridge Law School; and subsequently entering the office of the celebrated William Wirt, at that time Attorney-General of the United States. He remained in Washington for a year, when he returned to complete his studies in Salem, and was admitted to the bar in 1822. He immediately took a high rank in his profession. He applied himself so earnestly to his duties that he entirely neglected literature. Striking out the line of practice in which he afterward excelled, he bent every energy to getting a verdict. Every thing was sacrificed to the success of his cause. He would even give what he knew was bad law to the jury rather than lose their verdict. He was retained in all the most important causes, and in criminal trials almost monopolized the practice. His skill in defense was marvelous; and while practicing at the Essex bar no jury ever brought in a verdict of guilty against one of his clients. He always exerted himself to the utmost of his ability in every case, and that was the great secret of his success. No matter what the tribunal, the party, or the fee, he went into the cause with his whole strength, and summoned to his aid all his vast resources of logic, wit, utterance, learning, and knowledge of men—contending as for his very life for mastery and success. He was a full-grown lawyer, jurist, advocate from the very start. He had sounded the depths of the law in his early studies. He always read with pen in hand, noting and inwardly digesting every thing. He read every thing, understood every thing, and remembered every thing. His mind was filled with all knowledge. With all his remarkable exuberance of diction, he never uttered a word to the ear which had not an effective bearing on the topic in hand. His habits, at this time, were of the most industrious and studious character. He rose early in the morning, and was busy with his books at his office long before the day-laborers went to their work. He was accustomed to take long and solitary walks, frequently in the pastures. In these lonely rambles his voice was sometimes heard by other strollers, who were thus unexpectedly made auditors of the enthusiastic advocate, while the partridges and squirrels were startled by the tones that were wasting their sweetness on the desert air.

Mr. Choate removed from Salem, and took up his residence in Boston in the year 1834. He was still young—but scarcely thirty-five. He entered at once into the lists with the ablest leaders of the Suffolk bar, and commenced a brilliant progress of successes and of fame. At first his singular appearance and manners made an unfavorable impression. The old leaders of the bar looked on him as an eccentric youth, rather than a formidable rival. His uncouth gestures and strange ways moved the mirth of his new associates. The tables, however, were soon turned. The young champion was constantly crowned with victory; verdict after verdict was on his side; his points of law were sustained in full court; and the opinion of the profession underwent a complete change.

Of the personal appearance and habits of Mr. Choate the volume before us contains a fund of pleasant reminiscences. In the maturity of his powers he was rather a tall and full-sized man, sturdy and muscular, though with a somewhat worn look. He was strongly built, with big bones, broad shoulders, large feet, and bony hands, and of a tough fibre in his physical organization generally. His chest was broad and powerful. His temperament, which was the nervous bilious, fitted him for strenuous effort and brilliant performance. His hair floated in wavy locks, and remained firmly set to the last. It was always black, and to the close of his life was hardly tinged with gray. He was a man of great strength, capable of intense fatigue, with a remarkable power of endurance. Though he had the appearance of ill health, and was subject to frequent sick headaches, he was far from being feeble. It was not weakness, but fearful overwork, which wore him down. He gave himself no recreation but a change of labors. He walked daily out of town or round Boston Common, but his brain kept constantly at work. Those who met him in the gray of the morning would see his lips moving and his features working in unison with the activity of his thoughts. He had no passionate love of nature, though he delighted in descriptions of natural scenery. For games or sports of any kind he had not the slightest fancy. He was even without a taste for horses, never wishing to take the reins on a drive, and as indifferent to a blood mare of Arabian stock as if she had been a cart-horse from the streets. Books were his only pastime. In them he literally lived, and moved, and had his being. His library was his home. His authors were the loves of his life. He had more faith in books than in men. He found a charm merely in pulling them down and putting them up again. He cherished rare editions. He bought books without stint. Every inch of space on the walls of his long library was filled. There was no room for more but under his bed. He had collected some eight thousand volumes, besides a great variety of books of engravings and plates. He had bought his library, not to be looked at, but to be read. He forever had a book in his hand. He read while walking. He read at his meals. Even when, at one time, he was so lame from an accident as to be unable to walk to and from court, he had his carriage-seat half covered with books, which he devoured as he rode. He once told a friend that, in his youth, he had frequently read inspiring sentences of ambition and splendor which made him thrill all over, or, as he quaintly expressed it, "they made me have goose-flesh all down my back." He read every thing he could lay his hands on, both old and new. Bacon, Burke, Milton, Pope, the Bible, were never long out of sight. Of the ancients, he clung to Plato and Demosthenes, Tacitus and Cicero. Each of these he knew almost by heart. Their thoughts and phrases perpetually sparkled on his tongue. Every day he committed to memory some passages of poetry. During the last few years of his life he made himself master of German.

In his manners Mr. Choate was singularly uncouth, though not repulsive. Though he had no grace of action, he always exhibited a natural courtesy. In a formal party he was altogether out of place, and presented a forlorn appearance. He was never a social man, or betrayed any inclination to conviviality. He could be tempted to attend a dinner party, but it was for the good talk, when guests of intellect were present, not for the good cheer or good wine. He was far, indeed, from loving the pleasures of the table. He rarely indulged in beyond a glass or two of wine, though he would occasionally drink strong brandy. He remarked one day to a friend, who was dining with him: "Hot water and tea are the best stimulants for a speaker; they leave no sting behind. But if one must use wine, sherry is the best of all possible wines."

In the arrangements of his office Mr. Choate was the same original as elsewhere. He always shut himself up in his inner sanctum, the door carefully closed, and perched up on an odd-looking high chair, before a high desk, with pen in hand, he plunged into his work as into a battle. There was a table in his office, but he never sat down to it. When he was not in court trying a case, he was a fixture at his desk, with pigeon-holes full of papers in front of it, and a broad back-ground of the books in buff behind him. Nothing distracted him from his labors but business, or a talk about books, or some philosophic or historical theme. He could ill resist the temptation to converse on such topics. If one of them were started he would turn at once from the law, and, not laying down his pen, commence talking on it with as much readiness as if it had been the subject of his thoughts for a week. If he ever paused to say any thing not on business or books, it was for some droll or witty observation. Nothing occurred, no odd person came in, no peculiar thing was said, but it drew from Mr. Choate some mirthful comment.

He was quite insensible to the value of money. He was not known to make any charges in his books, and never seemed to have any cash on hand. If he wanted money, he would get one of his students to draw a check for him, even for only five dollars, and he would sign it. If he drew the check himself, he made a sad botch of it. It was a common saying among his friends that, when he had to take a journey, he was often obliged to ransack the neighboring offices in order to find some one that could lend him the money to go with. Unlike some of the fraternity of great men, however, strange to say, he very often paid what he borrowed.

Mr. Choate's bearing and manners at the bar were a model of professional courtesy. In the fullest bloom of his honors he never looked superciliously upon his younger brethren or contemptuously on those who were his superiors in years. He took pleasure in recognizing the promise and merits of the young men of the bar. His own juniors in a cause were always treated with marked respect before a jury. In his intercourse with young lawyers, both in his office and in court, his manners were eminently kindly and encouraging. To his peers in age he was uniformly respectful and decorous. He never made them feel small in their own eyes, though they must often have appeared so in his. He could see real merit in others as quickly as they could in themselves, and was always prompt and ready to admit it. The only lawyer at the bar to whom he did not do complete justice was himself. Every one who wore the robe of the advocate was to him an object of respect. In his own characteristic phrase, they all were of the number of "those who are concerned in the administration of this vast and complicated system of law." The office of judge, whether superior or inferior, was, in his mind, a high magistracy. His demeanor in the court-room was singularly modest and unassuming. If the opposite counsel, as was sometimes the case, was a young man, the manner of the youth would generally indicate that he was the greater man of the two. Even when the evidence was in, and he made his appearance in court, on the morning of the argument, pressing through the thronged bar and the crowded aisles, he manifested no elation of feeling or consciousness of triumph. During the whole trial his action was a study. In his later years he rarely knew much about a cause till he got into court. He gave great attention to all the preliminaries. He did not engage in conversation with any one, nor permit his eyes to wander round the court-room. After the opening by his junior, and hearing the other side, he seemed to grasp the whole case as by intuition. He took constant and copious notes in his strange hieroglyphical hand. It has been said that he wrote sheets of manuscript enough to stretch in straight lines across the Atlantic ocean. What he thus wrote was never known to any one but himself. It is believed that he cultivated his blind chirography in order to mark what he wrote from curious eyes. Every night during a trial he took home his notes, collated, digested, and rearranged them with reference to the final argument, of which he obtained the prophecy from the lips of the first witness.

His appeal to the jury began long before his closing address. His first attack was when he took his seat before them and looked into their eyes. He got a position as near to them as possible, and closely studied their characters. He not only observed them to find them out, but watched for the opportunity to make an impression favorable to the success of his cause. With the skill of a consummate actor, he apparently did every thing for effect on the jury, from the reading of the writ to the close of the argument. "There he sat, calm, contemplative: in the midst of occasional noise and confusion solemnly unruffled; always making some little headway either with the jury, the court, or the witness; never doing a single thing which could by possibility lose him favor, ever doing some little thing to win it; smiling sympathizingly upon the jury when any jurymen laughed or made an inquiry; wooing them all the while as a lover might woo his mistress; and seeming to preside over the whole scene with an air of easy superiority; exercising from the very first moment an undefinable sway and influence upon the minds of all before him and around him."

He brought the resources of a racy and exuberant humor to every stage of the argument. He produced mirth by his tone and manner quite as much as by his words. He was fond of quaint illustrations, and of odd and often of forced comparisons. Thus, in attempting to exclude the evidence of a certain witness, he said, "This witness's statement is no more like the truth than a pebble is like a star;" then he paused, the queerness of the comparison provoking a smile, but went on, with his peculiar intonation, "or a witch's broom-stick like a banner-stick." His manner to the opposite counsel was always conciliatory. A vulgar lawyer, mistaking his savvy for weakness, would sometimes attempt to bully him; but such a man always reckoned without his host. Mr. Choate knew how to dispose of brazen audacity in a way peculiar to himself. He would put down persons of this description very early in the case, but so mildly and neatly that they hardly knew what hurt them. They would feel that the laugh was against them, but could not tell why. In repartee Mr. Choate had no rival.

During a trial he sat in court apparently unconscious that he was the object of universal attention. He was always absorbed with his own thoughts; never with what was going on around him. When not in action he sat pensive and profound. His smile, which would sometimes suddenly light up his clouded features, was peculiar and beautiful. This was one secret of his marvelous fascination. But still it was rather intellectual than heartfelt. It was only his waving lips that expressed mirth; his dark sad eyes did not laugh. The expression of glee did not last a moment on his face—it gave a glittering flash and was gone. He always spoke with an impetuous rush of thoughts and words. His velocity was prodigious, yet preserving perfect time and composure. No reporter could keep pace with the celerity of his utterance. Even his own pen failed to follow his rapid thoughts, and would fly over the paper in a long, wavy, unintelligible line, which, after the lapse of a week, he could hardly decipher himself. It has even not unaptly been said that, if the magnetic telegraph were affixed to his lips, the words would heap upon the wires.

From the brief abstract now given of a few portions of this volume, it may justly be concluded that it is filled with interesting details concerning the great juridical orator to whose memory it is devoted.

The author is inspired by deep enthusiasm for the subject, and enjoyed ample means for gathering a rich store of illustrative incidents. His work betrays the marks of haste in its preparation, is too rambling and excursive in its method, is not free from repetition, and is often more ambitious than exact in its style. Still it is an eminently readable volume, and though ephemeral in its character, affords valuable materials for the more elaborate biography of its illustrious subject, which we trust will soon be given to the world.

Avolio: A Legend of the Island of Cos, with Poems, Lyrical, Miscellaneous, and Dramatic, by PAUL H. HAYNE. (Published by Ticknor and Fields.) The author of this volume has already won golden opinions as a poet of no little depth and tenderness of feeling, and an uncommon gift of sweet and graceful versification. His present venture is adapted to enhance his well-earned reputation. The leading poem in the volume is after a story in Leigh Hunt's "Indicator," which, with several new incidents, is wrought up into a striking and attractive form. The sonnets, which compose a large portion of its contents, are usually marked by a terse vigor of expression, and often by profound sentiment. Many of the lyrical pieces are singularly melodious, betraying a rare appreciation of musical effect as well as genuine poetic feeling.

At Home and Abroad: A Sketch-Book of Life, Scenery, and Men, by BAYARD TAYLOR. (Published by G. P. Putnam.) Mr. Taylor has here brought together a variety of incidents of travel, reminiscences of early life, and extracts from his journals, which, though of a fragmentary character, perhaps form a no less interesting volume than either of his previous productions. They bear a more personal stamp than most of his writings, although, as a general rule, his warm and transparent cordiality of expression does not permit his readers to regard him as a stranger. Among the most agreeable passages in this volume may be noted the account of the author's first journey, the description of a night walk, a lively narrative of his difficulties with foreign tongues while yet a young traveler, a picture of his German home, and a sketch of interviews with Humboldt and other German authors.

True Womanhood: A Tale, by JOHN NEAL. (Published by Ticknor and Fields.) The novel readers of the last generation must well remember the dashing, reckless, audacious tone of the flood of romances which gave such a brilliant celebrity to the name of John Neal. For many years he has lived remote from the public eye, giving to the world no fruits of his riper studies and chastened experience. His old admirers will hardly recognize their former favorite in this production of his autumnal years. It is a story of real life, founded on events of recent occurrence in the city of New York, of a highly ethical cast, including sober and devout views of life and a lofty standard of character, and written with considerable vigor, but without the boldness and extravagance which have been wont to characterize his pen. It will be read with interest, not only from its natural delineations of character, and the spirited movement of its plot, but as an indication of a change in the author's point of view, and for the contrast which it presents to the exuberant energy of his early writings.

A popular History of the United States of America, by MARY HOWITT. (Published by Harper and Brothers.) The name of this justly-admired authoress is sufficient to challenge attention to any production of her pen. In the power of ilvely and fluent narrative she is excelled by not many modern writers, and the charm of picturesque effect is often added to her graceful descriptions. The present volumes do not aim at the exhibition of any new lights in American history, but merely at a popular version of the story which has become so familiar in the pages of eminent living historians. Mrs. Howitt has wisely followed in their lead, and produced a work which, by its compact form and lucid style, is excellently adapted to general reading.

Stories of Rainbow and Lucky, by JACOB ABBOTT. (Published by Harper and Brothers.) A new series of juvenile stories by one of the most popular of American writers for young people is commenced with this neat volume. They are issued in season for the holidays, and the name of the writer alone is sufficient to secure them attention from the caterers for the family circle.—Another of Mr. Abbott's historical volumes for the people is issued by Harper and Brothers, devoted to the career of Peter the Great, and presenting a lively narrative of the "strange, eventful" biography of the great Muscovite sovereign whose name is so closely connected with the development of Russian civilization.

Life of Andrew Jackson, by JAMES PARTON. (Published by Mason Brothers.) Mr. Parton has ransacked every available source of information in order to procure authentic materials for this biography. With the zeal of an antiquary or bibliomaniac he has made an ample collection of printed authorities on the subject, bringing to light apparently every shred and patch of documentary evidence that had a bearing on his researches. From his personal visits to the neighborhood of General Jackson's birth, and to the spot where he passed the latter years of his life, he has gathered an extensive store of facts, anecdotes, and reminiscences, illustrating the military career of the distinguished hero, as well as his individual traits and habits. The work is composed in Mr. Parton's usual animated, almost impetuous style, with an evident aim at impartiality, and no suggestion to political or personal biases. His statements often differ from the received traditional accounts, but a large mass of testimony, in that case, is brought forward in their support. The defects, too, of former narratives are frequently supplied by the addition of circumstances which had been omitted by other biographers either from want of information or a desire to present their subject in the best possible light. The volume now issued gives a copious history of Jackson's boyhood and youth, his early experience in the West, the commencement of his military career, and his exploits and adventures in Indian warfare. According to Mr. Parton's diligent investigations, the birth-place of Andrew Jackson was on the borders of North and South Carolina, but within the limits of the former State, and not of the latter, as has been generally supposed. Even Jackson himself believed that he was born in South Carolina, and alludes to the fact in his famous proclamation to the nullifiers of that State. He was of Scotch-Irish parentage, a race which has given so much of its substantial bone and muscle to this country. Left an orphan at an early age, he was thrown on his own resources while yet very young, and soon learned to give hard blows in the battle of life. He received the rudiments of a common-school education and commenced the study of law before he was eighteen. After his removal to Tennessee, which took place at the age of one-and-twenty, his adventurous career may be said to have been fairly started. From the beginning, Jackson exhibited the same traits which so strongly marked his character in after life. In his case, emphatically, "the boy was father to the man." With a temperament of fiery energy; fierce, but not ferocious, in his disposition; of reckless courage; quick to take offense, and eager in his resentment; of great native shrewdness, but of little artificial culture; persistent in resolve and strenuous in action; sudden in quarrel, implacable in his enmities, but a generous and devoted friend; earnest in his convictions, which were gained less by any process of reflection than by an instinctive grasp of principles; frank, even to bluntness, in the utterance of his opinions, and ever ready to suit the action to the word; never addicted to smooth and dainty phrases, but "profuse in strange oaths;" absolute in temper, and an autocrat in authority; with an iron firmness of purpose, and an unrivaled strength of attachment; with a chivalrous deference to woman; no less affectionate and tender in the domestic circle than intrepid and commanding in his public career, Andrew Jackson fully verified the promise of his ardent boyhood and turbulent youth, combining in rare proportions the elements which made him, at the same time, the object of more enthusiastic love, more vindictive hatred, and more deeply-seated fear than any other prominent man in American history. The task of Mr. Parton, accordingly, in the composition of this work, has been one of peculiar difficulty and delicacy. His success in its accomplishment can be decided only by the verdict of the whole public. The partisans on either side will doubtless find subjects for criticism in his statements; but that he has written with a conscientious love of truth, and has produced a vigorous and picturesque narrative, does not admit of a question. The present volume reaches to the battle of New Orleans, and two more will complete the work.

Preachers and Preaching, by Rev. NICHOLAS MURRAY, D.D. (Published by Harper and Brothers.) The fruits of a long and active experience in the ministry of the Gospel are embodied in this suggestive volume. With an ardent faith in the efficacy of religious institutions as the grand conservative element of society, the author aims to "incite the entire ministry of the Church of God to higher zeal and earnestness in its great work; to make it more efficient at home and abroad; to raise it up to the place which God designed it should hold in the world's civilization, and to show to the Church its duty to the ministry." The work is written in the well-known pungent style of the author, and abounds in forcible appeals and striking illustrations.

Women of Worth, and Men who have Risen (published by W. H. Townsend and Co.), are the titles of two volumes of biographical sketches for young people, illustrative respectively of feminine excellence and manly character. They have been prepared with judgment and care, and present a succession of salutary examples to the youthful reader.

Harper and Brothers have published a new collection of stories by WILKIE COLLINS, under the title of The Queen of Hearts. They are connected together by a slight thread of melodramatic plot; and, regarded as separate productions, are of an attractive and readable character. The materials have been gathered from great diversities of experience, and are wrought up with the usual skill and power of the author. For the most part they represent the tragic side of life, and present many scenes of thrilling pathos.

YOUTH AND AGE IN AMERICA.—Wherever a clock ticks or a child prattles we may be quite sure that youth and age are, in some way, present; for each new hour has its old antecedent, and each little child has its grown-up parents. So it is that every household, in its own way, repeats the great contrasts of history, and its young and old exhibit those elements of memory and hope, experience and enthusiasm, conservatism and progress, that make up the record of our humanity. Nay, we can not look upon any familiar scene in nature without noting the same contrast. Every rippling brook pours down from some old spring; and its waters, as they moisten fresh fields, babble of old hills or mountains. Every new leaf on the tree is from an old trunk, and every merry company of youths and maidens that gambol under its branches is the fruit of an old stock, and their dress and speech and manners have been ages in preparation.

Our Young America is, therefore, not wholly young; and in spite of his frequent disposition to set up for himself, he has never been able to conceal the fact that he comes of ancient parentage, and is not wholly self-existent. Sometimes, moreover, he is caught boasting of his pedigree; and if he has any facts to go upon, he is as ready to talk of blood and coats-of-arms as proudly as any scion of the old world's régimes. Still better than this: in spite of some recent novelists, and of not a few standard skeptics, he has not been quite able to make out the heart to be wholly an obsolete organ, or to stop the beatings of that curious structure under his midriff. He is at times a most affectionate son; and in spite of his efforts to talk himself into a false manliness, that affects independence at the cost of filial reverence, he is by no means a hard-hearted or ill-mannered youth. He may sometimes think that his father can take care of himself, and needs neither his support nor his deference; but as to his good old mother, he never fails to stand by her; and countless are the American homes where the mother lives with, and virtually presides over, her children's children and their children. We were, not a great while ago, at the house of a friend whose little child—his only child—lay dead in the coffin, and there were in the house the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother. It was interesting and touching to see the deference paid to the great-grandmother, and to observe her grief for the child. In fact, she seemed to feel the blow more than all; as if she felt all the whole range of family affections in this one attachment; as when we hold several magnetic rings in contact in our hand, the lowest ring is drawn toward us by all the attraction of the intervening rings, and we feel the magnetism of all in each and of each in all.

Yet we must confess that there are some causes at work among our people that tend to disturb the just relation of the old and young, and to tempt youth into an unhappy precocity, and sometimes to keep age from its due dignity and self-respect. We are in such a hurry for immediate results, that we are often more apt to ask for the quickest way than for the best way, and to look for the fastest rather than the safest means; and therefore seek rather the service of young hot-heads than of old wiseacres. Moreover, our country is so new, and our manners and policy and arts are so unformed and constantly changing, that a bounty is set upon the most flexible muscles and faculties; and many a gray-headed man of business, who is well posted up in the old way, finds that he has quite as much to unlearn as to learn before he can master the new way, and he is perhaps outstripped and displaced by some smart lad just out of his teens.

Age, indeed, has a chronic quarrel with youth mainly from two causes. In the first place, the old man lives for the most part in his memory, and is constantly fighting over his old battles, and bent on using the old weapons—ignorant that Minié rifles have set aside the old king's arms, and rifled cannon have silenced the old field-pieces. He represents the old order of things; and this might be very well if he would be content to let the old way speak for itself without refusing to hear the new speak for itself. Precisely here is the second difficulty with age. He is not content merely with being the root from which the new growth springs, but is sometimes unwilling that there shall be any new growth at all. Where that fearful word—which is more odious in this country than that of the Old Scratch himself—"Old Foggy" originated, we can not say; but it seems to us that it must have been born out of the cold rains and freezing damps that sometimes nip our tender spring vegetations, and seem to insist that old winter shall keep its sway, and the new spring-time shall not be. If we were to give a definition of the "Old Foggy," we might designate him as a man who, not content with having stopped growing himself, insists that every body else shall stop growing too. Shakspeare, who so marvelously caught every feature of our manifold humanity, seems to have had such a character in view in some of his lines:

"These old fellows have

Their ingratitude in them hereditary:

Their blood is caked, 'tis cold, it seldom flows;

'Tis lack of kindly warmth, they are not kind:

And Nature, as it grows again toward earth,

Is fashioned for the journey, dull and heavy."

It is not strange, indeed, that old men, who have seen so many fair visions vanish in mist, are apt to throw cold water upon the sanguine hopes of youth, and bring young fancy to the hard test of grave experience; yet age has had its own young day; and has, moreover, had its own round of enjoyments and successes. Why not, then, remember its own youth in the young blood that gambols about its own sedate step, and sometimes disturbs its quiet nap in the comfortable arm-chair? Certainly any man of three-score years and ten who refuses to share in any of the bright hopes of our rising youth is false to his own personal experience, and from his own sober memory he might draw far more genial inspirations. The man now seventy years old, with average observation and activity, has been a worker for half a century of the world's most romantic and hopeful history, and he can not be wholly a croaker even if he allows no new fancies to interpret his experience. What discoveries in science and art, what progress in letters, government, and philanthropy within that half century! and our own America herself within that space of time has done enough and seen enough to fill centuries of old world and old school drowsy annals. We do not blame the old man for shaking his head at many of the false notions and fast ways of the new generation; but he can be a wise counselor without being a gloomy croaker, and can testify to the important truth that the old root must bear the young growth without denying that there can be any young growth at all.

The young man is tempted to retaliate such croaking in a tone that repeats its folly without its caution, as he rushes on in his vain self-reliance, as if wisdom were beginning now, and were not a branch of the old stock that has been rooted since time began. If we wish for a word that shall indicate youthful rashness, as "Old Foggy" indicates aged timidity, we may easily hit upon one. If the "Old Foggy" insists that every body shall stop growing because he has stopped growing himself, why not call him "Young Flighty" who insists that things shall grow of themselves without any root? There is a set of young people among us—sometimes led on, indeed, by dreamers not very young—who seem to think that, at the call of some daring theorist, the new and true order of civilization is to spring out of the ground or come down from the air in a moment, forgetful that every growth is from a pre-existent seed, and every wholesome institution must needs be—in its principles, if not in its form—the fruit of ages. Some reformers there are who would be ready to take the world home to their crotchety work-shop and put it into thorough repair, and perhaps send it home, like a pair of new boots, by Saturday night, for Sunday's wear. All those who follow an extreme individualism, and who think that civilization depends upon the abstractions of bold theorists, and not upon organic laws of growth that have their range throughout ages and races, and bind the nations together in continuity and solidarity, are constantly trying to abolish history, and inaugurate the new times over the annihilation of the old. Their signal and constant defeat is ample proof of their folly; for if there be any set of men who, in the end, play into the hands of a morose conservatism, it is they whose wild theories awake fond hopes only to disappoint them, and at last send their weary votaries into the arms of the ancient tyrannies. So it is that our Young Flighties recruit the ranks of our Old Fogies; and no men are more doleful croakers than the mad schemers whose rash and baseless hopes have brought them a harvest of bitter disappointments. So it is that extremes meet; and if a morose conservatism provokes a reckless radicalism, a reckless radicalism provokes a morose conservatism; and Young Flighty, after he has cracked his voice in shouting for the new idol of the hour, is in apt mood and tone, as soon as that idol is overthrown, for going over to the Old Fogies, and devoting his cracked organ to the service of that croaking band.

Why should there be this harsh antagonism between youth and age, and why should the two be otherwise than mutual helpers, leading on the years under the benign guidance of memory and hope, experience and enthusiasm? The parental and filial relation are mutual blessings; and age, in its judicious counsel, is rewarded by youth in its genial reverence. Youth, reverential in its hope, is sure to lead to an age cheerful in its remembrances. Both parties are gainers by the relation, and not only work out the same ends but join in the same thought and feeling, as when the morning and the evening of a well-spent day answer to each other's face and voice, and the setting sun fronts the place of its rising, and the lengthening shadows touch the gates of morning, and the vesper hymn and prayer, in their subdued gratitude and trust, answer to the matins in their sanguine strength and hope. Even so would we have the young and old regard each other, as they sit together by the fireside or meet in the marketplace or the solemn assembly. Friends and mutual benefactors they are called to be, and all the more to each other in being true to themselves by an interchange of gifts and experiences.

In many a home—and, in fact, in the nation at large—it is a grave question what shall be the practical relation between the young and the old? We have something to say upon this question; and although well aware that the fault is not wholly on one side, but that both parties are sometimes unreasonable, we will take it for granted that our young people, as being most numerous and uninformed, most need a little lecturing, and we can talk to them in all kindness and respect, yet perhaps very much like a father, and in a way perhaps to win us here and there a father's blessing. So then, Young America, take off your hat and sit down a while, if you can curb your impatient nerves, and hear what we have to say to you of your true spirit and career.

We say to you, first of all, that you are to think in a manly way, and not try to shirk upon other minds the burden of thinking for you. You are to think, indeed, upon many things, but chiefly upon what it is that makes the man. Our Old America seems to have had a pretty distinct idea of true manhood; and while we can not agree with the flaming patriots who think that we can do without the old world's literature, arts, and religion, and that we are to make every thing anew for ourselves—as strenuous for raising our own ideas as we raise our own corn and potatoes—we are somewhat strong in the opinion that America has given the world some original thought as to the substance of manhood; and no people like ours have affirmed in word and deed the superiority of man to circumstance, and the right and duty of every man to say that his soul is his own, and prove the assertion by deeds. We have not given the world any new philosophies nor religions, unless Mormonism and Spiritualism may lay claim to that prerogative; yet the old school Americans did say—on paper and in the forest, on the ocean and the field—that a man is in himself a somewhat important fact, and one too significant to be despised either by himself or his fellows. The man is the substance, the circumstance is the accident. This should be the American doctrine; and not the opposite notion, that circumstance is the substance, and man the accident. The old colonists affirmed the truth in their way when they left the refinements of Europe for the freedom of this great wilderness, and within all their stern creeds and set manners beat this great sentiment, that a true man is the great fact of the world, and he is not to be trodden upon by kings or coteries. Our young men are to affirm this in their own way, and to assert for themselves the right and the duty of a genuine manhood, amidst the new artificialities that would enervate, and the new dynasties that would subdue them. No easy task it is; for politically, financially, and even religiously, a manly thinker is threatened or tempted on every side, and urged to prefer the accident to the substance, and sacrifice the reality to the shadow. The universal hurry to win name and fortune makes the many more eager to snatch at some specious expedient than to master the solid principle; and we, probably as a people, have carried the art of social imitation and veneration as far as any people on the globe. Of too many things in our speech and manners it may be said, as is often said of the graining upon the wood-work of our houses, "You can not tell it from the original;" and good imitation is often thought as good as the real thing, and, moreover, a great deal more ingenious. In politics, we are apt to get up an enthusiasm for this or that leader, whether radical or conservative, and mistake the flippancy with which we repeat the party catch-words for the steadfastness with which we ought to stand by our principles. Our social code is quite as lax; and many a young man, who ought to have made up his mind to be a genuine man, with ideas and purposes of his own, finds himself loitering away the golden hours of youth in idle frivolity, if not in wasting dissipations that sacrifice true manhood to a false standard of gentility. It is a somewhat pressing question now, What is social quality; and what is to give our most favored young men their distinction? Too often the question is sadly answered, and not a few of our young men, capable of manly thought, seem content to be practically mere ciphers, under the lead of the brainless extravagance and flashy folly that are trying to set up a dynasty of their own in our cities; to brand industry as vulgar, independent thought as eccentricity, sterling principle as Quixotism, and to deal out social life or death from its tawdry throne with its tinsel sceptre. Against each and all of these would-be tyrants, whether backed by the silken mediocrity of the ball-room or the ribald vulgarity of the grog-shop and race-ground, a generous youth will make his protest and assert his right to stand upon his own feet, and be a man in his thought and his action. Old America meant to think like a man, and came out of the tyrannies and conventionalities of Europe, and did as he meant. If Young America means to do the same, he must show his good old father's pluck with the imported follies of Europe all around him, and in spite of the new follies of home-growth that threaten to outstrip the old aristocracies in extravagances.

Of course we can not look upon such manly thinking as implying any want of reverence, for it is always manly to honor true worth and be grateful for true service; so that he is no genuine man who refuses to pay his due tribute to age and merit, or who pertly and conceitedly ventilates his own stray notions, as if wisdom were born with him, and with him might pass away. We have little respect for the sort of youth that confounds manliness with self-conceit and self-will, especially in America, believing that our people, of all others, owe an inestimable debt to the old world and the old ages, from the fact of our nominal independence—a fact which makes our relation to the past not a mere tradition but a rational and moral duty. We have left Europe and many of its institutions out of sight, and are sometimes in danger in losing sight of the sober lessons of ancient experience. Since, however, those lessons are not forced upon us by a stern task-master, they should be studied by willing pupils; and he is the manliest young thinker who ponders most seriously and reverently the records of transmitted wisdom, and accepts most modestly the heritage of ancestral thought and labor. We have often thought that many hopeful specimens of our Young America were lacking in this manly grace; and we are glad to turn the tables upon them, and say that we ask them not to be less, but more manly, and show not only manly courtesy but manly justice to the age and the experience that give them their best heritage, and enable them to start with such high hopes in their career.

Again, we maintain that our young men are called, by the example of age, not only to manly thinking but to manly work. They are to do something worthy in their own day and generation, and not basely live upon the capital that has been earned for them. The fathers have been indefatigable workers in their day, and if the sons wish to have some adequate idea of the task before them, let them simply ask for the statistics of the last half century of our American history, and judge by what has been done of what they are to do. The figures read more like romance than history, and new cities and States have started into being as by magic, and old communities have shot up into new and marvelous proportions. The wealth that is more than rivaling the pride of old Tyre and Venice did not come by chance, but is the fruit of the hard work alike of the head and the hand. Our young men too often forget this, and insist upon spending the fruit of industry in a way that disowns industry itself; and many a young prodigal squanders like water the costly earnings of his father's sweat, and even of his father's blood. Poor boys catch the bad ambition, and have the wants, and sometimes the vices, without the possession of wealth. A style of talking and of dressing and living abounds among young men of scanty means that our thrifty fathers would have thought ruinous; and to make both ends of the year meet is a more desperate problem with many of our Young Flighties than the problem of squaring the circle.

We know very well what many of our fair-minded young men, who are too much given to idling, will say when you chide them with the great odds between their large talking and their small doings. They will say that they have no fair opportunity; that the table is full, or that the best places are all taken, and there is no chance for them—or, at least, no chance up to the level of their tastes and abilities. What did the old men say when they began to take care of themselves? Did they wait for the river to run dry before they crossed, or linger that the way might be smoothed that they might start upon their journey? Surely not. They showed their pluck in fording or swimming the stream, and cutting their way through the pathless wilderness. Suppose that they had been as chicken-hearted as some of our dainty youths are nowadays. Would they not have found insurmountable obstacles every where? It is said that the country is too full now for fair competition. Was it not always too full for the faint-hearted? Did not the stern Pilgrims of Plymouth, and the stout Dutch of Manhattan, and the brave Cavaliers of the Old Dominion find plenty of occupants to dispute the way with them, and plenty of pathless forests, howling beasts, and murderous savages? Yet they did not turn back; but turning difficulties into inspirations they set a firm foot upon the land, and this magnificent empire of freedom and industry has been their reward. So Old America did his work; why should not Young America do likewise? It may not be easy, indeed, to find employment for every school-boy that shall allow him kid gloves, broadcloth, and Champagne to his heart's content; but let him take hold of some honest work without gloves, drink cold water, and if need be, wear his father's old clothes, duly fitted to his slighter limbs—as many of our bravest youth of the old time have done—and there will be a place for him, and, in due time, a good place too. If he has the true grit, and means to earn a dollar before he spends it, and would sooner go some time on bread and water than beg roast-beef and plum-pudding, there need be little anxiety about his fortunes. The very pressure of competition, that seemed to close the way of success against him, will in due time open it; and he will find that the very men who were looked upon as his enemies will be his friends, and they who are masters of the high places of enterprise will be the first to appreciate and encourage him. In short, the better sort of young men have no truer friends than the better sort of old men; so that often the two ages combine in friendly partnership, and many of our most thriving houses mingle old blood and young blood in their interchange of experience and enterprise. There is something, in fact, in our old-fashioned American mind that makes light of difficulty, and laughs at youth for being cast down by a few rebuffs. When a child falls down upon the floor, and gets a black eye or a bloody nose, instead of magnifying the pain and grief by excessive pity, the good mother was wont to say, "Get up, and take another;" and soon the little tumbler was all smiles again. Our young people may well carry this lesson into life; and instead of being thrown off their path by an occasional stumble, they should hear that stern but not unkind mother, Experience, saying to them, "Get up, my boy, and take another." Our Yankee humor is full of this hopeful spirit, and our literature and art breathe very little of the sad tone of the old nations that felt the weakness of the individual under the foot of the great despotisms, and celebrated in their noblest poets and dramatists the subjection of man to fate. The masterly group of the Laocoon is not in the Yankee vein; and if one of our sculptors had attempted such a subject, he would not please our people half so well by representing the old man as yielding to the serpents in that desperate struggle, as by turning the victory the other way, and showing the old man's purpose to cut off the heads of the reptiles or strangle them, by beating them thus at their own game, and in some way letting it be known that the whole snake family had better let him and his boys alone the next time.

Sometimes, indeed, our people may carry their self-reliance too far, and bear the filibuster spirit not only into border wars but into home strifes and competitions. This spirit, however, is not the genuine manhood, for manly force has always a loyal, reverential element in its composition, and is never content to set up its own will as the absolute law. If we have a set of young smooths, who are spying out some way of shirking responsibility and living in easy indolence, we have also a set of young roughs, who are on the watch for adventure, and perhaps waste upon assaults on hen-roosts and orchards, tutors and watchmen, the energies that they would gladly give to the sea or the camp. Too often these rough-and-ready urchins join the idle race of smooths in their own way, and end, in some forms of shameful idleness or dissipation, the career that began in reckless self-will. Manly work is the only safeguard for both classes of character. Their spheres may differ, and the one may be fitted for a quieter and the other for a bolder career. Yet they must both go to work and do something; for the do-nothing is sure in the end to be the nobody, and manly work is the only security of manly dignity.

We say, last of all, that our youth shows due respect to age by manly association, or being true to that public spirit which transmits the best life of the past to the future. Why need to multiply proofs of the truth that no man is to live for himself alone, when every act or privilege of our lives brings us into numberless associations with our fellow-men; and every loaf of bread that we eat, and every book that we open, implies the thought and the labor of all past ages and all present arts and sciences? We Americans owe more than any other people to a conscious and vital public spirit—a spirit that speaks in living souls, instead of being transmitted merely by hereditary institutions. Our America is what it is by the union of free men into a nation under the pressure of foreign enemies, and by the confederation of neighboring colonies. Our liberty and law are our public spirit, organized to a certain extent; and what folly to regard the organization as now complete, or as ending with our political compact, or even with any amendments of our political compact? Nay, the excellence of our political system is that it leaves our people, to so large an extent, free to carry out their own tastes and enterprises; so that in times of peace far more has been done to make us a nation by voluntary association than by legal enactment or political co-operation. Our art, science, literature, sociality, and religion have thriven without legislative interference; and who shall set bounds to our progress if the new generation follows, with its enlarged culture and means, worthily in the footsteps of the old? The soil we find already to our hand, and any young man who has strength to hold the plow will not lack land to subdue. A noble mastery of the soil is one of the conquests that belongs to the new generation; and not only in the new Territories but in the old States the first principles of judicious agriculture need to be applied. We have been spending too much of our landed capital; and exhausting its fertility without replenishing it, we have wasted our substance while we thought ourselves making our fortune. The new generation, moreover, is to do its part to beautify the land which the old generation could do little more than till for daily bread. If much of the rough work that was once done by hand may now be done by mechanism, all the more leisure and strength may be reserved for the exercise of refining tastes, and every village may have the bloom of a little Paradise, if the young people will plant trees instead of the old groves that have been so ruthlessly felled, and will also save the young forests from destruction. We believe that there is a peculiar delicacy of organization in our people that makes them quite susceptible to the element of beauty, and that in time we are to be noted for our love of the beautiful arts. The nurture of this taste does not imply any decline of robust energy, but quite the contrary. Old Greece is proof that bodily exercise in the open air rather sharpens than blunts the higher sense, and that the free range of the field and forest trains the eye and fancy to appreciate the loveliness of Art as well as Nature. We are pleased at the not infrequent union of stout manhood with fine taste among our young men, and are glad to know of many who bring up from a hunt on the Western prairies or the Adirondack mountains a keener eye and a higher enthusiasm for every form of beauty that can adorn the earth, and bring man to a truer idea of his own gifts. We rejoice in the manly sports that brace the limbs to their due grace and strength, and can not but look upon our host of young cricketers, oarsmen, journeymen on foot and on horseback, as, by their hardihood, worthier scions of the stout old stock.

American Society needs the renovating breath of the new generation quite as much as the American soil. It is hard to say what should be done to abate our crying social evils; yet it is plain that something should be achieved to rescue society from the tyranny of false fashions, and belittling, if not ruinous extravagances. It would be most cheering if we could note, among our young, some steadfast disposition to base respectability more upon character and less upon circumstance, and establish a true idea of quality of living as distinguished from quantity of fortune. We are a tawdry, superficial people in our social habits; and the young man who can dare, in the face of general ostentation, to marry a girl of congenial culture, and live in any thing like the old-fashioned simplicity, must have a bravery beyond that which drove the British again and again from Bunker Hill, or brought Cornwallis and Burgoyne to lay down their arms. We can only throw out a passing hint of a crying social want, and express our earnest hope that, before this century closes, we shall see the rise of a true order of republican society; and that our new education, taste, and humanity will devise some way of securing to a modest family a fair share of comfort, refinement, and social position, without the sacrifice of good sense, frugality, and self-respect.

In politics there are many things to be attempted worthy of the best powers and hopes of the new generation; and we can not but believe that some method will be adopted which will more effectually save us from being the tools of parties, and secure to the mind and heart of the nation the rule. In sixteen years a great hour is to strike on our dial, and in 1876 the nation celebrates the centennial of its independence—in fact, the centennial of its birth. If our young men are true to themselves, they will be able to honor the signers of the Declaration of Independence better than by empty words; and there will be young Washingtons, Franklins, Adamses, and Jeffersons to mark their names upon the annals of the nation and the manners and customs of the time. We believe that great things have been done, and ought still to be done, by our blood and on our soil; and are, in a certain sense, quite decidedly of the Manifest Destiny school. We believe, however, that our best destiny comes to us in the old-fashioned way of sober industry and reverential good sense; not from any new Red Republicanism that aims to set up the rule of sensualism, nor in any black priestcraft, that would burn the old Bibles and forbid us saying our own prayers. Our Manifest Destiny man is not a filibuster nor an anarchist, but a far-seeing, firm-minded, large-hearted thinker and worker, carrying intelligence, law, liberty, and religion wherever he goes. The backwoodsman's peaceful axe is the reveille of his advancing armies; the sound of the church-going bell is his cannonade; the school-house is his fortification; the deepest dye upon his fields is the bloom of sweet-scented flowers; the plowman's whistle leads his charge; the fleets of fruitful commerce are his invincible navy; and our troops of rushing locomotives are his flying artillery. Not only America but mankind at large must share in such triumph; and as youth is true to the best lessons of age, it will be some day not only building up its own future, but adding imperishable stones to the great temple of God and Humanity.

Editor's Easy Chair.

IT would be pleasant music to hear the sound of all the voices that wish a Happy New Year! It makes us feel the force of habit and resolution to know that at this season so many are cheerful, as if it were a matter of course. And so it is. For although the New Year reminds us that another year is gone, and the snow begins to fall, perhaps, among our lusty brown and black locks, yet it is a time of birth also, of infancy and childhood, and consequent love and hope and fond expectation.

And yet as every body is so evidently gay when the New Year comes, as if they were all young parents to whom a "blessed baby" was just born, they might remember that every day they assist at a similar event. Every day is born as well as the year; and as with children, so with the days, for

"Trailing clouds of glory do they come From heaven, which is our home."

The lesson of the day and of the season, then, is Cheerfulness; and the question is, Why are we not always as cheerful? and the improvement is, that we will be.

You, good friend, for instance, whose eye runs along these lines, you come down on New-Year's morning and greet the children so kindly, so brightly, so sympathetically, that they think the presents are only a more palpable expression of your good-humor. Your whole manner shows that somehow the day is different from other days. Your face and conduct have on their Sunday clothes; and without knowing why or how, you are happier in the children's enjoyment, and they in your gentleness.

Why not always so? Why should not the same sun that rises daily in the sky rise also in our manner and feeling? If a man would know what it is to be happy, let him feel that children love him—that they come to him easily and simply and instinctively. He will be like the old magician of the fable who talked with the flowers, and the trees nodded to him, and the winds whispered secrets. The whole world of faith, of unchilled hope, of pure imagination, which lies around us all in the heart of childhood, will become subject to his sway. For the mere satisfaction and enjoyment a man had much better get one per cent. less for his money in railroad or coal investments, and one per cent. more for his investment in the sympathy of children. A man who has no pleasure in music, but who sees the intense and profound delight which music confers upon those who are sensitive to it, may well long to have an ear for it, although he knows it is impossible. But here is an ear for the subtlest and sweetest music which he can cultivate. For by really wanting to love children a man may make them love him.

They are great pests, and bores, and dreadfully noisy, you think? But are they half so stupid and soul-destroying as the great, lazy, lounging, gossiping, swearing, dull people who pass themselves off for men? Are they nearly such intolerable bores as the swarms of people who talk to you of things in which they have no interest, nor you either? At a venture, what mother who loves her children (for there are some who do not love, but merely make the best of them) would not prefer to pass a morning in her nursery to making a round of morning calls upon people whose conversation and conduct might lead a sad observer to believe that a city was an asylum for people of merely embryo minds, dwelling in extremely expensive cells?

A child tells you what he thinks, what he feels, and tempts you to treat him with the same tender frankness. But what noble thought, if it conflict with general opinion—what bold word for generous men who are taboo by society, is tolerated for a moment in drawing-rooms where children are accounted pests and bores? As for noise, did you ever hear Miss — sing? The people who have sneered at her singing to you before she comes, always insist that they must hear that delightful something, and down sits Miss — and begins. You think children are noisy? Yes, but at least we can say Hush! to them. It is not good manners to say so to Miss —.

One thing at least is very clear—that there are very few of us who ought to be allowed to have to do with horses or children. People jerk, and twitch, and use up, and kick, and beat their horses, just as they snarl, and scold, and swear, and snub, and cuff, and whip their children. The result is, that the horse is dogged and restive, ill-trained and unsafe; the children are shocked, pained, embittered, and spoiled. A horse is as delicate as a child or a plant. He wants thought, and skill, and care, and firmness, and he will reward the pains you bestow upon him as surely as a vegetable. Cultivate a pear-tree sensibly and intelligently, and it will bring you sound, sweet, juicy, aromatic fruit. Cherish a horse in the same way, and he will bear docility, readiness, kindness, quietness, and intelligence, like flowers.

How much more so is it with children! A child is a tropical soil. The seed you drop germinate and bring forth a thousand-fold, and in an unending succession of crops. Plant brambles, and thorns will come up and scratch you. Sow stones, and no green thing will grow. Treat a boy like a brute, and you will have a brutal man. Of course, not always; for there are fine natures that are not to be spoiled—which you can bend but never break.

For that true cultivation, that improved farming of character, the sub-soil plow is patience, and the roller is cheerfulness. With these you may be sure of your crop, and the spirit of the New-Year's morning includes them all. And if a parent should say this morning to his child, "I have put no sugar-plums into your stocking, but I am going to put affectionate confidence and forbearance into every day of our intercourse this year," the child might well spare the candy, and say, joyfully, "Well, well; this is a happy New Year!"

VIATOR is a gentleman who is much troubled upon his travels by the ill-breeding, as he calls it, of his beloved fellow-countrymen; and he wants to know if there is any good reason why money should lose its value the moment he enters a railway station to take his passage.

For instance, says Viator, when I reach a town I consider to what hotel I will go, how much I am willing to pay, and what I wish to find in the hotel. If I want to be in a noisy, riotous, dram-drinking house, I go to it, pay my money, and get its value, and also the noise and riot which I wanted, and which I call good company. So if I prefer dirt, sloppy service, unclean beds, and beef-steaks fried in some kind of sauce-pan, I know where they are to be had, and I go and get them, and nobody is troubled. If, again, I wish comfortable and luxurious rooms, a quiet house, and a carriage at my disposal, I know where I can have them too, by paying, and it is nobody's business.

In all these cases my money pays for what I want. There is no law, no custom, no person, that insists upon my going to the bad house if I prefer the good one, nor to the bad one if I do not choose to pay for the good. My tastes are respected, and so long as I wrong no one every body holds his tongue, knowing that he would do just so, if he chose to, or were able.

Now, why should this right of individual choice cease the moment I come to a railway car? If my money, says Viator, buys me comfort and quiet at the hotel, why should it not buy the same blessings in the car?

The other night, he says, I was going from New York to Albany upon the well-conducted Hudson River road. Every seat was full and the stoves were in full blast. Presently that overpowering odor of toasted trowers, sizzled apple-parings, mingled breaths of closely-packed human beings, and the deteriorated, partly fetid air, possessed the entire car. After enduring the agony until it became intolerable, I opened a window and gave my lungs fair play. Scarcely a minute passed before the neighbors began to shrug their shoulders, pull up their coat-collars, and look furious. I knew what was coming, but determined to hold on until it did come. I breathed away at the fresh air as fast as I could, inhaling the electric cordial, as if I had been dying of thirst and now touched water. The cool refreshing air breathed into the noisome car, and as it touched some of the passengers farthest from the window, reminding them that there was such a thing as clear, sweet, invigorating oxygen, they looked round at the window as if they had been personally insulted: as if they had said in their hearts, "What the d—— do I want with fresh air?"

At length, of course, it came.

"Had you just as lieve shut that window, Sir, here is a lady who—"

I yielded to the final American argument. Down went the window, and on came again the fumes of Tartarus and the odor of Gehenna, until I waxed furious in my capacity as man and as American citizen, and, dear Easy Chair, I came very near saying to myself, "Why the d—— sha'n't I have fresh air?"

And why shouldn't I?

The price of passage to Albany from New York, with the necessity of breathing a foul and poisonous atmosphere, is three dollars. Very well; I, Mr. Easy Chair, will cheerfully pay half a dollar more for the sake of having sweet air to breathe during the six hours of the journey. And there are plenty of people who would do precisely the same thing. Now the question is, why should not the Railway Company sell us that fresh air?

Or take another view.

After breathing this stifling atmosphere for several hours we reached Hudson. There a company of passengers stepped into the cars, who sat wherever they could find places, talking loudly and laughing noisily; hailing each other from end to end of the car; shouting silly remarks that were intended to be funny, and laughing, without the least merriment, at their own want of wit. They did not seem to be drunk—they were only vulgar and foolish and rowdy, and by their loud noise completely took possession of the car.

Now people have a perfect right to be silly, and to sing and to whistle and make dull jokes as long and as often as they choose. But why should I be obliged to listen to them, and to be annoyed by them? If the company provide a car for innocent and quiet smokers, why do they not for howling boys of whatever age? And since that is a difficult thing to do directly, why does it not occur to them to secure the same result indirectly, by having cars in which for a certain sum—higher if you choose than the ordinary fare—passengers can be secure of quiet, decency, and fresh air?

In fact, dear Easy Chair, with progressive civilization, I have no doubt that we shall come to have cars that may be engaged for parties traveling together, as we can hire carriages or seats at the theatre; a time when a company of friends traveling through from New York to Niagara or the White Mountains may secure their separate conveyance all the way. One great reason which deters people from pleasure-travel in this country is that the travel is not pleasure at all. The traveler is at the mercy of every body who chooses to be disagreeable, provided he has but paid his money. And I for my part heartily agree with my friend Timotheus, who declares that when the American goes to travel he abdicates all his rights and manliness.

"See it in omnibuses," says Timotheus. "How often have I been sitting in an omnibus packed too full with twelve people, and some insulting thirteenth man jumps upon the step and makes his way in. He knows perfectly well that he has no right there, that he is deliberately swindling the other passengers out of the accommodation for which they have paid their money. He is not in the least disturbed, and the whole set of twelve dastardly cravens are too faint-hearted to stand up for their rights and push him out, lest somebody should say it isn't democratic. Don't talk to me of liberty or independence," says Timotheus; "I never knew so timid and cowering a people in the world as my countrymen."

Perhaps Timotheus's acquaintance with the world is not very large; but there is certainly some reason in what he says: and Viator is not altogether in the wrong, but very much in the right. There is no talk so idle as that which confounds ruffianism, and rowdiness, and filth, and indecency, and outrage upon good manners, good taste, and good sense with democracy. A drunkard is no more a democrat than a pig is. A loud, wrangling, sneering loafer, in bad hat and dirty boots and ragged coat, is no more a democrat for those reasons than any other scarecrow. There is many a quiet, decent, well-dressed man, whom this fellow would insult out of the bar-room window as a stuck-up aristocrat, who has more genuine democracy, more respect for the opinion of the great mass of men and more reliance upon their judgment, and a thousand-fold profounder respect for their equal rights—which is the substance of democracy—than the loafer ever dreamed of; more genuine democracy in the last joint of his little finger than the swaggerer in all his bones and body together. A b'hoi is not a democrat; there is no more tyrannical despot in the world; no man who more insolently imposes himself and his prejudices upon decent and disgusted people. And the spirit of the b'hoi is not democracy. If Mose be the model and ideal American, who would not want to renounce his native land at once?

So Viator is not to be reproached as an aristocrat because he prefers decency and good manners and taste to their opposites. The "Young America" of the future is neither to be sought in the Bowery nor in Broadway; but if you find any where a man who respects himself enough to respect others—who believes in himself enough to believe in others—who has so profound a faith in the democratic principle as to believe that all the material results achieved by the despotic principle shall be surpassed by the grand doctrine upon which our system rests—take him by the hand, for you have found a representative American; you have found a democrat of the deepest dye.

Therefore, unless the railway directors think that it is not "according to the spirit of our institutions" that they should drive in their own carriages, or live in pleasant, handsome houses, while some of their neighbors go on foot, and live more poorly, there really seems to be no reason why they should not consult the general convenience in the matter of more suitable accommodations in the cars. If it is not aristocratic for a man to prefer his own room in a hotel, and his books and friends, to a miscellaneous crowd in the bar-room, it is no more so for him to buy air and quiet upon his journey.

And don't say that a car is better than a stage-coach. When you have a toothache, is it any consolation to know that you might have two teeth ache? When you have broken your little finger, do you understand the comfort which assures you that it is better than breaking your neck? Of course it is; but what then? The point is to be in health—to be whole. Every man is entitled to that. Of course I had rather break one leg than break two, says Viator; but why should I break any? Of course there is, upon the whole, less discomfort in a car than in a coach; but why have any discomfort which can be avoided? There may be a certain amount of trouble attendant upon all travel. Shall we therefore not try to be comfortable? If we can't be easy, may we not be as easy as we can?

Who that has traveled in Germany does not recall with delight those charming coups of the railway cars, in which, with some friends, or with wife and child, the traveler speeds along, looking every where, seeing every thing, and as separate as in his own house? To be sure there is a laugh upon the coups. "Fools, princes, and Americans ride first-class" is a saying in Germany. Very well. Fools (see Shakespeare and history in general) have always been notorious as the wisest men; and princes know what comfort is, if they know nothing else. Thence the American may be inferred.

Let those laugh that win. The traveler cosily sitting out of the way of his neighbor's odors—out of the vile air—out of the smell of greasy cloth, peanuts, and apples—with room for his legs and arms, and lungs and brain—with a cheerful pair of friends, and the seclusion of his own house, is not so very sadly to be pitied, even if he has to pay more. Why, would you grudge paying an extra sixpence for clean sheets at the next tavern you stop at? That is the whole question.

ONE ceremony in honor of the late Senator Brodriek was somewhat clouded by the sharp weather and the protest of many well-known citizens against its occurrence upon Sunday. And certainly it would seem that the objects of the occasion—great publicity and importance—might have been more surely secured by selecting another day.

The spirit of our society is unquestionably opposed to such pageants upon Sunday. The public ceremonies commemorative of dead Presidents have always taken place upon some other day.

And the Easy Chair confesses sharing the feeling of Bernard Barton in a letter to Charles Lamb, mentioning that the Government had appointed a Thanksgiving, for some state purpose, upon Sunday. It is too bad, says the Quaker poet, to put two feasts into one; especially for those of us who are poor clerks, and who are expected to have had our Thanksgiving and our Sunday.

So with the grand commemorative services which make virtual holidays. It is not fair to confound them with others. Many a poor clerk, for instance, who prefers to go to church on Sundays to going any where else, would be very glad to see an imposing spectacle; and on any other day he could do it.

The orator was vehement, and doubtless effective. A passionate eulogy rarely fails of its impression. Lately we have seen Mr. Choate's eulogy upon Mr. Webster, at Dartmouth College, called one of the grandest orations that ever passed human lips. Read it, and see if you agree.

There are certain facts about men as notorious as their personal appearance, their gifts, and their graces. They modify and make the impression of the man. But they never get into the eulogies. Mr. Everett, in his eulogy upon Mr. Webster, says: "You ask me if he had faults? I answer, he was a man." Now, if the orator had been eulogizing Washington, what could he have said more? And what kind of idea does such a eulogy transmit to the posterity who do not know the man? All the expressive shades, the varieties that compose the individuality of great men, are omitted by their eulogists; and they turn upon them a glare of light in which we can see nothing.

In the discourse upon Senator Broderick the orator spoke of the manner of his death, and, while deprecating dueling, justified Mr. Broderick's duel. Undoubtedly his case was no more than many others; but the orator's plea, drawn from the fact that great Englishmen have fought political duels, would have been greatly strengthened if he had mentioned the death of Hamilton. Yet he forgot that it was the very quality in the Englishmen which led them to the duel that also depresses them in public esteem.

So in the tragedy of Hamilton—if ever a man felt himself urged, necessitated, justified to fight, it was Alexander Hamilton, the right hand of Washington. But who does not wish he had not fought?

In like manner, the orator said, with eloquent conviction, that the Senator would have lost his political influence in California unless he had fought. Was it, then, worth maintaining at such a price? If dueling be monstrous, inhuman, unjust, the duel must be too high a price to pay for any influence. For suppose, fighting to preserve his influence, as Hamilton thought he was, he had killed Burr. (He meant to throw away his fire, we know; but we are considering the duel as a duel.) Would his influence have been restored? Would not his whole career have been tarnished? Since he went out to fight, who is not glad that he did not kill, but was killed?

Put the same test to Senator Broderick. His eulogist, Senator Wilson in his letter, and many and many a witness, testify to the intrinsic worth of the man. Suppose he had shot Judge Terry, can any sane man believe that his political influence would have been increased? Every political, would have become instantly a personal, enemy.

Does any body suppose that Jackson was really helped by his Dickinson duel? That, and the Benton fray, may have given him greater consideration among pot-house bullies and peppery frontiersmen; but what is their accession compared with the loss of the confidence of thoughtful, law-obeying, God-fearing citizens? So with Clay—it is notorious how deeply he was politically injured by the duels he had fought. Remember, too, how indignant American readers were with Thackeray for insinuating in the "Virginians" that Washington would have fought a duel. Remember, too, the information of a letter from Edmund Mason, given to the Lounger of Harper's Weekly by Mr. Lossing, in which it was stated distinctly that Washington was always opposed to dueling; yet he was a military man, born more than a century ago. Does any body suppose his reputation would be enhanced any where, and in any way, if it could be proved that he would have fought a duel under whatever provocation?

Here is young Tinderbox at the club. Feather-brains gets drunk and empties a glass of wine into his friend's face, calling him a poltroon; or he does it without getting drunk. "I have no wish to slay a human being," says Tinderbox, as he summons his friend, Gunpowder; "none at all; but my honor requires that Featherbrains meet me in the field."

How does his honor require it? Is he proved to be a poltroon because Featherbrains says so, or because he empties wine into his face?

Clearly not.

Will his friends consider him to be so if he does not have blood for wine?

But if they will, are they people whose opinion is of any importance?

Will the world at large think him so?

Not at all. Only the poltroons will think so.

For take our Governor Morgan, take the Honorable Mr. Dickinson, or any perfectly well-known, substantial citizen; and suppose somebody to give them the lie. Do you mean to say that their fellow-citizens would really think their honor was touched if they did not fight a duel about it? A man must have a very ludicrous idea of a gentleman's honor who supposes it to be at the mercy of every drunken, or angry, or foolish fellow in the street, or the club, or the parlor.

And the theory that the dueling system represses gossip and defamation, wherever it prevails, by making every man feel that he is personally accountable for his words, is entirely disproved by the fact that it prevails most in border countries and among the most ignorant people. It merely leads to the carrying of deadly weapons by every man, and to the indulgence of the most unbridled passions. A frontier society is a chronic duel, which may break out at any moment between any two men. And, necessarily, wherever the preservation of social order is committed not to the individual conscience and good sense, and to the laws, but to private revenge, there society is perpetually lost in anarchy.

It is, therefore, always the wiser course, although often so much the most difficult, to tell the truth about the dead. We are all men. We are all fallible. If a man is great enough to be eulogized, then we know all about him; we know what he was, and what he did. If he were fair in the face, why speak of his grand black brow? If he were five feet high, why speak of his towering proportions? If his voice was rough, why praise his dulcet accents? If he were fond of drinking, why celebrate his sobriety? If he were dishonest, why call him a model of integrity?

Every eulogist ought to remember that he is speaking of one whom his hearers knew—whom, indeed, they loved and honored; but honored and loved in spite of his faults, not because they supposed him to be perfect. So with the young California Senator, whose course seems to have been upon the whole manly, and who was at least struggling to be an honest man. He had heroic qualities—he had the secret magnetism that attaches enthusiastic friends. His loss is deeply to be deplored; but still his campaign speeches are not to be commended, nor because he fought a duel—thinking that he was justified—is his duel more commendable than others.

WE were speaking, a column or two back, of railroad conveniences, and so forth (the Easy Chair said railway, because it thinks it is a more euphonious word than railroad); and there is something to be said about those hotels to which incidental reference was made.

Popularly, and in the mind of many an aspiring landlord, a hotel is a machine into which you put hundreds of all kinds of people, feed them, sleep them, wine them, and smoke them, and the net result to the man at the crank is a fortune in five years. It is the prettiest kind of vision that enchants and allures the Yankee imagination. It has come to be seen, however, that the fruit can not be picked by fingers that are all thumbs; and the perception has been coined into one of those impudent proverbs that show, like certain kinds of weeds and vigorous wild plants, the quality of the soil from which they spring: "Yes, he's a smart chap; but he can't keep a hotel."

Now as this Magazine sometimes falls under the eyes of those who keep hotels, and a great many who stop in them, let us have a word together.

There is no country more prolific in exquisite places than this. That's fair and far enough off, to start with. There is no country in which the people are fonder of travel. But they all go in certain directions. The deepest rut upon the continent is that on the road from New York to Niagara, and Saratoga and Newport. Many people travel elsewhere, but swarms to those places. Now any man is quite right who says that it is fashion which takes them there. So it does. But there is one other reason why they so run along well-beaten roads, and that is hotels—inns—taverns—whatever name pleases you most, to describe the public house.

There are plenty of places to which plenty of people would go, could they only be sure of finding a decent house to stop at—yes, could they only be sure of not finding an indecent one. It is not that they have particular prejudices against that especial place, but the general rule is so terrible. Out of the large towns, and with some exceptions, what kind of places are country taverns? Answer, ye dingy walls, dirty floors, ragged carpets, slopping maids, feather-beds, sheets—oh, sheets?—steaks fried in some kind of pan—coffee, of Day and Martin's best—bread, hot and heavy as a bar in the rolling-mill—every thing, cooked and uncooked, as bad as can be—utterly spoiled by the touch of civilization, which only goes far enough to make the sufferer sigh for pure savagery.

What human being, not expressly doing penance—or lecturing—would ever stop in a genuine country tavern, in his dear and native land, if he could help it? What man who has traveled in lands where clean, sweet beds, and simple, hearty fare are as universal as the homely, substantial neatness of the whole inn, does not feel that the young eagle of the Rocky Mountains has a good many feathers yet to start in her gorgeous plumage before she will dominate the empyrean?

In one of the chief cities of Western New York there is not a good inn—not a place which, in some of its most necessary departments, is not as repulsive and intolerable as a second-rate Italian town. And we all submit. We are like Timotheus's twelve men in the omnibus, and suffer ourselves to be imposed upon.

But how can the host stand it? How can he take the money of deluded and desperate, but imbecile, travelers without blushing? No wonder a clerk receipts the bills: a good clerk who, when he remits the amount to the traveling correspondent of the bi-weekly Tin Trumpet, is called by that correspondent "the obliging and gentlemanly clerk" in the very next letter.

There is no spectacle more ridiculous than the swelling landlord of a poor hotel. His patronizing, superior air is such a melancholy sham. You know it doesn't mean cleanness, and trimness, and thrift, as it ought to and seems to. You know it is all a delusion and a deceit. "Come, my children," it seems to say, "your room is ready, and you will forget that you have left your homes."

Do we?

Know ye the land where no poet would have ever invented the line—"Shall I not take mine ease in mine inn?" That land is not far away, perhaps.

Now why not change it all? Why not have good inns—not appendages to groggeries, as most of them are? Did you ever cut across from Canandaigua, say six years ago, to Palmyra? Do you remember a place in a town on the way where was the village inn? Image of rural repose, of picturesqueness and seclusion, hail! Did you ever see before, in any one place, so many and such bleary-eyed drunkards? Poor besotted wrecks, the remains of human beings in the remains of human clothing! It was the most piteous spectacle of degradation ever seen—a great deal worse, for instance, than Nena Sahib's brutalities. The country inn (image as aforesaid, etc.) was merely a manufactory of idiots and criminals; it was the great central fountain whence little private rills of utter woe and sorrow trickled into the secretest places of the homes of the village. There were rooms over it, in which you would have staid—you and the cherished Mrs. Tidwiddy—upon your romantic little trip through the lovely, secluded parts of our country.

That is the unadorned truth of most of the country taverns. It is not the stopping traveler that they look out for and prepare for. It is the teamster who passes and reins in for a glass; it is the workman of the village; the passing traveler, who stops to bait himself and horses. You, if you stop—yes, even you, Tidwiddy—are only a light extra.

How many a wise man sleeps in the cars rather than encounter the chances of a tavern if he stops! "I have been there," he says, with melancholy meaning, to the tyro who yearns for bed. Bed! Thou dear youth!

At very little expense windows could be tightened, floors washed, bed linen duly ditto, attendance could be prompt, food nourishing and well-cooked and served; all the little details which make up comfort could be had at much less expense than the luxuries which are now furnished, and which nobody wants; or, if they are wanted, let us have the hairs on one plate and the butter on another, and mix to our liking.

The sum is, that it is a shame, in our free and enlightened, et cetera, that the quiet country traveler must have no comfort of journeying off the great routes, unless he go straight to the Adirondack and camp out. It's very well to go and play Indian a little, as Louis XVI. and his court used to go and play peasant. But he wasn't a peasant; and we can't be Indians more than four or eight weeks in the year. What shall we do for the rest of the time in which we must travel?

N. B.—The Easy Chair hopes it will be understood that none of these remarks apply to the capital houses which he might name—none of them. And he is quite sure that his friends the landlords know enough to throw the sermon into the next pew. It is not here that the fever and ague is known; but Neighbor Tugger, the other side of the fence, he does have it awful!

THE Lyceum, which certain lugubrious people and papers inform us regularly every year is upon its last legs, was never more vigorous and promising than it is this year. Certain worthy gentlemen, who declare that they do not wish to see their names placarded by the side of clowns and negro minstrels, have been relieved of that sad necessity by the Lecture Associations, which have failed to ask them. Certain clergymen have thought it necessary to declare war against the Lyceum, but totally, as it seems to us, without just reason. No honest man in the pulpit really needs to fear any honest man out of it. And it can not be truly said that any thing is uttered in the Lyceum which tends to bring the Creator, Christianity, or the Bible into disrespect; and it is not uttered because of two reasons: first, the chief lecturers are men of too much real earnestness of religious feeling; and, second, the audiences would not tolerate it.

That things are often said which tend to discriminate between what is ecclesiastical and what is religious is true enough; and it would be a great service to society if the pulpit would do the same thing. There is perpetual danger, as the history of the Romish Church shows, of confounding the form with the substance; and every clergyman and every lecturer who puts us upon our guard against that confusion is a public benefactor.

There seems to be no reason to apprehend a quick decline of the lecture system. The men will change, but the institution will last. The present speakers will gradually be supplanted. The platform will be weeded of men who do not speak to the popular mind and heart; but it will remain one great arena of free and honest thought and discussion, constantly extending its frontiers, moral and intellectual, stimulant and cordial, and an institution characteristic of the genius and responsive to the wants of an active, busy, enlightened people.

"I THINK you have been a little too easy in the geography of the article 'Daniel Boone' in your October issue. I always like to read my Harper with a 'Colton' before me; and a short time since—rather late, I'll confess, to be reading the October Number—I read, on page 573, 'He was born near Bristol, on the banks of the Delaware, in Berks County, Pennsylvania,' etc. My 'Colton' puts Bristol in the south part of Bucks County. Which is right? Again: 'When Daniel was three years of age his father settled at Reading, in Bucks County,' etc. The same authority places Reading in Berks County. Now, I do not know, of course, but that the State in those pre-Revolutionary days was so cut up as to make the said text correct; but still I can not now see how it can be twisted so as to be just right. Perhaps the dear old Easy Chair can and will explain, and make me

"Truly,

O. K."

It is Mr. Lossing, the author of the article in question, who is best able to answer what he calls the "good-natured criticism of 'O. K.,'" and he says: "Of course, twice it should read Bucks, and only once, in connection with Reading, should it be Berks. Boone was born in Bucks—Reading is in Berks. A printer might easily make the mistake, unless the two names were written much plainer than authors who have much to write are apt to."

"Iowa" wishes the Easy Chair to inform him how the "Cosmopolitan Art Association can give each of its subscribers a copy of Faed's admirable picture, 'Shakespeare and his Friends,' its own 'Quarterly Art Journal,' and a 'Season Ticket to the Dusseldorf Gallery,' besides a chance for a valuable work of art, all for three dollars. I have seen the engraving," continues our correspondent, "and am sure that a New York printseller would charge me ten dollars for it. Now, to say nothing of the other inducements, all of which cost money, how can the 'Cosmopolitan' sell me a ten-dollar print for three? or does the printseller demand an exorbitant price for fine engravings?"

The Easy Chair will endeavor to show his correspondent, that while the printseller does not charge too much, the "Cosmopolitan" can do all that it promises.

Thus: The engraver will receive for the plate of "Shakespeare and his Friends" some $5000. If 1000 copies—a fair edition—are sold, each costs five dollars, besides paper and printing—say half a dollar more. But if this $5000 be divided among 30,000 or 40,000 copies, each will cost considerably less than a dollar. After giving each subscriber his print, the Association will have a large balance to defray expenses, publish the "Journal," and buy works of art for distribution.

Few things have more pleased the Chair than the growing taste for works of art every where noticeable. Paintings and statuary are luxuries of the few; but illustrated books and periodicals and fine engravings are becoming the necessities of the many. The Easy Chair looks up in spirit from the pages of the Magazine to thousands of copies of Herring's charming "Village Blacksmith," the last year's engraving of the "Cosmopolitan," and hopes to be still more frequently greeted by the serene face of Shakespeare, the massive brow of Jonson, the grave visage of Daniel, and the courtly aspect of Raleigh.

Our Foreign Bureau.

THE English are having their lectures and lecturers; not rhetorical and eloquent so much as practical and fact-giving. Thus, a gentleman enrolled in some new volunteer rifle corps (springing out of the French invasion panic) goes to the Hythe School, with his military companions, to see and try the rifle practice, as taught there by Major-General Hay. He comes back, and gives his friends in Cheshire who are organizing a rifle brigade an account of proceedings.

Observe with what directness he begins: "We assembled on Saturday, and reported ourselves to the General. Now a word about Major-General Hay; he is a fine, handsome man, of very pleasing manners, and much beloved by all about him; he is a splendid shot, and is seldom seen without his rifle in his hand. There were forty-two of us, from all parts of the kingdom. There were two peers, there were country gentlemen, there were barristers, there were men from the Universities of Oxford and Edinburgh, there were merchants and tradesmen—all classes, in short. We required no introduction; we were good friends as soon as we met."

He goes on to say how, upon Monday, they were all ushered into the lecture-room to hear a few words from the General. "He combated and ridiculed the popular error, which has been so much dwelt upon of late in the newspapers, that nothing but plenty of ball-practice would ever make men good shots. He told us that such practice only perpetuated error. He said the less shooting we had previously had the better. He then told us that it was position drill alone which would teach us to shoot; the more of this a man had the better.

"He told us that we volunteers ought to be such good shots that our fire would be effective at 600 to 900 yards; for it would not be safe to employ us in the field at a less distance than this, as, of course, our drill and discipline could not be expected to be such as would enable us to come to close quarters—with the Zouaves, for instance."

The lecturer goes on to describe, with the utmost particularity and simplicity, their daily work for a week. The general course of instruction was, "Cleaning of arms, theoretical principles, aiming drills, position drills, and judging distance drills."

Only after a month of very full and constant teaching and drilling were they allowed practice with ball-cartridges; and then "commenced such excitement as I never witnessed before. The first course was the third class. We fired five rounds at 150 yards, five at 200 yards, five at 250 yards, and five at 300 yards; and if we did not make fifteen points, we were kept in the third class. Our gallant lieutenant made twenty-nine points; another man, Warner, of Oxford, made the same; and this was the largest score. I only made fourteen points, and, like all blockheads, was kept in the third class; but I have the satisfaction to say I got out of it, and am now a second-class man. Lieutenant Horner is a first-class man, and Ensign Bower, of the Rock Ferry Company, has the honor of being a marksman. The second class was five rounds at 400 yards, five at 500 rounds, five at 550 yards, and five at 600 yards. It was necessary to make twelve points out of these to get into the first class, and seventeen of our whole number stuck in the second class. The first class was five rounds at 650 yards, five at 700 yards, five at 800 yards, and five at 900 yards; and it was necessary to make seven points out of these to become a marksman, and there were no less than fourteen who did this. This practice lasted from Tuesday to Saturday, and I can not describe to you the excitement of it. It exceeded any thing I ever saw. Hunting, or cricket, or boating is nothing to it. I felt, when I saw it, that there was no mistake about the volunteer movement; and there is no reason why there should not be the same excitement when the Cheshire companies march from their parade-ground for ball-practice as there was at the barrack-yard at Hythe."

We have given thus much space to the pleasant Captain who lectures in this off-hand, straightforward style, in order to show the simple British manner in those talks, as well as to give hint and partial account of the famous system of the Hythe School.

Sir John Coleridge, too—who, if we remember rightly, had some figure in our last month's record—has been lecturing before the Literary societies, in the Athenæum of Exeter. The subject was Circuit Reminiscences, and treated in the same informal, unpretending way which characterized the talk on rifle practice.

"In his early career," he said, "although the law did not allow him to languish in idleness, still he had many idle days, and these he employed in note-taking, whenever any important cases presented themselves. He had found great benefit from it."

Thereupon the lecturer detailed some of these to his audience; and from among them we cite this, as being an entertaining type of the rest (of course your readers will picture to themselves a full hall of the best people of Exeter, Mr. Siliffant in the chair, and Sir John talking):

"In the county of Cornwall there lived a highly respectable family, named Robinson, consisting of two sons, William and Nicholas, and two daughters. The property was settled on the two sons and their male issue, and in case of death, on the two daughters. William was to be the squire, and Nicholas was placed with an eminent attorney at St. Austell, as his clerk, but with a prospect of one day being admitted into partnership. The young man conducted himself well and respectfully, and the attorney became much attached to him. The harmony, however, between the two and between the family was broken, for Nicholas had fallen in love with a young woman at St. Austell, who was a milliner or a milliner's apprentice. The result was that in November, 1782, the young man was sent to London to qualify himself as an attorney, and thence he wrote unhappy letters to his old master and others; but he was ultimately admitted an attorney of the Courts of Queen's Bench and Common Pleas. Thenceforward he was never seen by any member of his family or former friends, and all search for him proved fruitless. In the course of time the old Robinson died. William, the eldest son, succeeded to the property; he never married, and died in May, 1802. As nothing was heard of Nicholas, the two sisters became entitled to the property, and they held possession of it for twenty years, no claim being made to disturb their enjoyment of it. In 1788 a young man, whose looks and manners were above his means and station, had made his appearance as a stranger at Liverpool. He called himself Nathaniel Richardson—the same initials as Nicholas Robinson. He bought a cab and horse, and plied for hire in the streets of Liverpool. Being a civil, sober, and prudent man he soon became prosperous, and drove a coach between London and Liverpool. He married, had children, and gradually acquired considerable property. Having gone to Wales to purchase horses, in 1802, he was by an accident drowned in the Mersey. In the year 1821 it was said that this Nathaniel Richardson was no other than Nicholas Robinson, and his eldest son claimed the property, which was then inherited by the two daughters, and the action was tried in Cornwall. Nearly forty years had elapsed since any one had seen Nicholas Robinson, but it was made out conclusively, in a most remarkable way, and by a variety of small circumstances, all pointing to one conclusion—that Nathaniel Richardson was the identical Nicholas Robinson. The Cornish witnesses and the Liverpool witnesses agreed in the description of his person, his height, the color of his hair, his general appearance, and more particularly it was mentioned that he had a peculiar habit of biting his nails, and that he had a great fondness for horses. In addition to other circumstances, there was this most remarkable one—that Nathaniel's widow married again, and the furniture and effects were taken to the second husband's house. Among the articles was an old trunk, which she had never seen opened; but it happened one day that this old trunk was, through curiosity, examined, and, among other letters and papers, the two certificates of Nicholas Robinson's admission as attorney to the Courts of Queen's Bench and Common Pleas were found. On the trial the old master of Nicholas Robinson, alias Nathaniel Richardson, swore to his handwriting; and so the property was recovered."

Leaving Sir John talking, we will throw in here a little of the Continental chit-chat. And first, of poor Grisi. Queens grow old, and so Grisi. Parisians, with a courteous blindness, have failed to see it; or, seeing it, have made their courtesy silence. But in Madrid the opera-goers have given the rudest possible token of their sharp-sightedness and their deft hearing. The superb queen must abdicate; they will not even give her a hearing; the queen is indignant—defiant for a time. Shall she, who can win plaudits in the Salle Ventadour, not be heard in Madrid? It must be dreary work to fling down the sceptre which has been borne so long and royally. No wonder that she pants with indignation; yet they will not listen.

Of course she thinks her enemies have done this; any thing but age, any thing but failing power. So she writes an adroit letter, longer than we mean to print here, but ending thus:

"Far be from me the idea of reproaching the Madrid public, whom I have always appreciated; and if I had been permitted to speak I should have said: 'Gentlemen, listen to me with indulgence, and if, after having sung, I have not the happiness to please you, I will respect your decision and put an end to my engagement.' I could not certainly have continued to sing before a public whose approbation I had not obtained. Accomplishing a sacred duty, I lay this just manifesto before the public, feeling certain that it will appreciate it for what it is worth; and I promise to obtain from the public my justification. Its servant,

"GIULIA GRISI."

And in way of justification she chose the part of Norma. All the passion and the power that are left were summoned to make good the impersonation.

But no: age must have its spoil; there is a murmur; the queen struggles hard to pour life and tenderness into the chant; but the murmurs gain force and break into a howl of disappointment; a broken note or two more, a pose that is queenly, but which does not awe the malcontents into silence, and Grisi covers her face with her hands and bursts into tears.

So the curtain falls. Grisi will never win a wreath again, except such as they braid out of cypress and immortelles to hang on the head-stones of graves.

Who knows where they live—the gone-by monarchs of the stage? In what sort of seclusion, domestic or other (mostly other, we suspect), do they flay away at the hours till the hours end? A decayed soldier has his hospital, and, if a general, his pension; the priests gain in prestige and resources to the very last; the emperor has his investments upon the Guadalquivir if the people should cry loudly enough à la Porte; but where go the singers on abdication?

Apròpos of a stage abdication, let us chronicle a stage début; not that you of the West care one straw what new people are coming upon the Paris boards to relieve our evening tedium, but only because of the curious and singular fact that the débutante Mlle. Bressant, although the daughter of the actor of that name, has entered upon her career much against his wish, and, indeed, has been compelled to postpone her début (so violent was the father's opposition) until her majority gave her power to act for herself.

Her success has been brilliant and unquestioned in the new play of M. Maquet, called "Les Dettes de Cœur."

And who is M. Maquet? Not so well known as he deserves to be, since he has done very much of his best work under the shadow of the reputation of Dumas. Let us explain a little. Years ago M. Maquet was professor in the Lycée Charlemagne. The elder Dumas detected and availed himself of his literary tendencies and his erudition. Maquet suggested plots or historic episodes, which the great feuilletoniste wrought into story; they formed, in fact, a literary copartnership, Maquet supplying pabulum and Dumas digestion. For years this went on, by special agreement Maquet's name never once appearing. At length the "Trois Mousquetaires" was produced at the Ambigu Comique. Maquet was present with his wife and mother. Its success was amazing; every body clamored vociferously for the name of the author. D'Artagnan (who will forget the gallant Mousquetaire, whose mention recalls the crowds, and scents, and bravos, and mystery of the Ambigu Comique?) advanced to the front, doffed his plumed hat, and had the happiness to declare that the work was the joint production of MM. Dumas and Maquet. The generosity of the elder Dumas had added the name of the younger author, at which Maquet, being overcome, embraced his patron and swore eternal friendship, which lasted until a lawsuit came off not very long after in respect to division of the profits. Maquet, however, is now a power by himself, as the success of his "Dettes de Cœur" proves abundantly.

Are you anxious to know its plot? 'Tis thoroughly French. Listen. Pretty Princess Caliste, a Russian orphan, who is under guardianship of the Emperor, is betrothed and married to Prince Navratzin. But Navratzin is in the toils of a woman as bad as the ancient and august Catharine, who persuades him presently to desert his wife. It is dangerous business, however, to desert a wife who is ward of the Emperor without cause; so Navratzin and his accomplice (the Countess Gorthiany) conspire to blast the character of the Princess Caliste by hinting a liaison with M. Henri de Bierges. The two are unwittingly made parties to an interview which throws suspicion upon the Princess.

Caliste is innocent; but the chivalric conduct of De Bierges, in contrast with the coldness and cruelty of her husband, wins her heart away from all marital allegiance.

The drifting scene shows us Navratzin and Gorthiany in the south of Russia; Caliste and De Bierges in France.

But a certain pretty Mademoiselle Dampmesnil (rich as pretty, and played by the débutante we spoke of a short time back) has long been destined as fitting bride for De Bierges: so thinks at least his father, so think her friends, and so thinks she.

De Bierges hesitates.

Caliste meantime hears that the Prince, her husband, is dying, is penitent, and has begged her presence. She forgets all in her sense of duty, and flies to his bedside. But before her arrival emissaries have poisoned his ear with tales of Caliste; he brings public accusation against her; leaves all his estates to Gorthiany, and dies.

Caliste is banished; De Bierges, more than half entangled with the enchanting Mademoiselle Dampmesnil, yet flies to the relief of the banished Princess.

The Dettes de Cœur accumulate. A chivalrous generosity declares for marriage with the Princess, who has suffered loss of fortune by his own indiscretions. He asks his father's consent and presence. The scene is in a pavilion on the banks of Lake Como. The Princess Caliste is living near by. The father of De Bierges has come, but has brought with him the always charming Dampmesnil; the sight of her revives all the old flame of De Bierges; and he is giving undue expression to it, when the wan, pale Princess Caliste hursts in, comprehends the situation, gives kiss of adieu to the fickle lover, and jumps into the convenient water of Como.

Of course she dies there; and of course the play ends there.

A long space to give a chance play; but in detailing it, we have detailed the outline of the evening's amusement for thousands, in this November in Paris.

LAST month we said something of Schamyl; how he was captured, and was on his way to St. Petersburg. We have now to chronicle his arrival there; his wonderment; his kind reception by the Emperor; his entertainment festally, by the Archduke Constantine; and his naïf Oriental inquiry of the Grand Duke (in presence of the Duchess), if she (the Duchess) was the mother of all the Duke's children?

Every way, there must a grand contrast meet the eye of this pure Orientalist, between the ancient civilization and the new. His half score of wives, veiled and screened and guarded, in the Caucasus, are represented on the Neva by a bevy of dames in short sleeves and low-necked dresses. A correspondent of the Nord newspaper speaks of his utter amazement on attendance upon his first Russian ball. The jewels he could match; the silks he could outshow; the brilliant uniforms of the Imperial guard were not more showy than those of the Southern chasseurs; the officers of state not more venerable or dignified than the chieftains who had lent their counsel to the Imaum; but the women, who bared their shoulders to the gaslight, and who submitted to the familiar handling of the waltz, were a wonder and a mystery to him.

The Russian Emperor has been latterly upon a tour where all the newspaper gossips have followed him; but their records tell us nothing of importance. He has danced with pretty Polish ladies; he has complimented the municipalities of Moscow; he has shot a fair number of deer, wild boar, foxes (what will his English friends say of this?); but he has thrown no new light, or a new promise upon the great problems which are just now in course of resolution in the Russian empire.

Nothing new as yet of the Turkish conspiracy, and nothing new of Austria; she struggles still under the weight of her financial and other difficulties with an elegant reserve of confidence. Lackeys, and livery, and outdoor splendor, and fine music are not wanting in the Hapsburg court or capital; the young Emperor talks fluently half the languages of Europe to half the diplomatists of Europe; and they admire him; and, doubtless, he admires himself: if a grand court, and fine troops, and courtesy, and linguistic attainment would make a government sound and healthy, that of Austria would be extremely healthy.

Poor Venetia, we have not one encouraging word to say for this month. The good, and true, and hopeful are flying or are in prison; and there is a world of others who live only for the day—for the hair-dressing, the walk in St. Mark's, the evening spectacle, the laissez faire; and who will respect or pity those who will not respect themselves?

The subscription for Garibaldi's muskets is going rapidly forward. There is hope in it. The Romagnese, too, keep up their courage; no yielding as yet. Antonelli has made plenty of proselytes in Ireland, but none in Central Italy. An old letter of Louis Napoleon has just now been published, which has its bearing upon the question of Central Italian liberties, written as long ago as the year 1881; yet it is not counted any way militant to the present views of the Emperor. The Prince was in that day combating in the Romagna for the independence of Italy.

Have you seen the letter? It is worth a reading:

"M. — will tell your Holiness the truth as to the situation of things here. He informs me that your Holiness was afflicted at learning that we are in the midst of those who have revolted against the temporal power of the Court of Rome. The Romagnols in particular are intoxicated with liberty. They are to arrive this evening at Terni, and I must do them the justice to say that among them there is not one who attacks the chief of religion. This is owing to their chiefs being most estimable men, who prove that their attachment to religion is as great as their love of temporal independence. It appears that what is decidedly wished for is a separation of the temporal and spiritual powers. I state the truth—and I supplicate your Holiness to believe that I have no ambition. I can also affirm that I have heard all the young men, even the least moderate, declare that if Gregory will abandon temporal power they will adore him; they will become the warmest supporters of true religion, purified by a great Pope, the basis of which religion is the most liberal book that exists—the Holy Scripture.

"LOUIS NAPOLEON BONAPARTE."

From this let us slip away to such literary associations as belong to the recent publication of "Recollections of Madame Récamier"—a French woman, a star of what is called "Society" in Paris—whose name belongs to the brilliant category in which people name Delphine de Girardin and the Princess de Lieven. A throne she had, this Madame de Récamier, in her salon, which outlasted two or three French governments, and which stood firm almost from the time of the old Republic to the time of the new Republic of 1848, never lacking its subjects, its bounties, and its splendors.

As long ago as the year 1797, on occasion of a great fête given to the Conqueror of Italy, Madame Récamier possessed the power to draw away—were it only for a few moments—the adulation which was lavished upon the Republican General to herself. Which (if we may believe these published souvenirs) Napoleon thought very impertinent.

But it was not the habit or the art of Madame Récamier to make herself always the loadstone of regard. With beauty and with coquetry at command (whose conquests are not easily measured), she had the rare art to make these only subservient to her intelligence and her keen womanly observation. In place of extinguishing the wit and the gayety of others by her unrivaled powers of railery, she lighted up the observations of others with a tact that can no way be described, and made friends of the most pretentious, while she carried her honors into a corner.

Unlike Giulia Grisi, she knew what time to abdicate. At forty (though her bloom was not gone) people inquired for Madame Récamier; but there was no Récamier to be found.

She had retired to the Abbaye aux Bois—not so far away but that the echo of her charms still lived in the Paris salons, and not so far away but that admirers found her in the retirement; such men, for instance, as Lucien Bonaparte, and La Harpe, and Moreau, and Bernadotte (afterward of Sweden), and David, and Madame de Staël.

Chateaubriand was another who brought his rare intelligence and his absurd vanities to the Abbaye aux Bois for the appreciation and the flatteries of Madame Récamier. Yet again, the philosopher Ballanche, whom we might safely forget were it not for a salient anecdote or two in these souvenirs of the Récamier.

We repeat one, it is so French and so illustrative. Récamier was at Lyons. Ballanche, only a simple printer in that time, but lifted above his sphere by a rare intelligence, had been presented to the elegant Parisian exile, whom it was the fashion and the necessity to admire.

He had seen her with others: he came alone one day, infatuated like the rest. The banalities of complimentary talk subsided presently into that seriousness of expression where Ballanche found force and ardor.

But it happened that the poor printer's shoes had been blacked with some villainous compound that diffused any thing but an agreeable odor; and Madame Récamier, enthusiast and theorist as she was, could not suffer the annoyance.

"Monsieur Ballanche," said she, "your shoes make me ill."

The philosopher made humble apologies, regretting that he did not know of such desagrément earlier, and, withdrawing to the ante-room, presently returned without shoes, and took up the conversation where it had been dropped. Later comers remarked the peculiarity of his toilet, and anxiously asked explanation.

"It is nothing," said Ballanche; "Madame Récamier did not fancy the odor of my shoes, and I left them in the ante-chamber."

Few purer reputations have survived the scandals and brilliancy of Paris society than that of Madame Récamier. She belonged to it; she shone in it; she accepted its hazards; but by nature or by resolution she seemed lifted out of the plane of its grosser temptations. Once there was talk of her marriage with a Prince of Prussia, and of a divorce; but this project passed without fulfillment. Again, in the last days of Chateaubriand, when the old man was widower, it was rumored that he was eager to bestow his name upon Madame Récamier; but the Récamier said nay.

A letter-writer gives this bit of gossip, suggested by the Récamier correspondence:

"During M. Guizot's long ministry (from 1840 to 1848) the Egeria of the Abbaye aux Bois (Madame Récamier) was bitten with the wildest wish to see the minister adorn her drawing-rooms. Every effort was tried, but in vain. M. Guizot had his vanity, like all men who set up for being graver than their fellows; he had vanity of no ordinary scope, even, and no ordinary love for admiration; but somehow or other this vanity of his could not be flattered or fed by Madame Récamier. It was better ministered to by the Russian Altesse (Princess Lieven), who presided over the meetings at the Hotel Talleyrand; and M. Guizot was proof to the witcheries brought to bear upon him. But it was thought that in the abandon of the country more might be gained than in the busy, distracted city. Accordingly, when the minister removed to his villa at Passy, in the summer, the priestess of the Abbaye aux Bois deserted her temple too; and she, who never left her corner in everyday life, changed all her habits, and took up her temporary quarters close to the family of the (then) omnipotent politician. Here the first person assailed was the sister-in-law, who did the honors. She was vanquished. Next came the children, in due order of succession. They also suffered defeat. And an ancient lap-dog, that had been a favorite of Madame Guizot, mère, went over to the enemy. But, in spite of all this, the statesman himself remained inflexible, and Madame Récamier returned to Paris, having gained nothing by her campaign."

And while on books, why not mention the recent translation into English of the poems of Heinrich Heine?—as well done, perhaps, as it can be done, or as may be worth doing. Such sour, grim, ghastly humor as his must have its own tongue to talk with. We do not mean German, necessarily, for Heine wrote French as well as German; but he had a word-craft that played so evenly and truly (with all its notches and roughnesses and delicate sharp edges of cutting meaning) up to the wild, wayward, daredevil, man-hating, and God-doubting measure of his thought, that no other, of different sympathies, can hope to reach its power.

We will stick into this mention (a black pin to fasten it) one little acrid poem:

"By the sea—by the desert, night-covered sea
Standeth a youth.
His breast full of sadness, his head full of doubtings,
And with gloomy lips he asks of the billows:
'O answer me life's hidden riddle—
The riddle primeval and painful—
Over which many a head has been poring—
Heads in hieroglyphical night-caps—
Heads in turbans and swarthy bonnets—
Heads in perukes, and a thousand others—
Poor and perspiring heads of us mortals—
Tell me what signifies man?
From whence doth he come?

And where doth he go?
Who dwelleth among the golden stars yonder?"
The billows are murmuring their murmur eternal,
The wind is blowing, the clouds are flying,
The stars are twinkling, all listless and cold,
And a fool is awaiting an answer."

Heine's life is in the poem; and the germ of all his poetry is in the poem. The secret of his sour, sad life is in it; giving no confidence any where; doubting his wife; suspecting his friends; breaking with his mother; sneering at Christianity; detesting the world; yet with none of the heroism which bears even brute suffering manfully; pinched, soul and body, with sharp pains, and uttering swift gibes between the pinches, he died at length in 1866—

"And a fool is awaiting an answer."

Editor's Drawer.

WITH a New Year the Drawer opens gladly, greeting with good wishes a million happy hearts. This is on the presumption that the sad never come to the Drawer, or, if perchance they do, they forget their sadness and soon are glad again. A Happy New Year, then, to every body! May you live this year and many years, loving and being loved, happy in the house and every where, at peace with your conscience, your neighbor, and all mankind! "Tis good to be merry and wise." There is no wisdom in being merry always: there is a time to laugh and a time to weep, a time to dance and a time to die, and he only is wise who is ready for any thing that a good Providence sends. And with these few words by way of an introduction, the Drawer opens the NEW YEAR.

THERE lives not far from the village of C—, in Ohio, a good-humored, honest, but ignorant citizen. Not long ago he built himself a new house, and in discussing the style of its finish with his neighbors, he announced his intention to have a porchico. It was suggested that portico was the proper name, but Sam insisted that it was porchico; and finally, to settle the dispute, declared that the next time he was in town he would "ax John Scott, who had a big dictionary." Accordingly, a few days after, John Scott was appealed to; and consulting his "big dictionary," told him the proper name was piazza. Sam, full of his new knowledge, went triumphantly home, and informed his neighbors that they were all wrong.

"It is not porchico nor portico," John Scott looked in his big dictionary and told me. I knows what it is—it is pianazzar."

"EVERY neighborhood has its man to tell big stories, and we are not behind in that respect," says an unknown correspondent. "Old John Mitchley is known in all this neighborhood as one who delights to 'astonish the natives' by his 'recollections.'"

"On one occasion, when the crops had nearly all failed, and people had begun to talk of hard times, old John, being in company with several of his complaining neighbors, thus consoled them:

"People have little cause to grumble nowadays, when we recollect how it used to be. When I was yet in the Old Country, we had a famine that was one. Why,' continued he, 'hundreds of my neighbors actually starved to death; and on opening their bodies, it was found that they had been so pressed by hunger that they had actually filled themselves with grass.'

"Why,' asked a by-stander, 'were the bodies opened after death?'

"Why,' replied he, 'to find out what they starved to death on, of course.'

Two genuine verdicts, rendered by our old corner in Kentucky, are sent to us by an obliging correspondent, and we print them to aid the gentlemen of the same profession in their delicate duties:

WHAT THE WINDS SAY.

WHAT do the winds say to us,
As they hurry across the plain?
Or eddy around the hill-tops,
Coming, and going again?
What do they say to us, ever,
As they whisper among the trees?
Or murmur so low, in the bushes,
Stirring the pendent leaves?
Hark!—e'en now they are harping
Through my half-open door,
Breathing their strange, sweet melody,
Deepening more and more.
What is the message they bear us,
Stooping so low, as they go?
Waiting the laugh of the joyous,
Echoing the wails of woe?
Thus, I believe, is their lesson,
Taught alike by all,
That He who watcheth the sparrow,
Keeping it, lest it fall,
Watcheth alike o'er the wind-blasts,
Tempering with grace their power;
Making them bearers of love-gifts,
Multiplied every hour.
And so, as they kiss my casement,
Or rudely knock at my door,
Or toyingly rock the tree-tops,
Laughing o'er and o'er,
I say, all hail! ye wind-powers!
Come to me when you will,
You must ever repeat me the lesson
That PROVIDENCE keepeth me still.

To that excellent Judge and upright man, the Hon. Isaac H. Bronson, more than to any other man, East Florida owes its good order, regard for law, the authority of the courts, and its comparative freedom from crime. He was an admirable presiding officer; frank, yet dignified in his intercourse with the bar; firm, but kind and pleasant to all having business in court; and, off the bench, a bland and genial companion. The distinguished Judge Law, of Savannah, was employed to argue an important case, involving a large amount of property, in the Florida Courts, and before Judge Bronson. He had never seen the Judge, and was ignorant of his character and capacity. Just before starting for Florida the learned counsel inquired of the writer, who was well acquainted with men and things in Florida, "what sort of a Judge he should have to argue before—whether he could comprehend and appreciate a good legal argument?" etc., evidently fearing lest his learning was going to be of little avail in the wilds of Florida. The writer assured him that he or any other lawyer would find it difficult to frame an argument which the Judge would not thoroughly understand. On his return from Florida, where he had astonished the natives with the multitude of his big books, and awed the bar by the profundity of his legal lore, the eminent barrister could not conceal his enthusiastic admiration of Judge B. "It would have done you good to see him grab my law. Why, Sir, he recognized my points at once, and seemed to know my authorities as well as I did myself. It was a treat, Sir, a treat to argue before such a Judge!" Judge Bronson was a New Yorker, a Member of Congress from that State, and afterward appointed Judge of the United States District Court for East Florida by President Van Buren. He died a few years ago, leaving behind him a name never mentioned but with respect.

A CURIOUS instance of the quaint style of the last century occurs in the preface to Croke, etc. The editor and enthusiastic admirer of the author of these valuable reports informs us that Sir George Croke was continued in his office of Judge of the King's Bench after he became old and deaf, by Charles the Second, who "gave him the like allowance and fee he paid to the rest of the judges, till a certiorari came from the great Judge of heaven and earth to remove him from a human bench of law to a heavenly throne of glory."

AN INDIAN LEGEND.

IN India 'twas said, and oft have I read it,
That he who, in washing the gold-drifted sand,
Should speak the pure truth, to him it must happen
That gems of fine gold shall fall into his hand.
So is it forever! In truth be but bold,
And into thy being walk diamonds and gold.

QUITE recently, Hon. Clement Valandigham, present member of Congress from Ohio, and formerly presiding judge of that district, was on a visit to New Lisbon, same State. He is a native of the latter town. During his visit he had occasion to attend court in the adjoining county of Mahoning, town of Canfield. Several members of the New Lisbon bar were going up, and they went in company, on horseback. Judge Valandigham was doing some business for his friend Wright, who owned a bay horse, which he offered to the Judge for the occasion. This horse was remarkable for nothing in particular—a quiet, tractable animal. Arrived at Canfield the company divided, some stopping at the American House, the others, including the Judge, went to the United States Hotel. The session was drawing to a close, and all the New Lisbon members had returned except Anson Brewer and Judge Valandigham. At last they were ready to go, and the Judge arranged to meet Mr. Brewer at the American immediately after dinner. Dinner was dispatched, portmanteau called for, and horse ordered out. The clerk gave the orders, portmanteau was brought, but the horse was not. Impatient with delay, the hostler was again summoned and again ordered to "bring out Judge Valandigham's horse!"

"Ay, ay! but please, yer honor, 'pon me soul I don't know which is yer honor's nag."

The clerk desired the Judge to describe the horse, remarking that, "where there are so many coming and going it is hard for the hostler always to remember to whom each belongs."

"Very true!" replied the Judge, and after reflecting a moment, continued, "and upon 'my honor,' it will be hard for me to describe the horse. Indeed I will not attempt it, but will go into the stable and show the hostler."

Out they went, up and down the stable walked the Judge and the hostler. The Judge looked perplexed, the hostler apologized for forgetting. At last the Judge suddenly stopped behind a fine chestnut sorrel, and with much assurance said, "That's the horse; bring him out!"

Out went the horse, on went the Judge, and away they went together. Mr. Brewer was waiting in front of the American ready to mount so soon as the Judge came up.

The Judge came, Brewer mounted, and they were just about starting, when a countryman (a farmer) came running up almost out of breath; he had seen the Judge cross the commons. Seizing hold of the Judge's bridle-rein, and looking him fiercely in the eyes, he demanded, "Where are you going to?"

"Why, what's the matter? I'm going home."

"Matter! I shall have you arrested for horse-stealing, you villain! Where did you get this horse?"

The Judge looked at the stranger as if he thought he was playing off a joke; but he saw by the fire in his eye that it was no joke. He looked at the horse, then at Brewer; he saw fun in Brewer's eye. Then at the stranger again, and replied,

"My dear Sir, this horse belongs to my friend Wright, of New Lisbon. I rode him up here several days ago, and now I am going back. Brewer, isn't it so?"

Brewer said, "No, Judge, you're caught. Stranger, arrest him! he has stolen your horse!"

Stranger smiled, said he was sorry to give the Judge any trouble, but if he would treat he would let him off. The Judge acquiesced, and then with Brewer rode back to the United States stables, and the horse was exchanged. Brewer knowing Wright's horse, pointed him out at first sight.

GILES H—, nicknamed Gyles, was a very conceited fellow; but Nature had given him such an extremely ugly countenance that even he, with all his self-conceit, could not fancy himself handsome. However, he consoled himself with the reflection that handsome people were invariably fools; and whenever he chanced to be in a company of ladies, he was sure to bring up, if possible, this favorite theory of his. But his self-satisfaction once met with a rebuff in the manner I am going to relate. One evening, among a set of his friends, some one happened, in speaking of an absent gentleman, to praise his beauty. This was too good an occasion to be lost, and he instantly brought forward his theory. He could not bear a handsome man, he said; he despised the very looks of one; "beauty was well enough for the ladies"—here he gave a sly glance at the femininity then present, and added, with great emphasis—"I shouldn't want any one to call me a handsome man, I—"

what he did admire in a gentleman. "Manly actions, of course," was the triumphantly begun reply; but again he was interrupted by one of the company, a droll lad, who called out, "You remind me, Gyles, of the old squaw who got drunk and tumbled into a ditch, begging the by-standers, as she crawled out of the mud, not to 'look at her looks, but to give their attention to her behavior.'"

Gyles being aware that his behavior was not of a kind to bear too close attention subsided into a becoming silence.

ON the Western Division of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad there are two agents named respectively H. G. Gunn and W. C. Roach. Recently the latter wrote to the former, directing his letter as follows:

Mr. Gunn, in returning the fire, "went off" as follows:

Mr. Roach acknowledged the corn.

"EARLY in August I was on my way home from a visit East. I came on a steamer by way of the lakes. By-the-by, it is one of the pleasantest summer trips that can be made. At Cleveland we had an addition to our passengers of a gentleman, lady, and dog. The gentleman was a prematurely old man, the lady a rather fine-looking one, and the dog a fine pointer. The lady was much younger than her husband; she was wealthy and he was not, and from their actions, he was of the class called 'hen-pecked.' They remained on board until we arrived at Mackinac, when they left us. We had several children on board, and at the breakfast table the next morning a little fellow of six or seven summers spoke up: 'Captain, the lady that had the man and dog went ashore at Mackinac, didn't they?' Every one at the table roared; and after that, for the balance of the trip, when they were spoken of, it was as the lady that had the man and dog."

THE Rev. Judson Nott, a local Methodist preacher in the town of —, in Southern Kentucky, possessed many characteristics which, in his church, made him a good and useful member. He was a good singer, could pray long and loud, and was one of the best "scotchers" that occupied the "Amen corner."

On one occasion the original and eccentric, yet learned and pious, E. P. Fountain was conducting, in the town of —, a protracted meeting; our local preacher was, of course, in attendance. The meeting had been protracted for nearly two weeks, and the regular attendant and working members of the church were pretty well worn down, from loss of sleep, etc., during the late night services, and when opportunity presented during the sermon, would take little snatches of sleep preparatory to the three or four hours of singing and praying with the mourners after the sermon was over. Our local preacher happened to be among the sleepy, and on one occasion the preacher observing the drowsiness of his congregation, undertook to awaken them with an anecdote. He commenced one of his best in his inimitable way, and it was having good effect, when lo! about midway, our local preacher, rousing himself with a jerk and a start, and without waiting to hear what the preacher was saying, and desirous to convince him that he was not asleep, roared out vociferously, "Amen!"

Of course he was caught. The preacher, seeing the incident was better than his anecdote, gave up; but our local preacher has not been known to say Amen since, except sotto voce.

THE "new Constitution" of Virginia made all the State officers elective by the people, and of course many good fellows would be chosen without much qualification for their respective offices. Among these was Sheriff H—, of — County, who made himself famous for the novelty of his returns upon processes placed in his hands. On one occasion he tracked a fellow, for whom he had a subpoena, to a room where there was gambling going on, and being unable to get in, and not being perfectly certain that the person was in the room, he made the following return:

"Not found as I nose on."

A Clerk in an adjoining county, who is also a good fellow, employed a good deputy to make up the minutes for him, but, desiring to show off a little, he concluded to read them himself. He did very well till he came to a place where the writ of Alias Capias was mentioned, when, turning to his astonished deputy: "Elias Capias!" says he, "there is no such man in this county!"

On another occasion, in reading the orders in court, a defendant in an action of "assault and battery" having put in the plea of son assault demesne, he turned around and remarked to the counsel, in a knowing way, that he had better put in the whole county, for he had in it a son of Sol Means, when the whole family had gone from the county years ago.

But the following return is quite up to any thing we have had in the Drawer:

OLD ROWE keeps a hotel in the northern part of this State, which he boasted was the best in "them parts;" where, as he used to say, you could get any thing that was ever made to eat. One day in comes a Yankee, sends his horse around to the stable, and stepping up to the bar asked Old Rowe what he could give him for dinner.

"Any thing, Sir," says Old Rowe; "any thing, from a pickled elephant to a canary-bird's tongue."

"Wa'al," says the Yankee, eying Old Rowe, "I guess I'll take a piece of pickled elephant."

Out hustled Rowe into the dining-room, leaving our Yankee friend nonplused at his gravity. Presently he comes back again.

"Well, Sir, we've got 'em; got 'em all ready right here in the house; but you'll have to take a whole one, 'cause we never cut 'em!"

The Yankee thought he would have some cod-fish and potatoes.

OLD Henry — is a genuine Pennsylvania Dutchman, and a well-to-do farmer in — County. He is a good citizen, takes his dram whenever he feels like it, generally votes a "straight ticket," and is entirely opposed to taxes. Taxes are something Henry can't see the propriety of; and although he has to pay them, he maintains and exercises the reserved right of protest. In the year 18— taxes, especially for State purposes, were unusually high, and Henry growled grievously. During the summer of that year the Democrats got up "a Jackson funeral;" and as the members of that party were death on the General in his lifetime, they were, of course, enthusiastic in their funeral ovations. A great crowd joined in the procession, with banners craped and muffled drums.

In the College campus a stand had been erected for the orator, and around it an immense multitude had collected. The Rev. Dr. A— was called upon to open the exercises with prayer. He rose and commenced; but had not proceeded far when Henry, who was at the outer edge of the crowd, was attracted by his voice. Supposing the Doctor was making a speech, he called out, at the top of his voice,

"Vy don't you say something about the Shtate tax!"

AN East Georgian writes to the Drawer: The love of the negro for display at funerals; the exquisite delight he takes in attending at the burial of the dead; the perfect joy with which he rolls out, in the highest strains, the parting hymn; and the insult he feels if not invited to the interment, has often afforded an involuntary laugh among us at the South.

Passing down the streets a few Sabbaths ago, we met a long funeral procession, preceded and followed by a long train of the colored population, decked out in all the paraphernalia becoming so important an occasion. As the cortege advanced the streets became thronged with darkeys, all anxious to take a farewell look at the remains of their departed brother.

About ten minutes after the funeral had passed we observed, on the opposite side of the street, a sable daughter of Africa, dressed in white, with anxious look, hurrying after the now distant procession. Two negro-women standing near us hailed the lingering sister, and inquired the reason of her delay.

"To tell you de trute," she replied, "I jes done geeing de buckra dem dinner, and you know I always try for lib up to de rule, 'Business before pleasure.'"

THERE is said to be no infallible test of the approach of death, and physicians generally tell their declining patients that "while there is life there is hope." These things may have been true some time ago, but the science of pathology is advancing, and the approach of the grim monster may now be told with certainty—at least, in the case of colored people. The discovery of this test is due to an aged colored female of our town, familiarly known as Aunt Becky—a character, by-the-way, particularly famous as the subject of numerous revivals in the "African meetin'." Some years ago Aunt Becky was living with an old darkey called Uncle Johnny; and one fatal evening Uncle Johnny was carried home on a board, having been maliciously, wickedly, and feloniously shot—mortally wounded by divers slugs discharged from a shot-gun. The District Attorney was sent for to take his dying declaration, and on entering the house found Aunt Becky in a flood of grief. The Attorney, finding the old man in rather a comfortable frame of body, remarked to Auntie that "Johnny wasn't as bad as he expected to find him, and might perhaps get well again."

"Oh no, Squire, bless your heart, 'Johnny's a dead nigger. I cooked him a nice piece of fitch to-night, and he wouldn't touch it; and whenever a nigger turns away from fitch he's gwine to die sartain!"

"THE many hearty laughs enjoyed by readers of the Drawer impose an obligation upon each of them to contribute, if able, to the 'General Fund.' For my part, I send the following. If they amuse others as they have me, they are worthy of a place.

LYNCHBURG.

"Old Ben Gray was an old toper, and Old Ball was his favorite horse. Now Old Ball was a famous good riding-horse, and the eye of every jockey in the neighborhood had been attracted by his fine points; but Old Ben knew the value of Old Ball too well to part with him. When he was top-heavy what horse could carry him so steadily as Old Ball; or, when entirely overweighted, would so carefully select a soft, sandy spot for his rider to fall on, and then so patiently wait until sleep brought sobriety? So the efforts of the jockeys to swap or trade him out of Old Ball had been in vain. But one day Old Ball failed to select a spot free of stones for Old Ben to drop on, or became impatient for his feed and left, or in some other way angered his owner, who straightway swapped with his neighbor Jones, receiving as 'boot,' a 'mint drop' of the Benton stamp and the largest denomination. But before the day was over Old Ben sorely repented himself of his trade. Besides being 'chiseled' absolutely in the trade, how could he get on without Old Ball? But Gray knew Jones, and he knew Jones knew Old Ball; and he further knew that there was no chance of getting Old Ball back unless he played his game 'mighty silky.'

"Old Ben matured his plan, and then mounted his 'Jones hos,' and timed his departure from the court-green so as to pass Jones just as he was unhitching Old Ball from the tree to which he had been tied during the day. Reining in his horse, he drawled out, 'Oh, Mr. Jones, this morning, when I was a tradin' Old Ball to you, I reckon I was a little drunk, and I didn't tell you of one of Old Ball's tricks. Now I don't want any body hurt by any thing I done; and now I just want to tell you ef ever you come to a river, and Old Ball takes a notion to lie down in the water, just you get right off, for Old Ball's a gwine to do it certain.' Jones, of course, declared himself cheated in the trade, and claimed drawbacks for damages. But Old Ben said he only warranted Old Ball sound, 'an' Old Ball is jes' as sound as a Mexican dollar, an' jes' you break him of that little trick an' he's jes' as good as any man's hos.' Finally, after Jones's proposal to 'rue' had been rejected by Gray, a new swap was agreed on, the Jones hos for Old Ball even, Gray retaining the X.

"Accordingly, bridles and saddles were changed, and each man mounted his own horse, when Old Ben gave Jones another piece of information about Old Ball. 'Mr. Jones,' said he, 'there's jes' one other thing about this hos I'd like to tell you: as long as I've been riding Old Ball he never yet did take that notion!'

"CAPTAIN L—, yet one of our worthiest and most respected citizens, was for many years an Alderman of this city. During one year, when he was senior Alderman—and consequently President of our Hustings Court—a woman, one Mary Jane Boatright, was brought before the Court to be tried for petty larceny. The proof was positive; but the punishment was stripes, and the Court could not for a moment think of inflicting this degrading as well as painful punishment upon a woman—least of all Captain L—, whose benevolence was equaled only by his gallantry. Nevertheless, the proof was conclusive, and the Court was in a quandary; they couldn't say she was not guilty, and they wouldn't say she was. In this crisis it devolved upon the Captain to extricate the Court from their difficulty, and pronounce sentence—or decision, rather—which he did in these words: 'Mary Jane Boatright, stand up. Prisoner, you appear before us charged with a crime (small as was the value of the article charged as stolen) involving moral considerations of the gravest nature. You have had a fair and impartial trial, with all the aid that counsel learned in the law and officers prompt and obliging could give; and after hearing the evidence, and all that counsel could urge in your favor, the Court is compelled to believe that you did steal the lamp in question. But, prisoner, inasmuch as there is no shadow of proof that you ever did the like before, and, if possible, still less that you will ever do the like again, we pronounce you not guilty. Go in peace, and sin no more.'

"This judgment stands to this day upon the record books of our court, the contradictions reconciled by a pen being drawn through the first clause, but the whole still very legible.

"IN this neighborhood resided Miss Mary Ella S—, a young lady of an uncertain age. One day she died, and her afflicted mother, a widow, applied to Captain W. M. W., a kind neighbor, to write her obituary. The Captain prepared a touching tribute to her many virtues, commencing in the time-honored words, 'Departed this life, in the — year of her age, Miss Mary Ella S—,' etc. Having read this to the bereaved mother, and received her approbation and thanks, he remarked, 'But, Mrs. S—, here's a little blank that ought to be filled. How old was Miss Mary Ella at the time of her death?' 'Captain W.,' said the inconsolable mother, between her sobs, and without removing her handkerchief from her eyes, 'if that poor dear child were now alive I don't think she would like for her age to be known.' The wishes of the deceased were respected, and all that the curious in such matters ever knew was that Miss Mary Ella S— died in the —th year of her age.

"JIM B— was always rather a mischievous one, and for some years was acting clerk of our City

Court. While thus engaged he was called on by one Michael O'Shaugnessey for a marriage license, which was granted. The next day Michael called again. After sitting silent for some time, and stroking down his hair upon his forehead, as only a bashful Irishman does or can do, he opened his business:

"'Misther B—, you mind I got a license from you on yestherday; now, Mr. B—, don't you tell any body, but I've gone and lost it. Now, what's to be did?'

"After amusing himself a little with the poor fellow's perplexity, Jim kindly made out and handed him a duplicate; and Mike, with many bows and thanks, started. Just as he reached the door Jim called him back.

"'Mike,' said he, 'what sort of a looking girl is she?'

"'Faith, Misther B—, I'm thinking she could git into heaven this minit; Saint Pater would take her for one of the howly angels.'

"'And she had a heap of beaus, I reckon?' suggested Jim.

"'Troth I had the divil's own time a gittin' uv hur,' responded Mike.

"'And when's the marriage to be?' again questioned Jim.

"'Plaze the Virgin, next Sunday afternoon, at the church,' out of the fullness of his heart, said Mike.

"Then said Jim, in his most confidential tone, 'This is Thursday; now, Mike, I'd advise you to keep your eyes on her from now till then, for some of those other fellows might find that lost license, and take that girl to the priest and marry her by order of Court.'

"'Bedad they-won't!' broke from his lips as Mike burst into a long trot, which he never broke until he had found his girl and trotted her to the church, where, on that same Thursday afternoon, they twain were made one flesh.

"'Misther B—,' said Mike, on meeting him some months after, 'that was a powerful hot evening, and 'twas a powerful long race I had; and if I had known as much as I know now, I don't think I'd a been in such a hurry!'

"At another time our friend issued a license for the marriage of John Murphy and Mary Manning, both natives of the Emerald Isle, for which he received from John the legal fee—$1. But the intended bride 'rued.' Six weeks and two days afterward John made his second appearance in the clerk's office.

"'Misther B—,' said he, 'in February last I got a license from you to maarry Maary Maaning, an' I deen't maarry her; an' now, plaze yer honor, wud yer be so good as to alther it so it wud fit Honora Moriarity?'

"Jim informed him that this couldn't be done, and that he must get a new license to 'fit' Honora.

"'And pay for it?' said John.

"'And pay for it,' said Jim B—.

"'Och, indade! thin I'm ruined intirely, intirely!' exclaimed John; 'fur I jist coorted Honora to save the dollar!'

LITTLE JENNY is a bright-eyed lass, just entering on her sixth year, the only daughter of my friend, B—, who, with many others, thinks (notwithstanding he hails from "Little Jersey") she is uncommonly "peart." Not long since she went to visit her grand-parents, who reside in the city of —. While there, some of the younger members of the family, thinking it would amuse the little girl, took her to see a circus company perform. For a few days after her return home it was all "cirkis;" she talked of, and seemed to think of, nothing else. Her good mother, from early childhood, had been taught to believe that more evil than good grew out of the attendance upon such exhibitions; and soon took occasion to say to Jenny she didn't think it a proper place for ladies, much less little girls, to visit; for, as a general thing, the performers were unprincipled and wicked people; and wished her, when repeating her prayers before retiring for the night, to ask the Lord to change their hearts and make them good. As was her custom after being prepared for bed, she knelt by the side of her mother, and having said, "Now I lay me," and "God bless papa and mamma," etc., added: "Now, dear Lord, please bless the 'cirkis' men, and make them good, so they can play again!"

A CORRESPONDENT of the Drawer over the line, in Canada, sends us a tit-bit that is worthy of a Yankee boy. He says:

"You must know that we had a 'Thanksgiving Day' here a short time ago. Well, two little specimens of 'Young Canada' (a little brother and sister) conversing on the merits of it, little 'Sis,' it seems, could not rightly understand it.

"'Willie,' said she, 'what is Thanksgiving Day for?'

"'Don't you know?' says Willie.

"'Sis. 'No.'

"'WILLIE. 'Why, it's for folks to pray and eat chickens!'"

AN INCIDENT.

THE other day, upon the street while walking, I met two boys—the one was carrying fish, The other loaves of bread. To have a dish Of chit-chat both stopped short and fell a-talking. A friend then passing by, said I, "Hey, John!" Said he, "Hey, Bob!" and staid to hold a chat, Not once suspecting what I would be at. With eyes upon the boys, "'Tis ten to one, Friend Jack," said I, "you can not tell me why, Just now, I'm like a politician cunning!" (Jack hates intensely every kind of punning: So, looking sulky, he deigned no reply.) "Because I have," cried I—and Jack looked vicious—"I have my eyes upon the loaves and fishes!"

A POSTMASTER says, in a note to the Drawer:

"Among other queer addresses which are written upon letter envelopes that come under my distribution in the post-office I find the following, which strikes me as being particularly satirical and ill-tempered. It hails from East Dayton:

"Post Masters if you have a desire to oping my letters opin them and then please to cloase them up and send them on to Mr. Henry H—, —, — Go with speed."

A CORRESPONDENT in the City of Elms, Connecticut, sends to the Drawer on this wise or foolish:

"A certain colored individual was in doubt whether the whale swallowed Jonah, or vice versa. To settle his doubt, he came to a brother-darkey to help him out of his difficulty. But he was inclined to be skeptical when informed that Jonah undoubtedly swallowed the whale, and asked, "Well, look here, Sambo; whar bouts did dis Jonas live?"

"After scratching his head for an answer, his opponent replied, gravely, 'Oh! up dar in Connecticut 'mong de Yankees somewhar.'

"This settled the doubter's mind, and, walking off, he triumphantly muttered, 'Ise got um now; de Yankees are de berry debil on fish!'"

"I HAVE seldom (if ever) met with a Nebraskism," says a Northwestern, "in the Drawer. Here is one: We have a preacher here—one of the Western genus that we read about. Last Sabbath evening he preached a sermon from the story of the Prodigal Son. It was a descriptive sermon—peculiarly so. After giving a sketch of the life of the young man—his departure from home—his waste of his patrimony—his descent through all the grades of dissipation and vice to abject poverty—the preacher described his return home. He said he arrived in the morning at the top of a hill which overlooked the paternal mansion, and being 'afraid of his father, waited until he seen him go out to work;' and then he went down, and was 'hugged in the arms of the old woman, who was sitting in her rocking-chair, on the front porch, a-smoking and a-knitting!' The sermon was powerful, and full of similar anachronistic allusions."

IN Kentucky, up among the "knobbs," there is a region so rocky and rough that the people do most of their hauling on a sort of sled; or, at best, can only use a frame mounted on wide block trucks sawed from a log. Lately a traveler, with a phaeton having very small wheels in front that turned under the carriage, by missing his road got into this wild country. Making the best of his way through it he was surprised to find that he was followed by a crowd of boys, who kept their eyes intently fixed on the running gear of his vehicle. The silence they maintained, and the perseverance they manifested in dogging our traveler somewhat alarmed him; and stopping his horse, he inquired why they were following him. The leader of the boys, an overgrown fellow, about seven feet high, replied, "Why, dog-on-it, Mister, we wanted to see how far you'd get before your big wheels cotched the little ones!"

IN Georgia, on the installation of a new Governor, it is the practice of the Speaker of the House of Representatives to go to the door of the Hall, and there, in a loud voice, announce the fact. Some years since Mr. Bartin Lumpkin came to the Executive chair. On the conclusion of the inaugural ceremonies the Speaker proceeded to the door, but becoming a little nervous his tongue slipped, and he cried out, "Oyez, oyez, oyez! Lartin Governor is now the Bumpkin of Georgia!"

It is proper to add that, notwithstanding this discouraging announcement, Mr. L.'s administration proved highly satisfactory to the people.

FROM Florida a friend writes: "Some months since, in one of my jaunts down the Ocklocknee River, I stopped to spend the night at a Mr. L—'s, originally from Darlington District, South Carolina. The next morning, at breakfast, there was on the table a beautiful dish of honey. I remarked to the good lady that it was decidedly the prettiest honeycomb I had ever seen, and that I should like very much to procure some wax, as Mrs. B— sometimes indulged in making wax-flowers, and would have but little trouble in bleaching it.

"She threw down her knife and fork, and ex—claimed, 'Law, sakes! dose Miss B— make wax-flowers? Well, I declar! Now, old Miss Dixon, in Cal-y-ner, ust-to make 'em so n-a-trel that every fall of the year they'd shed their leaves!'

"In my perigrinations along the Gulf Coast I happened to attend a Quarterly Meeting (Methodist). After the close of the meeting a friend requested me to take a young lady to her father's residence, some two or three miles. With all the gallantry characteristic of a Southerner I offered her a seat in my buggy, which she accepted; and being the daughter of a wealthy planter I anticipated a pleasant conversation. Speaking of the singing at church, I said, 'Miss, how did you like the singing to-day?'

"'Wy, tolable well.'

"'I am very fond of music, both vocal and instrumental.'

"'Yes; I-is—too. I plays on the pian-na—I do.'

"'Ah! indeed.'

"'Oh yes; pap [father] he wanted little sis to take, but little sis wouldn't take. Then pap he af me to take; and after a while I concluded I would take, and, sure nugh, I did take!'"

"A SHORT time ago," writes an obliging correspondent, "I had the pleasure of hearing the following anecdotes from an entertaining elderly gentleman, a native of Boston, who assured me of their entire truthfulness. One at least, containing as it does a veritable saying of Franklin, is worthy of preservation—which, to the best of my knowledge, has never been in print:

"Jack Williams would, in our day, be considered and denominated a gentleman of decidedly fast proclivities. Being in Philadelphia, and living according to his doctrine, he was reduced to that condition which I believe is termed impecuniosity. Thus necessitated, he was obliged to have recourse to his friends. His first application was to his uncle, Benjamin Franklin. Jack stated his wants to be in the neighborhood of $60. Franklin told him to call the next morning, when, if possible, he would accommodate him. Of course Jack was there, and his heart rejoiced exceedingly to see his uncle counting out the cash.

"During this operation Jack took a sheet of paper from the desk, with the laudable design, no doubt, of giving his I. O. U. If such was his intention he was disappointed; for Franklin, gently drawing away the paper, and with a benevolent smile, cried, 'You need not waste my paper too, Jack!'

"THE same Jack was driving somewhere in the neighborhood of Boston. Stopping at an inn to water his horse, he noticed a rough-looking person standing at the stoop. Naturally supposing him the hostler, he hailed him with, 'Hostler, water my horse!' The individual thus addressed maintained a perfect silence. Jack again hailed him with no better success; he tried it the third time, adding a small expletive, which seemed to arouse the attention of the silent personage. Stepping from the stoop he marched gravely up to Jack, and addressed him as follows: 'Sir, were you aware of the fact that you were speaking to Governor Carleton, of Connecticut?' Jack immediately descended from his chaise, removed his hat, and said, 'Please, Governor Carleton, water my horse!'"

ONE of the writer's school-mates was always behind with his lessons; and upon one occasion his teacher, in an academy in which he had managed to obtain an entrance, was endeavoring to explain a question in arithmetic to him. He was asked, "Suppose you had one hundred dollars, and were to give away eighty dollars—how would you ascertain how much you had remaining?" His reply set teacher and scholars in a roar; for, with his own peculiar drawling tone, he exclaimed, "Why, I'd count it!"

DOLTS of Justices have been in the Drawer; here is a fool of a Lawyer:

"In the village of E—, a shire town in one of the western counties in Ohio, a short time since, one of the teachers in the Union School was arrested on the affidavit of an enraged 'parent,' charging him with the commission of a malicious battery on the person of one of his—the aforesaid 'parent's'—hopeful sons. After the evidence in the cause was all introduced, the attorney for the prosecution, a regular justice-killer, opened the cause with a terrible onslaught on the poor school-teacher as well as upon the king's English, leaving it a matter of considerable doubt as to which of the twain was the more severely injured. The counsel for defense merely read and submitted to the Justice the law upon the subject of teacher and pupil, as laid down by Wharton, in his 'American Criminal Law.'

"The counsel for the prosecution immediately sprang to his feet, exclaiming, in great wrath, 'May it please the Court, who is this man, Mr. Horton? Some old English book that was writ before the crime of salt and batter was discovered, I'll be bound! But, never mind; I'll soon lay this old British imposition to land!' And thereupon snatching up the book, which was now lying closed upon the table, he asked, 'Where 'bouts is the verse the gentleman's jist bin, readin?' Not finding the verse, however, after considerable thumbing, 'Ah! well,' exclaimed he, 'I'll git it in the index in a minit;' and thereupon turning to the S's in the index, commenced running over them, audibly exclaiming, 'Salt and Batter—Salt and Batter—Salt—Salt—Salt and Batter—lem-me-see; I'll have it d'reckly—Salt—Salt—Sheep-stealin'—Salt and Batter—Shootin'—Swearin'—Salt—Salt and Batter—S, S, S;' and running the S's clear out, and not finding the much-wished-for Salt and Batter, dashed down the book, exclaiming to the Justice, 'There now, you see! that's jist what I'd expected! This book was jist writ for rascality, and to fool the Court. The man who'd write sich stuff for law ort to be ashamed to index it so any body else but a rogue couldn't ever find it!'"

OLD Governor Stuyvesant, some years after the British possession of New York, appeared before the British Governor (Cartaret) with a complaint that he was annoyed by men and boys bathing in front of his house in a nude state. Governor Cartaret assured him that it should be stopped; but happening to recollect, said, "Why, Governor, your house is at some distance from the river, and how can it incommode the ladies of your family?" "Vy, you zee," said old Peter, shaking his cane, "mine gals have got a pig spy-glass!"

FROM Kansas City, Missouri, a fun-loving reader writes:

"You don't often get an item from this border country; not from the lack of ludicrous incidents, but because none has time to jot them down. But here is one which I can't help snatching a moment 'between speculations' to relate.

"Our worthy Recorder and City Attorney had made themselves somewhat odious to the 'faster' order of our citizens by enforcing overmuch the ordinance in regard to fast driving. Hardly a dog could trot past the court-house at a round pace without incurring the risk of an arrest. It had become entirely too irksome for our freedom-loving citizens; and many a scheme was laid to 'cut the comb' of these officers.

"One day Colonel M'G——, one of our most prominent land-owners, and withal a lover of a good horse, was 'snatched' for a violation of the same law, and summoned to trial at the court-house next day.

"The next day came, and the Recorder convened his court, and awaited the coming of the culprit. The City Attorney assumed his fiercest John C. Calhoun look and attitude, and waited also. A small crowd collected about the door, expecting some fun on his arrival.

"At last he appeared in the distance, seated in his lightest 'trotting wagon,' and wielding a huge hickory 'gad,' by means of which he was urging on in a fast walk a tremendous old bony ox, across whose wide-spread horns he had fastened a board, upon which was painted, in conspicuous letters, 'Go Slow!'

"The crowd 'took,' and raised a shout which brought to the door both Recorder and Attorney, who gazed at this singular 'outfit' in silence, and without a smile. The dignity of these officers failed to suppress the laughter of the crowd; and the Recorder, turning on his heel in disgust, exclaimed, 'Old Mac will beat us all! Adjoin the Court!'

"It is needless to say that our citizens have since been allowed to increase their speed unmo-lested."

FROM Hartford, Connecticut, we have the following: "Not long since there lived in this city a sign and ornamental painter named Sayre, who was, and is, somewhat noted for his waggery. Stopping in New York city over the Sabbath with a 'brother chip,' once upon a time, on the morning of that day they stepped out for a stroll. After qualifying their water several times (Sayre always insisted that the water produced symptoms of cholera when taken clear), they entered a church whose doors stood invitingly open. The services proved to be in German. Listening a while with great attention, they departed. Soon Sayre's companion, turning to him, asked, gravely, 'I say, Sayre, what was that man's text?' 'Text! why, German text of course!' said Sayre, quietly."

FROM the interior of the Empire State come four or five right good stories:

"A few years since there lived in our village a waggish old blacksmith, familiarly known as Doctor Garland; though how he ever came by the title I never could clearly understand, unless he received it in consideration of his frequent Latin quotations, which he used on all occasions, and with about as much knowledge of their meaning as a Hottentot would of Spanish. A few days after the Presidential canvass of 1852 he met Squire B—— in the street, when the following colloquy ensued:

"DR. GARLAND. 'Well, Squire, what news of the election?'

"SQUIRE B——. 'Pierce is elected, beyond a doubt.'

"DR. GARLAND. 'Magnum bonum!'

"SQUIRE B——. 'What do you mean by that, Doctor?'

"DR. GARLAND. 'God is great!'

"A NEIGHBOR of mine missed corn from his garner, and his suspicions rested upon a reckless fellow whom every body called 'Sam.' The corn was kept in a chamber over the kitchen, adjoining the wood-house, toward which the chamber was left open and accessible by a ladder. The victim of this midnight 'theffery,' as another neighbor calls it, determined to satisfy himself concerning the identity of the thief, made a temporary bed upon the kitchen floor and lay down to watch. About the hour when 'church-yards yawn' he was aroused from a partial slumber by the rattling of the ears of corn overhead, when he suddenly called out at the top of his voice,

"'Sam!'

"'Hello!' responded the thief, taken entirely off his guard by this sudden call.

"'Don't take more than a bushel!'

"'Then I shall have to pour it out; for I've got two in the bag already!'

"PASSING through a small village in Madison County, New York, where Dutchmen 'most do congregate,' the mail-coach made a halt for breakfast. While the meal was in course of preparation I amused myself in reading the various advertisements upon the bar-room walls, among which was the following, verbatim et literatim:

"'dake notis.

Dis is do giv notis dat it ish a sdray big at mi hous de oner vil blesse gum an cal.

"'Iians quakenbus'

"I requested the privilege from the landlord, himself a Dutchman, of taking it with me; but he good-naturedly declined, saying 'It wash de only lithera-ry courosity he had in de housh!' so I had to content myself with a copy.

"DOCTOR WHITE, once a resident of our village, who, many years since, perished in the snows of the Western prairies, was noted as much for his eccentricities as for his skill in medicine and surgery. He was once returning, on horseback, from a visit to a patient, when he was overtaken on the road by a townsman, also mounted, who informed him that he was on his way to see him for the purpose of getting rid of a 'raging tooth' with which he was troubled.

"A malicious twinkle lighted the Doctor's eye, for he had long owed the sufferer a grudge, and here was an opportunity to 'feed it fat.' Directing him to ride alongside, he commenced an examination of the offending member, feeling around it with no very tender finger, and lancing the gum, while both still kept their horses' backs.

"The preliminaries concluded, he drew out his turnkey, an old-school, vicious-looking instrument, and fitted it carefully to the tooth. Charging the patient to 'hold hard,' he drove his spurs into his horse, which, with a sudden bound, galloped off, almost dragging the victim from his saddle, the Doctor triumphantly flourishing the bloody fang, firmly grasped in the jaws of the turnkey.

"The patient was afterward heard to say that he had no desire to have another tooth drawn by horse-power!"

Fashions for January.

WE have selected from among the most choice modes a BALL COSTUME that, by its novelty, will elicit the admiration of the gayer portions of our lady readers during the present season of festivity. This costume may be made of any light textures or of taffeta. The corsage is cut straight across the shoulders, and is formed by reversed plaits graduated to fashion the shape, being very narrow at the waist, from which they widen until lost in the drapery of the skirt. The sleeves, similarly plaited, are cut square below, and are open entirely to the shoulders, allowing a very short lace under-sleeve or band above to be seen. The points of the openings are adorned by neat clusters of the foliage and flower of the purple-streaked and pink convolvulus. The upper skirt is festooned in four sweeps of drapery, the front one being the highest, while the back—in one large curve—almost seems to form a train. The several places where it is looped up are marked by flowers, to match the sleeves, but in larger clusters. When the dress is made of taffeta a cable cord can be twined on the top of the dress, so as to form circular loops—one in the front face of each plait—in the centre of which loop may be placed a drop tassel, now so much in favor; and if preferred, the flowers may give place to ties of cord, with tasseled ends, at each point instead; a heavier girdle of the same, in this case, should be twice very loosely brought round the waist and carelessly tied, with long ends.

Under-sleeves to match this costume may be easily fashioned by adopting the full flowing form, slashing it up to the elbow, and placing at the point of separation very small bunches of flowers, or ribbon ties to correspond. Round the corners, and let the border have a transparent run through.

The set of UNDER-SLEEVES above represented is made of Brussels net, laid on large and smaller lozenges alternately, and edged with black lace on one side and white lace on the other. The wrist is bouillonnée. A tie of striped ribbon is placed at the neck.

We have seen some beautiful COLLARS resembling the medallion, which were made by applying appropriate flowers to small octagons of fine muslin, and joining them by a narrow insertion, while a point lace ruffled the border. By employing cast-off embroideries for this purpose a lady may find agreeable pastime.

We might describe a promenade toilet which was novel. It had a Pompadour corsage. Sleeves widening, but not very full, and round waist. The neck and sleeves, which were cut open and square across the elbows, were bordered by fluted bands of the material of the dress. There were six flounces, every alternate one fluted, the intermediate ones plain. A wide ribbon, with a tie and long ends, fell from the waist.

Another mode, which may be to the taste of some, although it does not strike us as at all becoming, was a street dress made with a flap or tail to the corsage. This starts almost the width of the back, and narrows till it is cut square off—not unlike the tail of a gentleman's dress-coat, if it was cut off square about nine inches from the waist. It is not divided through the middle. In front it has two square flaps, but only about five inches deep. The sleeves are capped with squares cut out to match the design of the corsage.

RIBBONS are used very extensively as ornaments upon every place where there is any possible pretext for placing them—under-sleeves are profuse of them—and as ornaments for the waist they are very much in vogue, tied in a bow, with long streamers falling from the middle of the waist. Broché and striped taffetas are among the most recherché styles. There are a great variety of brandebourgs and fancy drop tassels, some with three chenille pendants dropping from a ball button are very neat in appearance. Plaited pipings, or cord, placed across the front of the corsage, à la militaire, and finished by drop tassels at the ends, are also much affected.

FURS.—Being in the midst of the season for these luxurious articles of apparel, we may be expected to make some mention of them. This we would have done earlier had there been any very especial novelty to note. As a general thing they remain as they were, or with but trifling modifications, changes in their adjuncts not being made so capriciously as in other articles of the toilet. We may state that the mink is still the most widely in use, although of course the royal sables are supreme, so far as the haut ton of society is concerned. Full capes are worn somewhat larger than heretofore; but the style known as half-capes will take the lead, being more within the reach of the great masses of the people. Victorines and tippets are comparatively ignored. Muffs have no changes to mention made in them. They continue to be ornamented, as heretofore, with cord and tassels, although some ladies prefer—chiefly to differ from the mass—having them with bows of taffeta instead.

COOS AND THE MAGALLOWAY.

VALLEY OF THE ANDROSCOGGIN.

THE tourist who has in summer time stood upon the top of Mount Washington can not forget the view which stretches away to the northern horizon. Immediately below him winds the Androscoggin; near it coils the Grand Trunk Railroad; and beyond rise the successive peaks of mountains, some bald and glittering in the sun, and others clothed in deep foliage, until they become blue and shadowy in the distance. The Percy range lifts its snow-white tops toward the northwest; and beyond them the green Monadnock guards the west bank of the Connecticut. In the northeast the mountains of Northern Maine are seen, with the naked top of Escohos on their left; while the ragged spurs of Camel's Rump rise directly at the north, higher even than those shattered crags which form the jaws of Dixville Notch. Lifting up against the northern horizon, blue and misty, stretching eastward and westward, are the peaks of the Canadian Highlands—that wind-swept range which forms the boundary between the United States and Canada. Sections of the Connecticut valley on the west, and the valleys of the Androscoggin and Magalloway on the east, appear between the mountains; while, sparkling like mirrors set in the deep green of the forests, the Umbagog chain of lakes repose far up in their wood-encircled basin.

Over nearly the whole of this broad and wild region is thrown the gloomy mantle of the forest. A few farms and villages are visible near by, and then comes the dense and unbroken wilderness. Who that has gazed upon this wild panorama has not desired to penetrate the secrets of those gloomy solitudes, or conjectured what legends peopled those gorges and ravines, or what deeds of adventure those dusky valleys might reveal?

Lancaster, the shire town of the famous County of Coos, in New Hampshire, was the starting-point of our party. This charming town is one hundred and eighty-five miles from Boston by railroad and stage, and is at the outlet of one of those streams which rise among the White Mountains and flow westward into the Connecticut. The village is spread out upon those broad meadows which even here border that noble stream. A broad and shaded street, intersected by a few cross avenues, rows of neat cottages with a few elegant residences, three churches, an academy, a court-house, a jail, three hotels, one of which is very large and elegant, with stores, shops, and a bank, make up the village.

On a cloudy morning in September the long two-horse wagon was drawn up in front of the Lancaster House. Mount Washington was capped, and slight drops came down slowly through the humid air. It was circus day in the shire town. Joe Pentland was coming, and all was bustle and excitement. Already strange-looking vehicles, loaded with passengers, were driving in from the adjacent country. A crowd of the curious had gathered upon the piazza of the hotel as we came down, in thick boots, gray pants, red flannel shirts, and slouched hats.

Here was the fellow who had come, with his wife and children, twenty miles to see the circus. He had left his "burned-piece" just in the nick of time, and his oats in the stook, and some stone wall which he was in a hurry to build, and his house that was to be shingled anew, and was bent on seeing "them chaps" ride six horses, and laying up a store of clown's jokes. He wore his best blue coat and gray pants, and high collar, and boots rubbed with tallow, and had brought with him his dinner and provender for his horse. Already he had invested in a stick of candy, and stood surveying our wagon with that cool, thin, sharp visage which is the type of a thorough-bred Yankee, at whom the whole world laughs, but whose owner outwits the whole world.

Near by stood quite a different individual, whose off-hand manner, easy motion, erect figure, and confident eye showed him to be a man of the world. He was the proprietor of a meadow farm, and lived in the same large house which his grandfather had built in the early days of Coos. He had been a member of the Legislature; owned the eighth of a township, from which he took lumber to the markets below; and that very morning had ridden over to the village, behind a spanking black colt, in a new Concord wagon. You may some day see him dash up to the Crawford House with a span of bays which he is breaking, dine, talk a few moments with Joe Gibbs, light a cigar, crack his whip, and roll away again. He is a type of the young men who are seen in all this upper country.

We were all seated in the wagon. There were two barrels of pilot bread and half a barrel of pork. There was a Champagne basket, in which was a medley of articles. There were fry-pans and kettles, a huge coffee-pot and a bag of sugar. There was a tent, a tripod, a compass, and a transit. There were guns, pistols, powder-flasks, and long knives. In short, we were completely prepared for a month's camping in the woods. The stars and stripes—an old tattered flag, which had seen several expeditions of this kind—waved from a corner of the wagon, and all was ready.

"All ready!" called out the Colonel, the leader of the expedition, as he climbed into the wagon. Dan drew up the reins, flourished the whip, and we rolled slowly away. Three cheers burst spontaneously from the crowd as we drove off, bright eyes and smiling faces appeared at the windows, occasionally a white handkerchief waved an adieu, and the village was behind us.

Onward we went up the Connecticut. First came Northumberland, then Stratford, and at last, in the dusk of the evening, Colebrook, forty miles from Lancaster. Cheerily the lights of the little village shone as we rose over the hill and brought them into view. Right merrily, and with a prodigious clatter of wheels, did we drive up to the door of the only tavern.

A dozen individuals or so stepped out of the two stores and the tavern to inspect the new arrival, and gathered curiously about the wagon. Among them we were gratified to meet again our old friend, "The Squire," whose acquaintance we had made on the Umbagog years ago. His locks were whiter than when we had seen him, his voice slightly more tremulous as he gave us his hand, but he was still vigorous in mind and body, active and vigilant in business as when he first pioneered his way to this region of mountains. The Squire was a native-born gentleman, well educated, and a splendid specimen of an old mountaineer and lumberman. After supper we talked long before the wood fire. Captain Jones had come in; he was anxious to know about the Atlantic cable, and his surprise was unbounded when he learned that it was not an inch in diameter. Jim Sturtevant protested that he had seen trout in the Magalloway which would bite it off the first time. Bill Wright, "an old true-blue Isaac Hill Democrat," gave it as his opinion that it was a Federal trick to bind this country to England.

"I go agin' havin' any thing to dew with them British," persisted Bill.

Enter Major Eleazer Archibald. A chair for Major Archibald; and Major Archibald saluted each individual patronizingly. The Major proceeded to rub his hands before the fire and to assert, with caution and dignity, that there had been some prospect of rain; and then advanced the opinion that the nights would begin to grow cool before the end of September. Assented to by the whole company. The Major soon struck upon the universal theme of politics, and after descanting oracularly upon the tariff, Kansas, Cuba, and the whole list of topics, he came to the question of the removal of the shire town of Coos county from Lancaster. Here a fierce dispute arose between him and the Colonel, waxing warmer and warmer, until Bill Wright broke off the discussion by declaring that he was "agin' havin' any county seat at all."

"No county seat?" vociferated the Major.

"None at all," reiterated Bill; "courts are a humbug, got up to feed a lazy set of lawyers and cheat us poor devils."

The Major was commencing an argument with Bill on the propriety of courts of justice, when the Squire lighted his pipe, which he had been filling, rose, and wishing us a pleasant trip, walked out. We accompanied him along the short street of the now silent little hamlet. The lights in the two stores were blown out, and the loungers had scattered. Echoing musically upon the air came the murmur of the Connecticut and its more noisy tributaries, while as we looked out the giant hills, shooting far up into the starry sky, stood grimly, like mighty and silent Titans, sentinels of the night.

Never was a lovelier morning than that upon which we started to cross over the ridge of land which separates the Connecticut from the Umbagog. Our route lay in a southeasterly direction: first, up the valley of a small stream, called the Mohawk; then through a gap in the mountain ridge, which is only less famous than the White Mountain Notch because more remote from traveled routes; thence down the opposite slope to the valley of the Androscoggin and the basin of Lake Umbagog.

Now the road wound along the valley; now it coursed along the sides and over the very tops of high hills, from which we looked down upon farms, and around upon the crowded groups of mountains clothed with the magnificent foliage of autumn. The road becomes rougher, the farms disappear; we plunge down, down into a deep ravine through which foams a torrent. A few strokes of the axe repair the trembling pole bridge, and we rattle across it; up we clamber on the other side, over rocks, roots of trees, and stumps; down again and up again. The forest becomes dense and gloomy, and the branches interlock over our heads. We emerge into a little meadow, and before us suddenly stand the shattered and ragged walls of Dixville Notch.

Not more than a hundred feet in width, the walls of mica slate rise to the height of a thousand feet on either side, and overhang the path like gloomy and broken battlements. The frosts and storms, in their action of ages, have chipped these dark walls into all fantastical shapes—sometimes like the massive angles of some impregnable fortress—sometimes leaving ragged columns like the ruins of old towers. The path, just wide enough for one wagon-track, is hewn into the side of the chasm. On one side rises the threatening cliff, while below yawns the gulf.

Dan gave the Colonel the reins, leaving him to drive through; while the rest of us dismounted. Blowing a tin horn which we carried—the same which afterward disturbed the solitudes among the crags of the Canadian highlands—it gave out a blast like a war-trumpet; then dying away a moment, as if concealed among the broken rocks, it leaped out in a thousand commingling tones, clashing, contending, echoing, until they died away in varying cadences of melody. We discharged our fowling-piece at an eagle hovering over a cliff, when from behind every rock came a discharge as if guerrillas were hidden there. Altogether this notch is a most remarkable natural curiosity, rarely seen by tourists, never by the languid summerers on the luxurious couches of the Glen House or the Profile House, but only by those who are ready to diet a week on salt pork—to be shaken beyond the reach of dyspepsia over roads rougher than the passage down Ararat—or to face swarms of black flies and mosquitoes.

The sun rose brilliantly, and a sky of cloudless blue hung over the mountains and forests, before the large batteau had swung from the shore above Erroll Falls, and turned its prow up the Androscoggin. The barrels and boxes and bags and packs and baskets were piled into the elegant craft, and from the prow floated the old tattered flag. In the stern, with paddle in hand, sat the Colonel. At the oars sat two of our party—a round, portly, muscular fellow, and a slender, but nervous and active, native of Coos. The narrator found a seat in the bow; while at other convenient places were stowed the mail-carrier for the Magalloway settlement—a sharp-visaged frontiersman—and a still smaller, but keen-eyed and wiry hunter, who was bound for Parmachene Lake, to spend three months in trapping.

Dan stood upon the bank near his horses and wagon as we were ready to push off.

"Yes, Sir," said Dan, "I should like to go on with ye." But just then his horses started, the batteau swung into the dark stream, the oars dipped, the wheels of Dan's wagon rattled across the rough bridge, a blast from the tin horn echoed along the shore, and we glided merrily up the Androscoggin.

Durkee's Landing, on the Magalloway, was the first point made. This Magalloway settlement, of about thirty families, is the last on the borders of Maine and New Hampshire, lying along the Magalloway River for about eight miles. No road connects it with the rest of the world, but the only avenue is the river and the Umbagog Lake. The river, starting in the Canadian highlands, is nearly a hundred miles in length; and the meadows which border it at this point are broad and very fertile. Loading our baggage upon a hay-cart, and sending it forward, the company amused themselves during the heat of the day by smoking their pipes under the awning of the rough wood-shed, telling stories, shooting the rifle, and collecting from Durkee information respecting the region.

Toward sunset we started for a walk of eight miles—to Captain Wilson's, the last house on the frontier. It was hot and sultry, and we sweltered along under the weight of our packs, guns, and axes. The long shadows came on speedily, and soon the sun, after resting a moment in a gorge of the mountains, sunk amidst a flood of golden light, leaving us to darkness and swarms of mosquitoes.

The woods through which the road led was musical with their hum. If we stopped a moment, myriads of the blood-thirsty wretches assailed us, ensconcing themselves in our hair and necks, until some tough-billed fellow would bore through our shirts and transfix our backs. As a last resort we lit our pipes, after which the whole swarm, evidently becoming delirious under the influence of tobacco-smoke, screeched with indignation, but kept aloof. In four miles we began to apprehend something of the pleasures of a summer tour in the backwoods, or, at least, that part of it which consists of traveling on foot over rocks and among stumps with packs lashed to our backs. Walking brought perspiration; perspiration produced thirst; thirst, heat, and fatigue combined produced faintness. There were stumblings against rocks; there were splashings through water and mud; there were imprecations on the whole race of mosquitoes; there were remarks deprecatory of the general nature of hot weather; and mutterings about the length of miles on the Magalloway River.

"What's that?" said John, resting a moment against an old stub.

We heard the sound of wheels echoing into the woods, and presently a horse and wagon came slowly and noisily on through the darkness.

"How far to Captain Wilson's?" all inquired at once.

"Are you goin' to Cap'n Wilson's?" returned the driver.

It was Captain Wilson's wagon sent out to meet us.

"Hawcum, for this is the best goin' you'll have," said the driver, and the wagon jolted on.

We emerged into open land, passed one or two cottages, then a school-house in which was a cheerful light: then the roar of a cataract fell upon our ears: we crossed a bridge hung above the foam, went up a gentle slope, and were at the door of Captain Wilson, the last settler on the frontier.

The Captain was a native of the vicinity of Portland, and was allured to this region just in the dawn of the great Eastern land speculation. He came to this spot by the Escobos Falls, surrounded on all sides by lofty mountains, twenty-five years ago, and settled in the expectation that the country would become populous, and consequently bring him wealth. But he has lived here twenty-five years, and still finds himself on the frontier, with no settler beyond him nearer than the Megantic Lake in Canada. He has led the life of a woodsman, a farmer, a surveyor, and an explorer. Many are the adventures he has met in this wild region. Often has he coursed through the trackless woods, between his house and Quebec, camping on a winter's night under the shelter of a few fir boughs, or living for days on moose meat. Time and exposure have now bowed his form, and furrowed his brow, and silvered his hair; but he is still active and enterprising, and enthusiastic in regard to the development and prosperity of this region where he has spent his life. He has been a member of the Maine Legislature, has a respectable law library, and is the Justice of the Peace and the legal adviser of the whole settlement.

We now prepared for the woods. A party of eleven were collected, consisting, in addition to that already mentioned, of the Captain and six experienced woodsmen. The object was an exploration and re-marking of lines. The party divided, and six started through the woods on a straight line, and five followed up the river in boats, carrying the stores. The two squads filed slowly into the woods at two different points, and each disappeared.

Two days the boats sped up the Magalloway, between the silent banks overhung with fir, pine, birch, and maple. The river winds among the mountains in all directions. The Rio Grande is not more crooked. Over the tops of the trees bald mountains are constantly seen, but otherwise nothing relieves the monotonous pathway, excepting where a crane soars clumsily into the air, or a flock of ducks start up ahead, or we discover where a moose has just scrambled up the soft bank, or when a fugitive trout is taken as we drop our hook into the water.

At night of the second day we encamped at the mouth of the Magalloway. Finding a level spot near the bank of the river, at the mouth of a little brook which came over the hill the tent was pitched. Soon the fir boughs were spread down for the bed, and a big fire blazed in front. We took an abundance of trout, some of them weighing nearly four pounds, and that night there was a banquet of roasted trout and frizzled pork, while stories were told around the camp fire.

When morning dawned the rain was coming down in torrents. All through the day it poured constantly. The wind rose and swept over the forest with a continuous roar. Clouds hurried swiftly through the heavens, and the old trees writhed and groaned as their tops bowed and swayed together. It was that terrific storm which swept over the North about the middle of September of that year.

As night again came on the Magalloway rose wildly within its banks and lifted our boat from its moorings. The little brook became a torrent, and roared close by our tent. The water streamed through our cloth roof. Settling down to sleep as best we might, we heard the excited Magalloway lashing its banks and the roar of the winds, while occasionally the dull, heavy sound of a falling tree announced the mastery of the gale. Hark! there was a crash, and an old dry tree plunged into the whirling water.

"Do you hear that noise?" said one of the men, starting up suddenly from under his blanket, and turning his ear up to catch the sound. His quick sense had detected the sound of a human voice mingled with the howling of the storm and the creaking of the old forest trees.

"That was a man's voice, sure," said he, starting up to his feet.

Again it was heard, like a long, low, tremulous halloo, and answered promptly by the woodsman. Again fainter, and again answered. The woodsman listened long, but not catching the sound again, at last slowly rolled himself in his blanket.

"A wet night they'll have of it!—most likely somebody from Joe York's camp," muttered the other woodsman, and both were still again.

How much are we creatures of education and habit! To us few things could have been more startling than the weird tones which in that solitude were detected in the howlings of the storm. But the hunters had camped too many times on the snow, and too often following the moose up that valley had been overtaken by night in the dead of winter, to attach much importance to the occurrence. So they slept. Black as Erebus was the night; and as the fire, hissing and spluttering, threw its flickering light out into the darkness, making the spectral shadows of the huge trees dance to the music of the gale, we slept the sleep of neophyte woodsmen.

Not long after the sun had come out and the clouds scattered, an elderly man—a woodsman—came to the camp. He was drenched with water shaken from the bushes, and wore an anxious face. Two of his sons, he said, had started from a camp a few miles above to search in the woods for a "logging chance," and had not returned. We told him of the sounds we had heard in the night. He raised his gun and discharged it; then listened a moment; but hearing nothing, walked slowly into the forest. A few hours later voices were heard in the woods, and Captain Wilson, with another of the men, arrived at the camp, having started from the other party the day before. Being caught by the storm, they had found quarters in the woods overnight, and had been twenty-three hours without food. Toward night three more of the party, who had gone in with the stores, arrived. They also slept out in the storm under a little covering of birch bark.

Another day brought three of us—the rest having gone in with stores—to the "carry" at Parmachene Falls. The boat was taken out of the water, yokes hewn out with the axes, and carried by the rapids. Imagine the delights of a "carry!" A path led by the falls, but across it were big logs blown down in some hurricane, and it wound up the sides of hills and through tangled thickets.

Even here the lumbermen have penetrated, and at these falls have built a dam to facilitate the running of logs down the river. At a lumberman's camp near by—a unique specimen of architecture—we found lodging overnight. These camps are built entirely of logs, roofed with shingles rived from the pine-trees. They have one room, which is the cook-room, sleeping-room, and lounging-room; a large fire in the centre, from which the smoke escapes through a hole in the roof; a bunk on one side for sleeping, and a rude table made of split shingles at one end. A barn of similar architecture stands near. Here the lumbermen coming up from the settlements live during the long months of these Northern winters, going out in the morning as soon as it is light, cutting the logs and drawing them upon the ice of the river, to await the spring freshet which is to float them down, and not returning until dark. At night, after supper, pipe-smoking, and story-telling, they turn into their bunks. When the ice clears out of the river all hands commence driving the logs down the stream, until, through the tortuous channel of the Magalloway and Androscoggin, they arrive at Bath, where they are cut into boards and distributed to Boston, New York, and other ports, ultimately to line the palaces of Fifth Avenue or the residences on Brooklyn Heights.

The little skiff launched, the stores loaded into it, bringing it down to the water's edge by the slow and sturdy stroke of the paddle, the party followed up the Magalloway and swung out into Parmachene Lake, beyond reach even of the lumbermen, and opening to a region undisturbed save by the hunter.

Parmachene is a charmingly wild sheet of water, four or five miles in length, and one or two miles wide. As the little skiff dashed over the wave a solitary hunter's camp on the north side was the only evidence that man had ever trod its shores. First forest-covered hills, and then more distant and more lofty blue mountains lifted their tops all around us, wild and precipitous. This is a famous hunting-place, and is the resort of the woodsmen down the river as well as of the Indians.

Again the tent was pitched at "Little Boy's Falls"—three miles up a stream which enters the Parmachene, which is still called the Magalloway. Here we remained two days, waiting for the arrival of two of the other party, who were coming for provisions. They having arrived, three of us started early one morning for a walk of ten miles through the woods, following only the directions of the compass, to join our friends, who had been all this while sojourning in the depths of the wilderness.

Nay Bennett led the way—a voluble, jolly woodsman, with a face, written all over with humor, protruding under the narrow rim of an old felt hat, with the tin trumpet slung under his arm, thirty pounds of provisions lashed to his back, and a hatchet in his hands. Then we followed, with only our blanket, gun, and ammunition. Behind came Linnell—a woodsman as quiet as Nay was voluble—one of the best hunters on the Magalloway, his cautious eye constantly out noting the forest trees, the brooks, and the elevations, and occasionally giving advice to Nay as to the direction to be taken. Both had trapped and followed moose through these wilds, and kept their course in the woods with as much ease as one bred in the city finds his way along the avenues and squares. Up and down heights, through snarled thickets of undergrowth, along mossy swamps, darkened by the boughs of the fir, we paced steadily. Some time after the sun had passed the meridian all three were lying upon the leaves, resting at the foot of a steep hill before ascending.

"There's thunder, and we shall get wet," said Linnell, quietly getting up, lashing his pack, and starting.

"It'll make it very pleasant for us," replied Nay, jumping up, looking at his pocket-compass, and giving a blast on his trumpet.

There had not been a cloud in the sky; but as we came over the height the gray and bald top of Cani-

PARMACHENE LAKE.

ON CAMEL'S RUMP.

el's Rump stood up right before us, and beyond it hung the cloud.

"That makes out to be Camel's Rump," said Nay.

Our course lay across the northern spurs of the mountain. We hurried on, the thunder muttering louder every instant, and occasionally the wind swaying the forest. At last, far up on the mountain spur, whence we looked down upon miles of dark forests and illimitable ranges of mountain peaks, the charged cloud enveloped the height and broke upon us. We had never been in a thunder-storm before; but here it was all around us. Now a tree was twisted from its slight rooting and hurled headlong down the steep. Now another was shivered by the bolt as the thunder bellowed around us.

"T makes it very pleasant for us," said Nay, as we crouched under the leaning trunk of an old tree, endeavoring to get clear of the drenching torrents of rain.

We thought Nay's assertion was to be taken in inversion, and then and there so declared. So dense was the cloud that the lightning glared as in the deeper twilight. When the violence of the storm had passed over the rain still continued, and the only alternative was to advance. It was the same succession of gulches, gaps, and thick masses of witch-hazel bushes. Nay occasionally looked at his compass, took the direction, and went straight on, whether the way led over the top of a dizzy and tottering cliff or down the cavernous gulch.

After clambering up to the top of one of these spurs we were upon an immense bald and naked rock, which seemed to hang like a great excrescence upon the mountain side. The giant peak above us was wrapped in cloud, and far northward, westward, and eastward other summits pillared the vapory roof. All stood gazing down into the shadowy valleys, hundreds of feet below, arrested, seemingly, by the wild and solitary grandeur of the view. Our attention was attracted by the report of a pistol, coming dull upon the ear, as if from a long-distant height. Another, and then another, followed, more distinctly, and our own fowling-piece answered back. We took the direction of the sound, and started. Night was rapidly approaching. We stood at last at the base of an almost inaccessible steep.

"That's the way," said Nay, consulting his compass and pointing up among the jutting rocks.

"Can't go over that to-night," we protested, now thoroughly tired out.

"Give me your gun and take my hatchet," replied Nay; and we started again, dragging ourselves slowly and wearily up. Nay was creeping up in a fissure of an almost perpendicular rock, and we after him.

"T makes it very pleasant for us," he ejaculated, in long pauses, just as he got his head above the edge of a table-rock.

We were denying it, ab imo pectore, as we hung to a small shrub which had rooted to the rock, when Nay commenced a series of exclamations and expletives, not unfit for that occasion, but not appropriate to print, and closing with a blast on his horn, stood pointing to some fresh spots upon a tree which stood upon the edge of the precipice. We had struck the line which our friends had spotted as they passed along, and we hastened over the crags. It was not until the darkness had enveloped us that the sound of an axe was heard ahead. A shout—a response—three cheers from the whole party, and we bounded on toward the light of a fire.

"T makes it very pleasant for us," asserted Nay, throwing off his pack, sitting down upon a log, and giving a final blast upon his horn.

All hands were at work pitching the tent, some breaking wet fir boughs and shaking off the water, others leveling the ground and spreading the canvas, and others piling logs upon the fire. The rain still poured, but when the canvas was spread, the fir boughs laid down thick, the fire blazing up hot and drying our saturated clothes, things began to wear an air of comfort. The pork was frizzled upon the ends of long sticks, the hot tea poured into the tin dippers, the hard bread thrown out, and there was not a more jolly festival in the land than beneath that roof of canvas, high up on the mountain side, in the black night and the driving storm.

As we lay smoking our pipes, dry and comfortable in contrast with the dreary desolation outside our tent, the Colonel narrated the incidents of their trip; of the solitary and sombre glens, of the wild mountains, of the gentle streams, beautiful with none to admire; of the glorious sunrise and magnificent sunset, of ravishing landscapes, of the storm and the hurricane gamboling among the giant trees. They had ascended the highest peak of Camel's Rump and encamped overnight 4000 feet above the level of the sea, scaling, for miles, the steep precipices by the aid of lichens and shrubs, and coming down had discharged a small revolver from different peaks, hoping to attract our attention.

Then one of the woodsmen, who declared that they had "seen some proper bad pizgys" on the way, sang a song, one of the rude madrigals of the frontier. It was of a fair maid and a brave hunter, and an obstinate father. In vain the hunter busied himself in the woods and brought back rich burdens of furs. In vain he was the smartest chopper and best wrestler. So one night when the moon was full, John and the loving Julia started to cross the lake. But the obstinate father pursued, overtook them, was knocked overboard by John; after which himself and Julia, with great coolness and good judgment, embraced and jumped overboard also.

"T made it very pleasant for 'em," said Nay, as the song ended.

But half the company had already rolled themselves in their blankets, and the camp was still.

Another day of mingled hail, rain, and snow kept the party in camp; but the next morning, while the trees were white with frost and the ground slippery, they took their course for the Canada line. Late in the afternoon they came upon the ruins of an old birch-tree, which was long the corner between the States of Maine and New Hampshire. It was covered with hieroglyphics, the initials of names once famous in the two States who had visited the spot long years before. Twenty rods beyond stood an iron monument, now the real boundary between the United States and Canada, as well as the corner of the two States. The line established by the Ashburton treaty runs from peak to peak of those Highlands which separate the waters which flow into the St. Lawrence from those which flow into the Atlantic.

IN THREE DOMINIONS.

This was the end of the trip. Nay sat himself down in Canada, hugging the iron monument, with one foot in Maine and one in New Hampshire, but declared that he felt no better in three dominions than he did in one. Now, nearly eighty miles from Captain Wilson's by the route we had come, the party, cutting their names upon trees and rocks, turned back.

Northward were seen the lower hills which border the St. Lawrence, and southward mountains piled one upon another, and gorges and deep dark valleys. But all was wilderness. Up the mountain sides the bright tinge of autumn had commenced; but down in the deep valleys, where the dark and changeless fir covers the ground, hung dusky shadows, and as we looked down it seemed as if we could not see the bottom. No sable drapery can be more solemn than these forests of fir. They seem to make the silence more still and the solitude more funeral. Seen from the heights, it is as if a vast pall were wound around the base of the mountains and stretched down the narrow valleys.

From this summit could be seen the sources of five large streams of the continent. The tortuous St. Francis, and the Chaudière, whose banks the terrible expedition of Arnold made at once sad and glorious, find their way hence to the St. Lawrence. Hence the Connecticut starts southward, and within sight of one of the hills which our party ascended were to be seen at the same time the head waters of Dead River, which feeds the Kennebec, and the Magalloway, which feeds the Androscoggin.

Nay was ahead, and the whole party, on the second day of their return, were treading along wearily, following each other like Indians in trail. It had rained all day, and now, nearly dark, more than fifteen miles lay between us and the camp of the night before.

"That makes out to be Little Boy's Falls," said Nay, listening, then giving a blast on his trumpet.

The crack of a revolver answered down the river. "Crack" answered the Colonel's revolver. "Crack" again down the valley. "Crack"—"crack"—"crack"—"crack"—from both sides, until the woods echoed and shouts rang out from both parties, and Nay's trumpet doubled its volume, while the cataract chimed in with a voice like Minnehaha.

"Nay, do you remember the catamount we saw over yonder once?" said the Captain, as all were at their rude supper.

"I make out to," responded Nay, just as he was putting to his mouth a heavy piece of fried trout, "What a cussed Babylonian he was, Cap'n: 't made it very pleasant for us; didn't it, Cap'n?"

Forthwith Nay commenced with the story.

"The Cap'n and I were spot'n' a line one spring before the snow was off. 'Long in the afternoon we heard what we thought was a man's voice a long ways off in the woods. Wa'al, I hooted, and it hooted back. 'T kept comin' nearer and yelpin' louder. 'Look 'ere, Cap'n Wilson,' says I, 'I've been in the woods a good deal, but I never heard that sound before.' By'm-bye we set down on the snow to rest, and when we had got about twenty rods along the fellow gave such an ungodly screech as made my hair stand on end. Says I, 'Cap'n, that makes out to be a cussed Babylonian.' We had only an axe and a small shot-gun, not enough to make a dust in the eyes of the critter. 'Cap'n, didn't we take long steps?' After a while the critter lagged behind, and we heard him screech off in the woods. Wa'al, 't came night, 'nd we built a fire, 'nd made a camp, 'nd after a while got to sleep. I waked up some time in the night. The fust thing I see, when my eyes opened, was a couple of glaring balls right t'other side of the fire. There that cussed whelp set, on a log, not ten feet off, starin' right at us 'nd switchin' his tail jest like a cat afore she grabs a mouse. I didn't dare to start up the Cap'n, so I got up my shot-gun easy, and pintoed it right into his face 'n' eyes. I tell ye he was a savage-lookin' devil, 'nd I reckon he liked the looks o' me about as well as I did o' him. Purty soon he turned his head round one side, and seemed to look at somethin' else. Then he turned clear round, and curled down close to the log, and kept on switchin' his tail, and lookin' off in another direction.

All of a sudden, as quick as a wink, he bounded off into the darkness, and then there was such a yellin' as I never heard. The Cap'n screamed and jumped up, and began to hunt for his axe. 'Get your gun, Nay!' yells the Cap'n; 'the cussed thing is after us.' 'Keep still, Cap'n,' says I, 'he's after that lucive: I've been watchin' him for a half hour.' 'Twas a short fight, and the lucive had the worst of it. Away went the cussed Babylonian into the woods, with the lucive in his mouth, growlin' as he went. He had pounced right into him, and took him for his breakfast instead of the Cap'n or me. If ever I meet a Babylonian again, I'll tell him to wait till I send for a lucive."

When the party arrived at Cap'n Wilson's, a few days afterward, the little settlement seemed great to them, and when they made the beautiful town of Bethel, Maine, it appeared to them as Rome did to the dwellers on the banks of the Mincius.

The author, having arrived at home, walked into his hotel, gun in hand, wearing still his woodsman's dress, but the clerk was in doubt about accommodating him, and intimated that they were very full that night. All stared as he took his accustomed seat at the table, and one inquired if that was the "Lumbermen's Hotel." He walked down through the lighted street, in the evening, passing his most intimate friends unrecognized.

In the night dreams of the Magalloway haunted his sleep. He traveled alone through interminable woods, and camped at night in a howling storm. Then he was on Parmachene Lake, and the little skiff swamped and sunk down unfathomably, until at last he was going up Camel's Rump, in the thunder-storm. Suddenly he heard Nay iterate that "t made it very pleasant for us," and looked up. There was a catamount, having Nay's face, and with his trumpet hung to his neck, and his narrow-rimmed hat on his head. The Colonel was breaking great trout off from fir-trees, and spreading them down for a bed, and the rest of the party were coming over a rock in a boat. Suddenly the catamount showed his teeth, growled, and pounced upon Captain Wilson, who took a "lucive" from his pocket and gave him, which he swallowed at once and then growled more furiously than before. He seized his gun—such unearthly yells!—and he awoke in time to catch the last roll of the gong as it was announcing breakfast.

CIVILIZATION.

ODE ON THE BIRTHDAY OF CHARLES WESLEY.

I.

O ENGLAND, through thy lovely vales
And emerald hills how many now
In memory of the poet-priest
With rapt devotion bow!
Along the city's sounding street,
In cottage nooks, in lordly halls,

On village spire, and temple dome
 A still, sweet influence falls—
 For myriads whisper of the birth
 That gave another bard to Earth.

II.

Nor only there: from my own Land
 Full many a blessing o'er the wave
 Floats like an angel's wing to gild
 His cradle and his grave.
 Our Fanes have also felt his soul;
 Our forest-temples grand and dim,
 Filled with ecstatic worshippers,
 Have trembled to his hymn:
 Still seem they bowed with praise and prayer—
 The soul of Wesley lingers there!

III.

Well have the nations blessed the bards,
 And, gladdened by their ministerings,
 Their foreheads bound with holier wreaths
 Than ever shone on kings:
 Lo! Scio's old blind Glory crowned;
 And Dante diademed with fire
 Imperial by the large-eyed Times,
 And Byron's battle-lyre:
 No royal flag o'er them unfurled,
 Yet they are Emperors of the world!

IV.

If thus the Shapes that draw from Earth,
 The soul of song, are rulers made,
 How should the Heaven-invoking Ones
 By continents be arrayed?
 Not from Olympian groves their wreath!
 Go search Siloa's sacred bowers;
 On Zion's grander mountain walk
 And gather stateliest flowers—
These crown the souls that sing of HIM
 Who wandered there with cherubim.

V.

And such the crown that thou didst wear,
 Sweet singer by old Albion's wave!
 And Death himself could not destroy,
 But placed it on thy grave.
 How glorious its unfaded leaves
 Shall on thy pure white forehead bloom,
 When, with a hymn upon thy lips,
 Thou'lt glitter from the tomb,
 And, myriads joining in the lay,
 Soar to the choir of Heaven away!

HOLIDAYS IN COSTA RICA.

BY THOMAS FRANCIS MEAGHER.

VOLCANO OF TURRIALBA.

III.—SAN JOSÉ TO CARTAGO.

THE prevailing theme of the day with the Stump as well as the Pulpit—with the Editor as well as the Orator—is the superior civilization of the Nineteenth Century. Of this civilization, the United States, and England especially, are congratulated, from morning till night, on the fact of their being the highest exponents, while the Spanish-American communities are scornfully reproached, or contemptuously condoled with, for being the reverse.

Nor does the Spirit of the Age content itself with this. Acting on the presumption, that every community or nation, failing to come up to the Anglo-Saxon standard of political and social perfection, is gone to perdition unless something vigorous for its salvation is done, the world, nowadays, occasionally hears of cities being bombarded into commercial relations, and people being robbed for the good of their souls.

Were it less arrogant, the Spirit of the Age might be all the better instructed. Better instructed, it might be all the better behaved.

Fully comprehending those Spanish-American communities, it might become impressed with the fact, that there prevails in them a civilization which, in domestic goodness, in intelligence and graciousness, in religious sentiment, sobriety and honest industry, will favorably compare with that which in colder latitudes is so superlatively lauded. More than this. Without admitting the feasibility of there being various forms and phases of civilization—each determined by the character of the people who exhibit it, and of whose special interests, genius and resources, it is the natural development—the Spirit of the Age might be flattered in observing, throughout those disparaged communities, not a few of the customs, the mechanical appliances, the household comforts and political ideas, of which it claims the exclusive paternity. In Costa Rica for instance, as Señor Astaburuaga has written, agriculture has commenced to take that aspect which the best rules of science enable it to attain. The practical notions of cultivation—those prevailing among the Northern nations of Europe—are extending there with the assistance of the best agricultural implements, while those old practices, so detrimental to labor and the saving of time, are fast disappearing.

In less important particulars, also, the Spirit of the Age might be gratified in discovering, in the little Republic I speak of, its tastes, ingenuity, and judgment acknowledged. The lamp-posts of San José have been imported from England. This has already been stated. Germany, besides contributing to Costa Rica the engineering ability which has opened the best of her roads, has suggested to an adventurous Londoner the advantage of having, close to the Capital, a lager-bier reservoir of exhaustless capacity. The worms and caldrons of the National Distillery were made in New York, and the President's carriage, if I am not greatly mistaken, first tried its springs on the pavement of Broadway. Nor is France less conspicuously represented in this informal exposition of the artistic skill of the more highly civilized nations. She has introduced her dainty boots there, her smelling-bottles, gloves and pastilles, her thin wines, bonbons and sun-shades. She has given soldiers and uniforms to the Costa Rican army, and, to the traveling public of the country, the pattern of a Diligence which has been expensively copied.

The result is a vehicle, which, were it somewhat less rickety and gaudy, would resemble a Rockaway. Lavishly painted in red, black and yellow, a profusion of old rope, leather aprons, curtains and cushions—the latter all wrinkled and cracked—furnish, inside and out, the amusing contrivance. A mule and two horses—the mule in the middle—tug it along. The driver—a lively young fellow from the ruins of Copan—wears a braided gray jacket, a military sash of red silk, and a Panama hat rather rakishly set.

It was on the back seat of this diligence that Don Ramon and Don Francisco set out, one Sunday evening, from San José to the ancient city of Cartago. The drive was pleasantly exciting all the way through. There was the landscape, both sides of the road. There were the coffee-plantations, all in full blossom, looking as though there had been a fall of snow during the forenoon. There were banana-patches, fields of corn and sugar-cane, church-towers and Indian villages. There was the funeral procession of a child, the little corpse prettily dressed and decked with flowers, violins and flutes preceding it, women strewing the dusty road with violets, lilies and green branches, an old priest, in white embroidered stole and surplice, enveloped in the smoke of swinging censers, with closed eyes and bare head, borne along in a gilt sedan-chair behind the bier, and with his shriveled hand blessing it at times. There were bright green meadows veined with flashing streams—wave-like wooded hills seamed with red cart-roads—steep bridges built of lava-stone, the causeways roofed with burned tiles—bulky farm-houses half-buried in sweet rich foliage—the great lonely mountains of the Central Range dissolving in the mellowed sunlight miles away. Last of all, there was the crazy diligence itself, with its ups and downs, its mishaps and catastrophes, and the confusion, the merriment, the fright, the scandal and uproar it caused.

The first hill we came to, delayed it an hour. The mule thought it too much for the horses—the horses thought it too much for the mule. Between the three of them—after a violent wrangle—the report upon progress was dropped. Not an inch would they move. Not an inch—not for all the whipping and swearing the Guatemalan had the hand or the heart to bestow. The passengers had to get out. It came to that. Then it came to their putting a shoulder to the wheel—a frantic proceeding which well-nigh upset and demolished the coach. This difficulty surmounted, however, nothing afterward checked us. Away we went! Smooth or rough—up or down—precipice or plain—mud or boulders—away we went!

Never such cracking and rattling—never such foaming and flashing—never such frenzy has been seen. As we tore by, the road, catching the madness, broke into a riot. Old and young women rushed to the door-ways—screamed—convulsively chattered—in spasms, apparently, bade us an eternal farewell. Out from every gateway—out from openings in road-side fences—the scraggiest dogs pounced upon us with the avidity of wolves, and with an insane rapidity pursued us. At one place, a venerable Padre, in his capacious black cloak and convoluted black hat, with a dark-green gingham umbrella under his arm, retreated from the blinding cloud of dust in which we were whirled by, and, with eyes of greenish marble, in blank amazement stared at us, as though we were past redemption. Farther on, the diligence cut right through a squadron of mountaineers—scared the wits out of the plump little horses—dispersed them in the strangest pranks over the road—tumbled the riders—snapped the cruppers—in an instant giving rise to a scene of equestrianism, disorder and panic, which it would take the pencil of Rosa Bonheur to describe. In the midst of all this—in the midst of the routed, the flying, the capsized, the stunned, and the sprawling, the fearfulest snorting and the wildest hysterics—the diligence topped the hill of Quircôt; and, with a velocity that made every nerve jump, jingled and thundered down into the valley of Cartago. But, as we swept by the wreck and mischief we had caused, there broke a vision from the earth and clouds.

Reverentially vail your massive head, old Samuel, for the valley of Rasselas, in this, the valley of Cartago, in beauteousness and glory has been surpassed! The Spaniards of the Conquest, as Peter Heylin in his Mikrokosmos tells us, called Nicaragua the Paradise of Mohammed. This, indeed, might be called the Arcadia of the Poets.

Immediately below us was a broad lagoon, the waters of which in the receding sunshine seemed to throb, and along the margin of which the white crane—stately, composed, quick-eyed, graceful—stalked in search of food. Beyond the lagoon lay the potreros into which the valley is divided—oblong grazing-grounds of astonishing extent—all marked off with fences of coral-bean and wild pine-apple. Beyond the potreros were the low mountains of the Agua Caliente, so called from the tepid spring, which, a mile and a half from the city, bubbles up and overflows from a crevice of quartz and oxyhydrate of iron at their foot. The water of this spring is bitter and astringent. Frequenting by the distempered aristocracy of the neighborhood, it is found specially efficacious in cases of gout and rheumatism. The mountains of the Candellaria overlook those of the Agua Caliente. Beyond the Candellaria, the sapphire peaks of the great Andean chain itself, shadowy and indistinguishable almost, fling off the intercepting clouds, and, without a speck between them and the sun, assert their sovereignty.

No wonder that in such scenes as this—with verdure so vivid and exuberant at their feet—with streams, so vitalizing and refreshing, breaking the paths their swords laid open—with mountains, the towering types of their ambition, multiplying themselves around them, beyond them, and above them, still, as the adventurers ascended, lifting themselves still higher, and, with the cry of El Dorado echoing from every cave and crag, beckoning them sunward into regions yet more remote—no wonder that in such scenes as this the Crusaders of Castile, the Prætorians of Cortéz and Cordova, should have forgotten the grape-laden valleys of the Guadelete, the sea-washed ramparts and tower-protected mansions of old Cadiz, the rich arabesqued homesteads, the fields trickling with honey and webbed with silk, the saffron-sprinkled Sierras, the ripe Moorish beauties, the luxurious love-making and romancing of Andalusia, the pictorial pride of Spain. Even now—even still—spots of earth like this seduce men from their ancestral homes, from kinsfolk they love and laws with which they spontaneously concur, and with their loveliness, their fruitfulness, their serenity and grandeur, reconcile them to the sacrifice they have made, and the isolation to which their foreign tongue and modes of thought for years condemn them.

As for the city of Cartago—the city itself—it is a dismal wreck. The streets are broader than those of San José, but they are lonelier, drowsier, colder. Scarcely a soul is seen in them any hour of the day. Now and then one meets an Egyptian figure lithely balancing a plenteous tinaja on a dauntless head—gliding noiselessly along—but that, for hours perhaps, is the only living object which relieves the sepulchral vacuity of the place. Hurlled about in every direction, monstrous boulders and masses of lava-stone, monuments of the terrible eruptions of the volcano that overlooks it, heighten the forlorn aspect it presents. Upward of three hundred years old, it has seen better days. It was the Royal Capital under the Spanish Crown, and Thomas Gage—a Great Briton who visited Central America in 1636, and who, in the quaint book he published of his travels, describes himself as the first Protestant who ever penetrated these parts—mentions that it had in his time many opulent citizens who traded directly with the Peninsula. The recollection of what it was in those days renders it haughty and sullen. Cartago is, in truth, a stupid aristocrat, out at the elbows and gone to the dogs. How the aristocrat lives, it is difficult to say. Beans and bananas abound in the vicinity, however, and broken-down Swells—Beau Brummell for instance—have been known to indulge in the pleasures of imagination and memory, and luxuriate on a crust in a garret, without a copper to sport with or a shred to their backs.

The Hotel we stopped at epitomized the City. It was comfortless, pretentious, windy, silicious and ruined. Entering by a long narrow passage—arched as well as paved—and mounting a trembling staircase at the back, the interior instantly appalls one with the lines and outlines of a haunted house. A gentleman from Baden-Baden kept it. A deserter from General Walker's landwehr, he went by the name of Don Carlos. Don Carlos was as jovial a scape-grace as the most curious student of human vagaries could possibly desire to fall in with. Without a dollar in the world, he started his Hotel, set the cards and dice shuffling and tossing in the bleakest room in it, and so kept the pot boiling, while he himself sank up to his ears, and above them, in debt. With an amazing vitality, the establishment prolonged its existence for weeks upon nothing. It exploded, however, one day we were there. Missing the scape-grace, we asked the Dutch waiter—an emaciated creature with a crutch and an ulcerated leg—where Don Carlos was?

"Ah! he Don Carlos no more," the slender cripple replied. "Dey put him in prison for debt—Hotel gone to de Debil—dere's nuttin to pay."

Don Ramon and Don Francisco thought otherwise—thought there was the Devil to pay—and so, bundling up their papers, soiled linen, pencils and paint-brushes, their note-books, geological specimens and flasks, came to the conclusion it was time to clear out.

But the saddest places have their kindling or their soothing memories—their epic glories—or those treasured legends, which, as the lingering rays of some expiring lamp, relieve from utter darkness the vestiges of a vanquished power. Cartago in her solitude and indigence is thus adorned. She has the loftier traditions which inflate with pride even an impoverished people. She has those gentler ones, which, flowing from a purer source, keep alive a generous faith, and in their lowliness direct the hearts of the poor to God. Of the latter is the one most dear to the people of Cartago. In a paper handed me by the venerable Anselmo Lorente, the Bishop of San José, the story is thus told:

The Legend of Our Lady of the Angels

"In the year of Our Lord, 1643, in a forest close by the ancient city of Cartago, there lived a simple woman, who, once going out to gather fire-wood, found an Image of a Lady on a stone in the neighborhood of her hut. The Image was of stone. This she carried to her hut, and, having placed it in an arch, returned to the forest. A second time she found an Image of a Lady on the stone, in the forest, in the neighborhood of her hut. Supposing there were two of them, she carried this Image, also, to the arch in which she had deposited the first. The good soul was astonished to find the first was gone. But when, for the third time, she approached the stone, and, a third time, found an Image of a Lady, precisely similar to the two she found before, and, having returned to her hut and found neither of those she had placed there in the arch, and the day being far spent, she became alarmed. Running to the Curate, Don Alonzo de Castro y Sandoval, she told him what had happened. This devout priest locked up the Image in a closet—the one that was found the third time—with the view, no doubt, of examining it dispassionately. But the Image instantly disappeared, and, a fourth time, was found on the stone, in the forest, in the neighborhood of the poor woman's hut. Conducted thence in solemn procession to the Parochial Church, it was deposited within the Sanctuary.

"The following day, the Associate Curate, having gone to visit it, found the Tabernacle vacant in which it had been placed. Searching once more for it, they found it, a fifth time, on the stone, in the neighborhood of the poor woman's hut, in the forest close by the city. Finally, a Church was specially built for it, and there it has ever since remained. In 1782, the Illustrious, Esteban Lorenzo de Tristan, Bishop of Nicaragua and Costa Rica, solemnly declared it the Special Patron of Cartago. The Illustrious, Don Augustin de Santa Cruz presented the pectoral of rich emeralds which adorns the golden tunic of the Image. Another Bishop consecrated it with Holy Oil, and ordered that it should be touched by none but anointed hands. Last of all, the Church, in which it reposes, was consecrated by the Illustrious, Don Anselmo Lorente, the actual Bishop of the Diocese, and was raised by him to the rank of a Basilica.

CHURCH OF OUR LADY OF THE ANGELS.

"These honors have been rendered the Image of Our Lady of the Angels—for so this wonderful Image has been called from time immemorial—in acknowledgment of the repeated miracles it has wrought."

Of those miracles, one of the most memorable was the sudden flight of eight hundred English Buccaneers, under the command of Captain Mansfeldt, or Mansfield, a devoted fellow-plunderer of Morgan, the Incendiary of the Isthmus and the Pirate of Panama, as the popular novelist would style him. These enterprising gentlemen, having landed on the Atlantic coast at Matina, had penetrated as far as Turrialba, when the Sergeant-Major, Don Alonzo de Bonilla, with a picquet and the Image of Our Lady of the Angels, marched out from Cartago to meet them. Descending into the valley at the foot of the volcano of the White Tower, they so terrified the Buccaneers, who were encamped there, that the latter at once took to their heels and ships. The rout was ascribed to the presence of the Image in the field, and the anniversary of the day on which it occurred has been ever since observed as a Votive Feast in the ancient city of Cartago.

The Church of Our Lady of the Angels is, far away, the prettiest and stanchest structure in the city. The huge boulders which encompass it, the vermillioned tiles and clusterings of rich foliage out of which it modestly emerges, heighten the effect of the Doric façade, the massive square tower with its tiara of gleaming bronze, the green zinc roof, the row of alabaster-hued pilasters which flank the great door-way, and the niches, to the right and left of this, which inclose in iron net-work a cohort of winged, frocked, and buskined Angels of boyish stature.

The High Altar of this Church is supremely grand. A lofty Tabernacle of cedar, lavishly gilt, rises over it to the height of thirty feet. Divided into two chambers, the lower one contains the Blessed Sacrament, the upper one the Image of Our Lady of the Angels. The architraves, projecting from the chambers, are supported by golden Cherubim. These figures are three feet high. From the dome, a golden image of the Angel Gabriel ascends, bearing in the left hand a pair of golden scales, and in the right a silver sword. The pillars and cross-beams of the Sanctuary, in the centre of which this superb altar stands, are painted in arabesque, and during the month of May, the month we visited it, they are hung with blue and white lace and net-work. The Church is exquisitely clean, and ever fragrant with frankincense and flowers. Señor M. Duran, an eloquent and studious lawyer, a native of New Granada, mentions in an interesting description he has published of Costa Rica, that there is an enormous box in this Church, in which the people deposit their offerings to the Image. At the end of every six months the box is opened, and the tribute it accumulates during this period, never falls short of $800. The money, thus collected, is devoted exclusively to the repairs and decorations of the Church.

Dull and desolate as it habitually is, there are two days, out of the seven, when Cartago wakes up. There is Sunday, when the Church-bells prove to distraction the metal they're made of, and the Señoras and Señoritas, with their graceful draperies of black and colored shawls, glide to and from the churches, and the militia of the District parade and drill all the forenoon in the Plaza, and the most reputable people, the Judiciary included, indulge in lotteries, vingt-un and draughts, in the widest and longest room of the Hotel, whenever any such institution contributes to the conveniences, the cheap dissipation, and, as in the case of Don Carlos, to the ups and downs, the brandy-smashes and bankruptcies, the convulsions and woes of Cartago. On Sunday evenings, moreover, the Band of the little garrison performs in front of the house in which the Governor of the Province resides. But the Thursdays are livelier, though, in the absence of the Band and the Bells, a native might say they were somewhat less musical. Thursdays are market-days in Cartago.

The Plaza—the massive white towers of the Parochial Church on one side—substantial one-storied houses, with projecting roofs and bowed-windows, on the other—the Cuartel and Governor's Audience-Hall in front, all glistening with whitewash, and close behind them, the volcano of Irazu, the sun flashing from its cloven forehead, and the snowy clouds gathering round it, as the Sicilian flocks crowded to the Cyclops—these are the outlines of the picture. It is a vivid blending of most of the contrasts of Tropical life with the majesty of nature.

The streets leading into the Plaza are thronged—thronged with carts and oxen, with mules and muleteers, with soldiers and wandering minstrels—thronged with booths and beggars, and with cripples who imporingly work out a fortune with their distorted bones. In the Plaza we have innumerable articles for sale, and, pictorially viewed, the gayest of groups. We have rainbow-colored silk-woven shawls from Guatemala, blankets, and brigand-like jackets with superfluous bright buttons and fringes. We have the cacao-nut in ox-hide bags, which barelegged sinewy fellows have carried up all the way from Matina, and drinking-cups, carved out of the Calabash-fruit with an exquisite nicety of touch and an elaborate richness of design. At other stalls we have English printed-calicoes, barèges, pen-knives, crockery-ware, scissors, smoothing-irons, scythes and razors. From the United States, I'm sorry to say, we have little or nothing. There are, to be sure, some American drillings. But that, for the present, with a few coils or sticks of Virginia tobacco, is all we have in the market. Cartago herself contributes hats—soft hats made of the fibre of the Century-plant—and gold-work, such as chains and armlets, Love-knots and votive baskets, the latter with the most tempting delicacy constructed and redundant with pearls—roseate, plump, lustrous pearls—from the Gulf of Nicoya. Then, of course, we have oranges, cocoa-nuts, sweet corn, bananas, zapotes, sweet lemons and granadillas, the most liquid and refreshing of fruits, edible palm-tops, which make the most piquant and delicious of salads, blackberries, the blackest and juiciest that ever purpled one's lips, and potatoes as mealy and toothsome as any Irish mouth could desire.

As for the groups and detached figures—filling up, though dispersed, through the picture—there are Señoras richly dressed, cooling their bare and glossy heads with the airiest sun-shades, accompanied by their criadas, who carry on their plump shining arms baskets for the purchases their mistresses make. At times you come across a German housewife, with leg-of-mutton sleeves and Leghorn bonnet. The mestizas—the women of the country—in very loose low-necked dresses of white or colored calico, with bare arms and feet, sit behind their serones of fruit and vegetables, behind their blocks of cheese and chancaca, the coarse brown sugar of the country, or behind a double row of bottles choked with guarapo, the fermented juice of the sugar-cane, and with accents as liquid and refreshing as the guarapo, and with a shy gracefulness if the passer-by happens to be a stranger, expatiate upon the merits of their merchandise, and press their varied commodities for sale.

Besides their very loose and low-necked dresses of white or colored calico, these winsome merchants sport the prettiest pert little hats, some made of straw, others of black, brown, or slate-colored felt. Most of them mount cockades of blue or red silk, and all of them fly, as though they were Recruiting-Sergeants, the most bewitching bright ribbons. They are perfect heart-breakers—those pert little hats!—and, to settle the business, the young women of Costa Rica are decidedly handsome. Their figures are full and round, their features regularly cut, their eyebrows richly penciled, and the well-developed head is set upon a neck which displays to the best advantage the pretty string of beads which few of them dispense with. Their complexion, generally speaking, suggests a conservé of cream and roses. The pure exhilarating air of the mountains, in the valleys and up the slopes of which two-thirds of the Costa Rican people have their homes, tones down the carnation richness of the Spanish blood, chastens, and with a pearly hue suffuses it. There are, to be sure, some brown, and yellowish, and bronzed, and mottled faces to be met with, and some cases of goître, but not enough to contradict what I've said, and make it the exception instead of the rule. The old women, however, even those approximating the climax of forty—an age, which, in these more temperate regions of ours serves only to mature the coloring and give dignity to the stature of womanhood—are the reverse of what they were in their youth. They are octogenarians at forty.

To what this premature overcasting of so much beauteousness and light may be owing, I leave the professors of ethnology, as well as the professors of pathology and the chemistry of common life, to determine. For my part, I own up to a vulgar impression, that if there were considerably less vegetables and esculent roots eaten, and considerably more of the poultry, the mutton and good beef of country consumed, the case would be different.

But however that be, it is time for us to wish good-by to the Señoras and the Señoritas, which, be they young or old, blooming or faded, it becomes us respectfully to do. This done, to the barefooted soldiers, with muskets and fixed-bayonets patrolling the market-place, let us give the salute. To the carreteros and arrieros, to the teamsters and mule-drivers, mingling with their mothers, their wives, their pretty daughters and handsome sweet-hearts, let us bid the national adios—adios Señores! Last of all, to the venerable Deacon of the Diocese—a very old and feeble man in faded red silk soutaine, with a pocket handkerchief of the largest size coiled about his head underneath his umbrageous hat, for the day is hot, though the clouds are mustering fast on Irazu—to the Deacon of the Diocese, as he wheezes along, and with his gold-knobbed stick shuffles through the crowd, receiving as he passes, from bent and uncovered heads, the edifying homage of the young and old, let us, too, with reverence for gray hairs and aged limbs, and for the filial love with which he is entitled the Father of his People, incline the head—and for the scene from which we now depart, heartily let us wish many and many a recurrence, each succeeding one still happier than the one preceding, in the market-place of old Cartago!

We had not been many hours in Costa Rica, before we heard of the volcano of Irazu, and the mischief and terror it had caused. How, in 1723, from the 16th of February until the 14th of March, it had rumbled with the rushing of subterranean rivers, as it were, and had opened its jaws and rolled forth billows of smoke. How the people, on the slopes and in the valleys far below, were stifed with its sulphureous exhalations, and how at night it whirled balls of fire aloft and sheeted the sky with flames, until it grew to be, for miles round, more fiercely bright than ever it was known to have been the hottest day at noon. How at one time, out of the boiling gulf, there rose a vapor, white as cotton and shaped like a bended bow, until, at the height of two lances above the crater, it took the shape of an enormous palm-leaf, which remained suspended in the air while one might say an Ave Maria, when it resumed its former shape, and, slowly descending, passed off and disappeared. How the rumblings of the volcano grew louder and louder, until they struck the bewildered ear with the force of ten thousand forges all at work, and the red-hot boulders and scoriae multiplied in volume, tearing asunder the jaws of the furnace as they gushed from them, until, at last, the waters of the rivers, the lakes and streams, were turned into seething mud, and the city of Cartago was strewn with burning dust, and churches and houses, uprooted from the palsied earth, lay scorched and blackened in utter ruin. How all this came to pass, over and over again we were told along the road. And when we got a peep at the Archives of the afflicted city, we found that the popular story was borne out in its minutest particulars by the official report of the Royal Governor, Diego de la Haya, which report bears date the 14th day of March, 1723.

Nor was this the first of the eruptions of Irazu. The voracious abscess has four mouths or craters. Inside one of them are oaks, so old as to lead to the conclusion, that two thousand years have elapsed since it was first opened. This, at all events, is the opinion of Dr. Carl Hoffman, of San José, whom Humboldt quotes in his account and descriptions of the volcanic phenomena of Central America. Another of these craters forms a lake which gives rise to the River Reventazon, the embouchure of which, according to Thomas Gage, was a commercial resort in 1636. The earthquakes, caused by the volcano, have been frequent and severe. There was one in 1756. There was another in 1822. Both of them overthrew the city. The last, of any consequence, occurred the 2d of September, 1841, when, according to the dispatch of Telesforo Peralta, the Governor of the Province, to the Supreme Chief of the Republic, fully one-third of the population of Cartago—at that time computed to be something over 17,000 souls—lay buried for hours under the wreck of the city.

"But wonderful to relate," exclaims Governor Peralta, "only sixteen were killed!"

Wonderful, we admit, but not at all incredible, when we reflect that the houses were only one story high, twelve feet in depth, and built of adobe, which doesn't take much to fly into dust.

Every house but one was demolished. Even this was considerably shaken. But it deserves to stand and for generations hold itself erect, for in the court-yard, in its revered and beautiful green age, the Parent Coffee-tree of Costa Rica, of which an outline appeared in the first of these papers, from the pencil of Ramon Paez, still puts forth its snow-white blossoms and soft exquisite perfume.

After the repeated warnings they have had, one would think it was full time for the Cartagenians to "up stakes" and be off. The more so, since that ferocious Cyclops overhead growls every now and then, and, sending forth an occasional puff or two, lets the world know that he is smoking something else besides the Pipe of Peace.

"Nevertheless," as Señor Peralta writes, "such is the attachment which the people of Cartago have for their own soil, that they bear with patience all these evils, and, as often as it is thrown down, out of its ruins rebuild their beloved city."

The same is true of the villages and towns at the foot, and up the slopes of Vesuvius. It is specially true of the town of Torre del Greco, the inhabitants of which, in their attachment to the spot, as Mr. Leigh Hunt in a paper on Naples remarks, have always persisted in building their houses above those that have been buried, thus keeping up an obstinate struggle, as it were, with one of the most fearful powers of nature.

"After all we've heard about Irazu," says Don Francisco to Don Ramon, two or three mornings after their drive in the diligence, "we must climb the volcano."

"By all means," says Don Ramon, "and the sooner the better, for there's nothing more to be seen in this Deserted Village."

Parenthetically it may be worth while to mention, that, at the moment he spoke, Don Francisco was in the act of copying a proclamation in writing, which he found wafered to the wall of the gambling-saloon, ladies'-parlor and dining-room, of the Hotel mysteriously kept going on nothing by Don Carlos, of Baden-Baden, the deserter and scape-grace. Of that proclamation, the following is a literal translation from the original Spanish:

"I hereby make known to all young men, under age, frequenting this Lottery, without permission of their parents, to abstain from taking part in the game, if they wish to avoid being put to shame.

"(Signed)

FELIX MATA.

"Governor of the Province of Cartago."

If faces be correct registers of years, I regret to say, that the young men, under age, in and about Cartago, paid little attention to that handwriting on the wall. It appeared to be just as inoperative as the Albany Liquor Law, which, unfolding itself portentously, three years ago, to this day remains a withered leaf in the Statute-book of New York.

It was three o'clock in the afternoon, April the 23d, 1858, that, mounted on two strong knowledgeable mules, with the necessary amount of blankets and baskets, we set out from the Hotel de Irazu to the Volcan de Irazu. To our first stopping-place, the road, though rough and broken by huge boulders and fragments of lava-stone, and crisp, quick, bright streams which crossed it, was a gradual ascent. It was an uninteresting country, however, we passed through. There were corn-fields, potato-fields, grazing-grounds, and, here and there, a stunted tree by the road-side, but that was all. Yet it mattered little. For the sky was blue and speckless, and the air was fresh and bracing, and our mules were nimble and spontaneously progressive, and our hearts were light. That especially of Don Ramon was so, for he had that day heard of the uprising of the people of Venezuela, and the recall from banishment of his beloved and aged father, and his old school-fellow participated in his proud joy, and the two, that glorious sweet evening, ascended the volcano of Irazu, as though they themselves were laureled heroes making a triumphal march.

edes Saëns, a wealthy young Costa Rican, who is at this moment, I believe, completing his education in an Athenian city of the United States. At a height of 1500 feet, it overlooks the dismantled white towers and emerald valley of Cartago. The sea is 7000 feet below. The greater part of it, though nominally a cattle-farm, is under cultivation, and yields the finest potatoes, peaches and quinces, in abundance. From the keen wind which frequently sweeps down from the cone of the volcano, it is sheltered by a broad belt of Alpine oak—encino it is called—and the guarumo, which closely resembles the Mexican arbol das las manitas, the leaf of which, representing the human hand, has been for generations an object of religious veneration with the natives and peasantry of Mexico. This belt is the haunt of tigers, and there are snakes without end or measure there, those especially of the toboba species, which, though excessively venomous below, the mountaineers persist in saying are innocuous in these colder regions.

The house itself, like most of the farm-houses of the country, is built of canes and cedar posts, stuccoed outside with mud, and thatched with plantain-leaves and corn-husks. A numerous family occupies it—three daughters, two brothers, a father and mother. One of the daughters is a young widow, whose husband was killed in the campaign against the Filibusters. Her sisters, Manuela and Rafaela, are modest, pretty, white-skinned, black-eyed girls, blushing, smiling, bright-minded and industrious. Manuela wears a rosary of gold round her little neck. The sons are lithe, picturesquely-featured, unobtrusive, active and hard-working as their sisters are. The mother is gracious, pious, motherly and wrinkled, sedulous in her attentions to strangers, and proud as a Spartan dame of the son who was slain in battle.

The father is a man whom Salvador Rosa should have painted. His name is Benito. Benito is a wiry, tall, hardy fellow, with a long, curved, quick-scenting nose, and round full eyes which roll incessantly, and flash at intervals. Night and day, blazing or freezing, his neck, and arms, and chest are bare. A loose coarse flannel shirt, striped like the skin of a tiger, a tattered straw-hat, and blue cotton trowsers, one leg of which is tightly rolled up to the knee while the other dangles in fringes, is the only covering he wears. He is the perfection—the Bayard!—of a mountaineer. He knows every rock, every tree, every bird, every root, every beast, every shrub and flower, every reptile, every dead and living thing that Irazu has borne, or still gives birth to. Intelligent in the highest degree, his brain is as quick as his foot, and that has the elasticity of the deer and the glancing speed of the arrow. For years he has tracked the tiger through the oaks that shelter the potrero of Cerado, and elsewhere have root in the rude breast of Irazu, and has wet the lava with the blood of the prowler. Hence he is known as the Tiger-Hunter. Far and wide that is his recognized title.

Two o'clock in the morning—having had a cup of delicious chocolate made for us by Manuela and Rafaela, the Rose and Blanche of our wandering story—we left the house at Cerado. A few paces plunged us into the heart of the forest. It was pitch-dark. There was nothing to light us but the lamp of the Tiger-hunter. For an hour and more, it seemed as though we were making our way through a subterranean passage. There was the precarious glimmering of the blurred lamp—there were the foot-falls of the mules—there was the rustling of the leaves and the crackling of the branches as we brushed or struck against them—there was at times, far apart, the cry or whistle of some solitary bird. Had sheeted skeletons, grinning and glaring, come upon us, we should not have been surprised. Moving up so long through this flickering darkness, we had come to regard ourselves as spectres or outlaws of the earth, and any kindred apparition, instead of striking us with dismay, would have been welcomed with a wild and lawless sympathy. When we least dreamed of it, however, the forest opened—tore asunder as it were—and through the light of the mellowed moon, we looked down toward the valley out of which we had come. Clouds were over it. They were white clouds—clouds of the purest fleece and swan-down one would think—and the light of the mellowed moon, pouring down upon them, made them look like crystal hills veined with gold, rising from an unfathomable lake.

But it was the vision of a moment only. The forest closed upon us as suddenly as it had opened, and there we were, for another hour or more, through the same low, dark, narrow passage as before, stumbling over stones, striking against branches, crouching lest we might be swept off and out of our saddles, coming every now and then to a halt, and leaving the patient mules to their sure instinct. And, finally, the branches growing thicker and spreading themselves lower down—the path narrowing—the bare and brawny roots tripping us up at every step—the stirrup-leathers catching in the thorny undergrowth, the arbutus-briers and yellow-leaved composita interwoven with fern and dwarf laurel—forced, at last, to dismount and drag the mules after us—in the end, scaling a perpendicular ladder a thousand feet high, the rungs of which were fallen trees, deep ruts, shelving stones and rocks—there we were, another hour or more, toiling and aching in the dense darkness—Benito, the Tiger-hunter, with his quivering blurred lamp, phantom-like, leading the way.

A second time, suddenly emerging from the forest, in which we left the blackness of the night imprisoned, there broke the light of morning over us on the bleak dumb ridge of Irazu!

Below us were the dismantled white towers and emerald valley of Cartago—below us were the seven hills and gardens of Paraiso—below us were the three rivers, the ancient Indian village, and the sloping forests of Orosi—below us were the mountains of the Agua Caliente and the nobler Candellaria—beyond us, and above, was the supreme Andean Chain itself. But neither dismantled white tower, nor emerald valley, nor river, nor forest, nor ancient Indian village, nor mountain, nor Andean Chain itself was visible. From the silent, cold, desolate height on which we stood, nothing was to be seen but a wilderness of the whitest clouds—nothing was to be seen but an illimitable frozen sea, through which, as the sun ascended, the isolated peaks, and then the surging ridges of the loftier mountains, one by one, as though they were newly-discovered cliffs and islands, rose up and glittered. And then—as we breathlessly gazed upon it, and our eyes filled up with dazzling tears, and we sank upon the ashes subdued by fatigue, and from sharp cold and overstraining were incapable of speech, and well-nigh were deprived of vision—over this frozen sea there floated an enormous purple cloud streaked with crimson. A dismayed war-ship, it seemed to us, drifting through fields of ice and icebergs into the Antarctic solitudes. After all our climbing—after all our groping in the dark—after all our stumbling over stones and roots—after all our scrambling through thick-set oaks, fern, dwarf-laurel and arbutus-briers—after all our ups and downs, fears and superstitions, pervading shadows and sudden lights, swimming eyes and reeling brains—behold our goal and recompense in the crater of Irazu!

Exhausted with its convulsions, it yawns there calmly, though coldly and dismally, in the pure sweet light of the morning, the Gladiator in Repose!

Standing with folded arms on the brink of that abyss, what is the thought that overwhelms and subjugates the mind? It is that of terrific strength entranced in solitude. Standing there, you feel as though you had been spirited from the living world, and were in the presence of a creation, which, thousands of years ago, had been lost, and which it had been reserved for you to find; or which, glowing for the first time with the breath of the Creator, was not yet perfect, and had still to be divulged.

It grows brighter and warmer, however, and the sensations and fancies the vision first excited, having like a wild throbbing sea gone down, you become reconciled to and familiar with the place—at home, in fact, though frightfully out of the way—and wrapping your blue or red California blanket about you, for there's nothing in this miserable world comparable to it when one's up in the clouds—you commence to take outlines and notes. Don Ramon and Don Francisco, steadying themselves a little, attempted to do so. But, first of all, they found they had to take Something.

What is Something?

It depends on tastes and is controlled by circumstances. Under these conditions, it may be Cogniac, or Monongahela, brown Sherry, Apple-Jack, Jersey-Lightning, Bourbon or Catawba. With us it was old Scotch whisky. And that old Scotch whisky, at that moment, was to us what the amrita—the Drink of Immortality administered by the Mystic Sisters—was to the warriors of the Sanscrit Mythology. Invigorated and enlivened by it, what was it we penciled off and noted down? Why this—that we were in the crater of Irazu, which had so horribly disgorged itself in 1723, and had ever since kept grumbling to the disquietude and dismay of thousands—that the crater was an amphitheatre with broken walls, 7500 feet in circumference, throwing up a cone of ashes and rapilli,

THE CRATER OF IRAZU.

1000 feet in height—that the floor on which we stood had exploded, or caved in, to the depth of 50 fathoms—that in the lower floor, loose and shelving as it was, there were four openings, out of one of which came puffs of sulphureous smoke—that we had been warned not to descend, for though the descent was easy, the ascent, owing to the shifting lava-sand, was exhausting in the extreme, if it was not fatally impracticable—that in the last eruption, that of 1841, the flood of lava had rushed over a precipice of 2000 feet, had spent itself in the densely-wooded wilderness to the North, and thus spared the city and the valley of Cartago, sprinkling, instead of deluging, the latter in its ravenous ebullition—this is what we penciled off and noted down. Had the weather been clearer, in one glance we might have seen the two great oceans, the Atlantic and Pacific. This is the crowning recompense of the ascent of Irazu. But John L. Stephens was more fortunate, and he has left us, in his clear and vivid words, the impression of what he saw and felt, when, as we did, he stood on the ridge, and looked out, wide over the remote world, from the crater of Irazu.

The Padre Acuña lives in a little house in the village of Paraiso, six miles from Cartago. Suggestive of supreme felicity and beauty, the name given to this village is gratuitously bestowed. A few tattered huts perched on half a dozen steep hills—the hills scarred by rough streams and knotted with boulders flung about on all sides—banana-patches and bean-fields—these are the features of this new Eden. One of the most exemplary, the Padre Acuña is, at the same time, one of the most enlightened of the Costa Rican priests. Several years stationed as a Missionary among the Indians in the lower portion of the country—that immediately back of the Gulf of Dolce—he has become an authority on the aboriginal tribes and vestiges of Costa Rica. For hours, in his cobwebbed cage of a room, we have sat and listened to him, as, seated in an arm-chair scooped out of a huge block of mahogany and draped with a tiger-skin, he discoursed quietly and fluently on this subject, snuffing and smoking all the while. The last visit we paid him, he gave his friends from New York, the exiles of Venezuela and Erin, all the Indian relics he had. These he discovered in what appeared to be a burial-place, a little off the remains of an ancient road, in the neighborhood of Paraiso. Built by the Indians, long before the Spaniards came, this road is supposed to have connected Cartago with the Port of Matina. Twelve yards in breadth, paved with rounded blocks of lava-stone, the causeway is protected on both sides by a sloping wall of the same material, three feet high. So far as it has been traced, it appears to have had no bridges, nor does it take a circuitous route. Whenever a ravine intercepts it, the road descends by a series of well-set massive steps, and in the same way mounts the opposing bank or cliff. It is a broken link, the Padre Acuña says, of a great chain of roads, in use for ages before the Spanish Conquest, which traversed the country from the Nicaraguan to, what is now the New Granadan frontier, and at this point threw off smaller chains to the Atlantic coast. That a populous empire flourished in Costa Rica, in days of which no authentic record, nor a dim tradition even, now exists—that the chief seat or centre of this empire was where the obscure small-poxed village of Terraba now stands, and that the immense plains of Terraba, thickly dotted with tumuli, abounding in relics similar to those found in the neighborhood of Paraiso, bear out this surmise—that an empire, of which these memorials have come to light, was pillared, stood erect and crested, among the mountains of Costa Rica—this the Padre Acuña holds to be a fact susceptible of substantial proof, if the country was but partially, even partially, explored.

Accompanied by this zealous antiquarian—who, by-the-by, confidentially advised Don Ramon, as a mollifying precaution, not to take off a stitch of his clothes from one end of the week to the other, when the latter with tears in his eyes complained of the exasperation which the fleas of the valley of Cartago inappetably caused him—the evening after our descent from the crater of Irazu, we set out for the valley of Orosi, in which a remnant of an Indian tribe still flickers.

Exquisitely green and glorious as the valley of Cartago is, the valley of Orosi infinitely surpasses it. Gazing at it from the full bold brow of the serrito of Paraiso—looking away down to the white ruins of Ujarras, the oldest footprints of the Spaniard in these solitudes—following, far below, the hurrying waters that pervade the scene with light and music—looking above to the mountains, until the eye ached with their immensity—gazing intently at it all, unconsciously, as though we were in a dream and spell-bound, we descended. Down the steep and winding road, the gentle horses picked their steps with care, as though they knew there were stargazers and wonder-seekers on their backs. Down they paced it, until we woke up and found the commingled waters of three rivers—the Navaro, the Agua Caliente, the Naranjo, or the River of Oranges—rushing at our feet—rushing to the Rio Grande, a broad, swift, lustrous, sea-green stream, flecked with foam, which divides the valley. Escaping from the valley, the Rio Grande loses itself in the Reventazon, one of the wildest and fiercest torrents to which the volcanic heights of this lonesome, glorious region give birth. It is stocked with a delicious fish—the whitest and creamiest fish conceivable. In contradictory recognition of its shrewd sprightliness—for it is to be caught neither by hook nor by crook, neither with fly nor worm—the Indians call it the bobo, which means the stupid fish. They shoot it with the arrow, as it comes to feed on the tender sweet moss which grows along the water-line of the rocks in the river.

HAMMOCK BRIDGE.

Looking up and out from the trees, covered with gorgeous parasites and festooned with trailing vines, which luxuriantly cooled and perfumed the last few perches of our road to the rivers, we found ourselves in front of a Suspension Bridge which none can cross on horseback. This Suspension Bridge is the work of the Indians of Orosi. It is called the Hammock Bridge. There are four upright posts of the hardest timber—two on each bank of the river, four feet apart—and these rude piers are connected by ropes or chains of iron-wire. Tough and durable as the latter are, the Indians carefully renew them every three years, for it is across this bridge alone they can make their way, to and from the valley, when the river is wild and swollen. Behold here the primitive idea which Science, backed by Capital, has with such splendor elaborated at the Menai Straits, at Fribourg, Niagara and the Falls of Montmorenci!

With the water up to our saddle-girths, having forded the Naranjo and spurred into a thicket, we suddenly pulled up, for an Indian, the color of new copper, thrusting his shaggy head through a fence of piti plant, saluted us warmly. The son of a deceased King, his father was an extensive landed-proprietor in this part of the country, a few years ago, and owned several hundred head of cattle. His offspring is a reduced gentleman, however, and lays claim to a few bananas and sugar-canes only. His name is Pedro. Notwithstanding the two-and-sixty years he has served on earth, Pedro is active. In this respect not one of his brethren, kindred aristocracy or tribe, is comparable to him. As brown as a slab of old mahogany, he is just as well seasoned, and almost as durable. The sinews of his bare legs—visible in blue through the tanned skin—are hard and flexible as whip-cord. A frowzy straw-hat—mo'st black hair streeling in flat ringlets over his eyes and ears—a striped flannel shirt which tapers off into two short, tufted tails before and behind—trowsers of the same, rolled up above the ankles, and roomy and cool as those the Turks used to wear before they got civilized out of their fire and marrow—these, with a knife like a cimeter, and a calabash slung over his shoulder, whenever he goes on a hunt or a foray, complete the outfit and costume of the Royal vagabond whom the Republican rambler this evening fell in with, and, as their guide, philosopher and friend, shortly enlisted.

The morning this enlistment took place Pedro was outside his hut, pounding a fistful of coffee in a mortar the size of a lime-kiln. It was a wooden mortar, dug out of some monstrous cedar, and the pestle was fully the length, and more than the bulk, of pavior's rammer.

On the wealthier plantations this primitive contrivance, sharing the fate of the patriarchal plow of the country, has been superseded by the daintiest and surest machinery. Imported from England, the names of Messrs. Barnes and Co., graven on plates of polished brass, are household names in the valleys of Cartago and San José, associated as they are with the elaboration of the staple crop of Costa Rica. But Pedro has for antiquity an immutable reverence, and his poverty, disowning these innovations, inspires him with the dignity of labor, while it restricts him to its muscular exploits. We took him for our guide, for his knowledge of the forests and mountains in the neighborhood of Oro-si was keen and serviceable, from the fact that, for little less than half a century, he has hunted the wild hog through them, and from boyhood has lived like a prince on fried bananas and pork.

A dozen huts, built of the flimsiest materials, scattered over the valley, are all that remain of the ancient village or mission of Oro-si, besides the Church and an abandoned Convent. These last-mentioned buildings are upward of one hundred and sixty years old. In 1841, while houses and trees were falling all round and in every direction, and the very mountains themselves were rent asunder, the Church and Convent stood firm, the Padre Acuña told us. It was a miraculous exemption. This, at all events, was his conviction, and the exemplary priest avowed it with a mild solemnity of tone and gesture. A few torn books, lying on a shelf in a mouldy recess, and a wasp's nest of loathsome bulk, in and out of which the plagues incessantly buzzed, were the only objects of interest the Convent contained. The books were in Latin—odd numbers of The Fathers. The Church is very dark, very moist, and smells like an old sepulchre. But it is full of treasures. There are eight silver candlesticks, a lamp containing thirty pounds of silver, and a crucifix of the same, six feet high. There are reliquaries inlaid with pearls and rubies, monstrariums of gold, illuminated Missals massively clasped with gold and studded with carbuncles; and all these treasures, the Padre Acuña informed us, were safe in the hands of the poor Indians of Oro-si. There are, also, within the Sanctuary, three arm-chairs with gilt legs and arms, the backs and bottoms being covered with crimson gilt leather. They are very solid, very quaint, and very rich. The pulpit is in a different style, and would come to the ground under any elocutionist who, framed and fired as the preacher in Hudibras, should denounce the Devil upon it with appropriate zeal.

Their pious guardianship of the treasures of the little Church was all that we heard to the credit, or in any way interesting, of the Indians of Orosi. We were told they were idle and ignorant to excess. We were told they were meanly cunning, and toward profane things, of every description, were thievishly disposed. The Padre Acuña, and other reliable gentlemen, told us all this. A glance convinced us they were slovenly, ugly, and woeful, did little or nothing for their living, while they knew and cared as much about Costa Rica as they did about Lapland. When, for instance, we asked Pedro, the son of the deceased King, if he remembered the time the Spaniards were there, he opened his mouth, gaped, stared, and scratched his sudoriferous old scone, as though we had propounded him a problem in Euclid.

"What Spaniards?" he laughed out at last.

We endeavored to explain. But Pedro knew nothing about them—not an iota—never knew there had been such people as Spaniards in the country. Now this was rather unpardonable, for the Spaniards "vamosed the ranch" in 1821 only, and Pedro, as I have already divulged, was two-and-sixty years old when the question was put to him.

When I mention they have an alcalde of their own, and are exempt from military duty, I mention every thing that concerns, in any noticeable way, the Indians of Orosi; and what I have placed to their account will suffice for all the other Indian tribes and villages within the limits of Costa Rica, the Talamancas and the Guatusos only being excepted.

The Talamancas inhabit the Atlantic slopes and lowlands lying between the River

Estrella, flowing into the Boca del Toro, and the River Matina. In the month of August, 1610, stung to the quick by the rapacities and cruelties of the Spaniards, the Talamancas suddenly rose against and massacred the inhabitants of the city of San Jago de Talamanca, which stood on the left bank of the Estrella, pouring melted gold down the throats of those who had rendered themselves most hateful, and in one overwhelming carnage confounding men, women, priests, and children. Partially subdued, in 1660, by Don Rodrigo Maldonado, who fitted out an armed expedition against them and rebuilt the city of San Jago, the Talamancas rose again, in 1707, and again, with knife, and melted gold, and devouring torch, made war against the stranger. It was a war of extermination, and it was complete. The city of San Jago, the castle of San Ildefonso, the gold mines and gold washings of the Estrella, are this day little else than faint traditions. Since 1707, no attempt of any consequence being made to subjugate or in any way control them, the Talamancas, according to the Notes of the Missionaries which appeared, eight years ago, in the Gaceta Semanario de Costa Rica, relapsed into Heathenism, and to this hour have lived in a state of savage freedom. Such is the language of the papers referred to. They are represented with a mild disposition, however, and nowise offensive or unfriendly to any strangers who may chance to enter their territory. The region they inhabit is one of high historical interest. It comprehends the lands granted by the Crown of Spain to the immediate descendants of Christopher Columbus, the Discoverer of the New World having entered the Boca del Torro in 1502, from which circumstance one of the many beautiful bays, included in this unrivaled harbor, has ever since been known as the Bahia del Almirante.

The territorial grant was accompanied by a title of nobility. It was the Dukedom of Veragua. In the assignment of jurisdiction made to Diego de Gutierrez, the first Governor of Costa Rica, the Dukedom was expressly excepted. But a few years after, the Ducal estate, owing to an agreement with Don Luis Colon, the eldest son of the Discoverer, having been incorporated with the Royal estate, the Governors of Costa Rica were authorized to occupy and administer the lands aforesaid.

It is in this region, also, that the famous gold and silver mines—laden with the dust and ore of which, three centuries ago, two galleons sailed every year to Cadiz from the mouth of the Estrella, and the wealth of which acquired for the coast, and eventually for the entire country, the name of Costa Rica—are said to have been situated. After the massacre of 1707, all traces of them were lost however. The impenetrable forest blotted out the footprints of the Spaniards—utterly, and it may be forever, effaced them—and all they know in Costa Rica, and elsewhere, of the wondrous mines of Estrella and Tisingal, is what the popular traditions and the fancies of the Indians furnish.

“The region is barren,” writes a Missionary Priest, in 1636, to the College of the Propaganda, “but it can not be doubted that many rich mines exist in it—in particular, we have accounts of a rich silver mine existing in a hill called San Mateo, from which large quantities of ore were taken in the last century—and I have myself been told, by a converted Indian, that the Cabecaras of the present day relate, that, after the massacre of the Spaniards, in 1610, vast quantities of gold were thrown into a lake where they still remain.”

Before I left San José, I was informed that a document, throwing considerable light on the whereabouts of these lost treasures, was supposed to have found its way, several years ago, into the archives at Havana, and that President Mora had dispatched a secret agent to hunt it up. Should the document transpire and afford the coveted information, Costa Rica will need no more loans from Chili, the House of Vanderbilt, Hamburg, or Peru.

Well worth noticing in a special manner, besides the Talamancas there are, as I have said, the Guatusos of the River Frio, so called from the coldness of its waters. This river, rising in the Northern mountains of Costa Rica, falls into Lake Nicaragua, just opposite Fort San Carlos. To the White race, the valley of the Frio has been, for three hundred years and more, and is to this day, a mystery. Who they are that dwell there—how they dwell—what their blood, religion, tongue and customs are, and whence they came—no one can tell. All we know for certain is, that they seem from the beginning to have sworn that no one, not born of them and among them, shall set foot within their mysterious domain. Fiercely have they repelled and punished those, who, from without, have sought admission. Armed expeditions even—that of 1783, projected by Tristan, Bishop of Nicaragua, and that of 1849, led by Trinidad Salazar of the same Republic—penetrating from the Lake, have been boldly met and driven back. Catholic Missionaries, who peacefully entered, appear to have fared no better. They appear rather to have gone farther and fared worse. They have never been known to come out. The illustrious, Don Francisco de Paula Garcia Pelaez, alluding to this fact in his “History of Guatemala,” writes that “it was as if those mountains were the Gates of Hell from within which there was no redemption.” So many good Priests disappeared in this way, the See of Rome, about a century and a half ago, saw fit to forbid the inscrutable region the benefit of clergy. No more Priests were permitted to enter it. Mr. Squier inclines to the belief, that the Guatusos are Nahuatl, or people of the true Aztec stock, and that they remain as little known, and as undisturbed to-day, as they were at the period of the Spanish Conquest. The latest information, respecting them, appeared in the Cronica de Costa Rica, December the 9th, 1857. It was furnished by an officer in the Costa Rican service.

“Between the peaks of the lofty volcanoes of Miravalles and Orosi, and the River San Carlos, there extends a vast plain inhabited by the Indians, commonly called the Guatusos. It is pretended that this tribe is descended from the Colonists who fled from Esparza, when that city was taken by the Filibusters of antiquity. Such as have chanced to see them, affirm that they are white, bearded, and practiced in a certain system of military discipline. Foreign to Costa Rica, and yet inhabiting one of the richest and most useful zones of its territory, this people greatly piqued our curiosity when we accompanied the expedition against the modern Filibusters on the River San Juan. Twice we accompanied the General up the Rio Frio, with the intention of exploring the territory, but without finding a landing-place. After the termination of the campaign, Colonel Lorenzo Salazar ascended the river, three leagues, in the steamer Bulwer, but was compelled by superior orders to return.”

The statement, that the Guatusos are white, corresponds with what the Expeditionists of 1783, headed by the Bishop of Nicaragua, who ascended the River Frio for fourteen days, and, at last, came upon three of these Indians in a shady bend of the river, report them to have been, namely, “of good size and white skin.”

Last of all, it may be interesting to mention, that, the night we were at Esparza, we made the acquaintance of a Lieutenant-Colonel, who accompanied the Costa Rican Division, which, under Colonel George Cauty, descended the mountains to the Northeast, beyond Alajuela, and through the San Carlos entered the San Juan, the time the steamboats, the forts, and every thing else in possession of General Walker's forces, were brilliantly taken. As the rear-guard of this division was passing the forest, between the head-waters of the Frio and those of the San Carlos, it was struck by a shower of arrows from the thickets. The rear-guard replied with musket and Minié balls. There was a piercing shriek from the forest, the branches crackling as though there was something rushing through them. The soldiers advanced in the direction from which the arrows had been winged, and, having cut their way with their machetas through the underwood, came upon the body of a beautiful woman, which was almost naked, was perfectly white and exquisitely shaped. She had been mortally wounded. Full and fast the red tide was streaming from her breast, and for the soldiers, who gently lifted her up, she had neither a word nor a glance before her head fell back, and she was dead. The crackling of the branches still continuing, they listened breathlessly, and looked with the eyes of hawks into the forest. But they had to resume the march. It was fatal to loiter or diverge. And so, burying the beautiful white corpse in the fragrant heart of the forest, they went on, sadly and solemnly impressed with the belief, that there is a mystery in the stern shadows of the volcanoes of Miravalles and Orosi, and in the depths of the valley of those cold waters, which has yet to see the light.

Riding up a gorge, through which the River of Oranges brawls and tumbles, we reached the gate of the hacienda of Navaro, just about sundown, the evening of our visit to the valley of Orosi. It is a beauteous English home, deep-set in the heart of the mountains of Costa Rica.

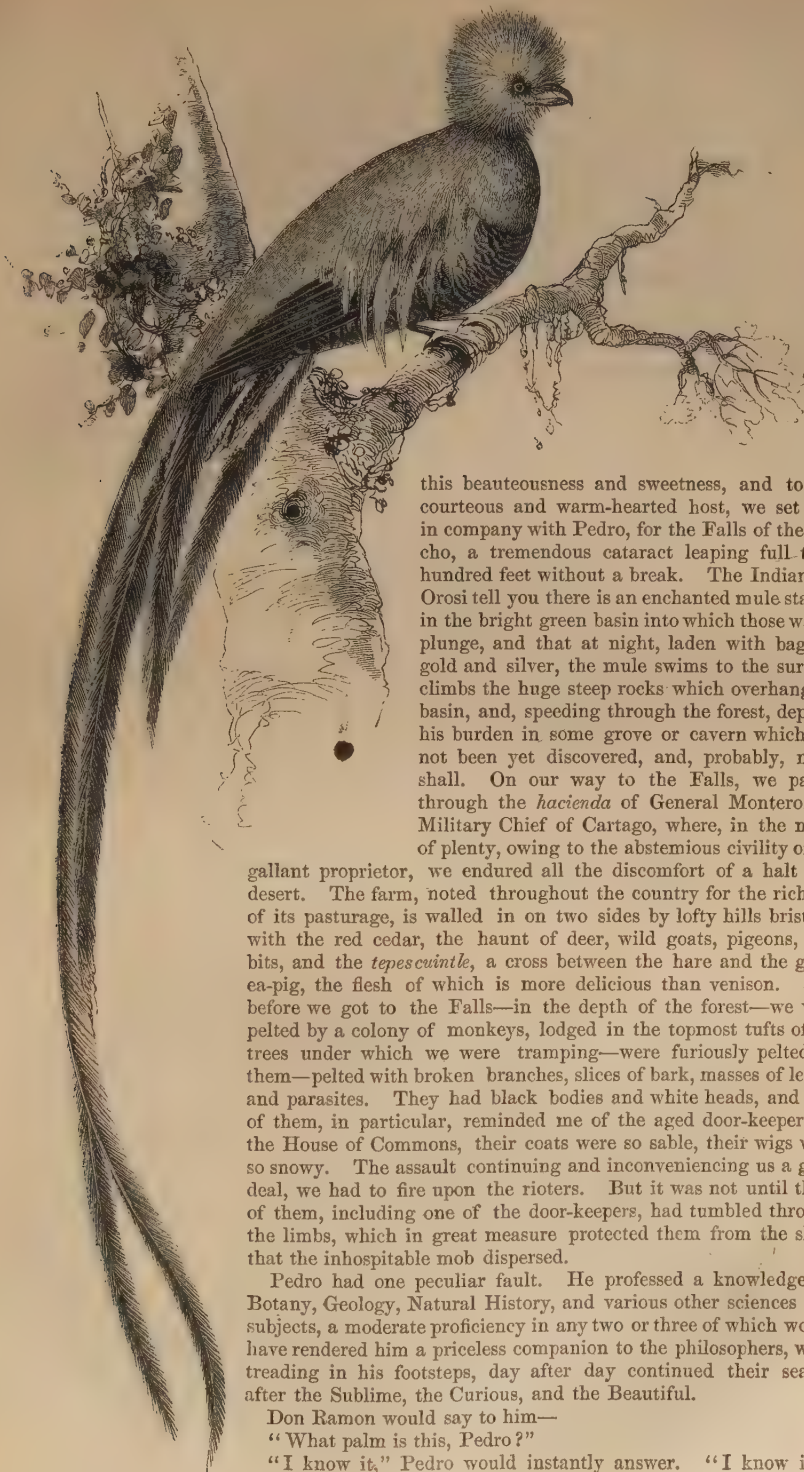

Invited by the owner, Mr. Young Anderson, who kindly accompanied us from Cartago, we dismounted at the gate, and two Indian boys, smeared and sweltering urchins of the tribe of Orosi, led off the horses to the potrero. The house stands upon a little hill, round and green as an Irish rath, overlooking the commingling waters of the Navaro and the Agua Caliente, and a garden surfeited with pine-apples, sweet lemons, oranges, quinces and mangoes. Snowdrops, dahlias, red lilies, arborescent ferns and the lordliest palms abound there, while, high over all, rises the tirra, with its sheathing of silver bark, festooned with the grass-woven nests of the oropendola, a bird of subdued but lustrous plumage.

Early next morning, bidding good-by to all

HACIENDA OF NAVARO.

THE QUETZAL.

this beauteousness and sweetness, and to our courteous and warm-hearted host, we set out, in company with Pedro, for the Falls of the Macho, a tremendous cataract leaping full three hundred feet without a break. The Indians of Orosi tell you there is an enchanted mule stabled in the bright green basin into which those waters plunge, and that at night, laden with bags of gold and silver, the mule swims to the surface, climbs the huge steep rocks which overhang the basin, and, speeding through the forest, deposits his burden in some grove or cavern which has not been yet discovered, and, probably, never shall. On our way to the Falls, we passed through the hacienda of General Montero, the Military Chief of Cartago, where, in the midst of plenty, owing to the abstemious civility of the gallant proprietor, we endured all the discomfort of a halt in a desert. The farm, noted throughout the country for the richness of its pasturage, is walled in on two sides by lofty hills bristling with the red cedar, the haunt of deer, wild goats, pigeons, rabbits, and the tepesquintle, a cross between the hare and the guinea-pig, the flesh of which is more delicious than venison. Just before we got to the Falls—in the depth of the forest—we were pelted by a colony of monkeys, lodged in the topmost tufts of the trees under which we were tramping—were furiously pelted by them—pelted with broken branches, slices of bark, masses of leaves and parasites. They had black bodies and white heads, and two of them, in particular, reminded me of the aged door-keepers of the House of Commons, their coats were so sable, their wigs were so snowy. The assault continuing and inconveniencing us a good deal, we had to fire upon the rioters. But it was not until three of them, including one of the door-keepers, had tumbled through the limbs, which in great measure protected them from the shot, that the inhospitable mob dispersed.

Pedro had one peculiar fault. He professed a knowledge of Botany, Geology, Natural History, and various other sciences and subjects, a moderate proficiency in any two or three of which would have rendered him a priceless companion to the philosophers, who, treading in his footsteps, day after day continued their search after the Sublime, the Curious, and the Beautiful.

Don Ramon would say to him—

“What palm is this, Pedro?”

“I know it,” Pedro would instantly answer. “I know it—’tis a palm.”

"And this—what bird is this, Pedro?"

"I know it—'tis a bird," the impostor would blandly reply.

This, at first, was vexations. But his good-nature soon coaxed us to forgive him, and, in the end, we came to the conclusion that Pedro was perfect. Under his guidance, and with his sure help, we made our way to many a beautiful, lonesome, glorious spot, across the swift cold torrent and the black ravine, along the face of the yielding precipice and up and down the aching mountain, through dense shrubberies and sombre forests. Through forests where the Quezal—the bird of white and crimson, of green and golden plumage—the sacred and imperial bird of Mexico, whose slender palm-like feathers, often found four feet in length, none save the Emperors were permitted to wear—like a meteor, colored with the rainbow, flashes through the foliage of the loftiest cedar. Through forests where we sometimes, though at long intervals apart, came across the mica, or the whipping-snake, which, when irritated, fixes its head flat upon the ground, and lashes out right and left with its body, blistering one as a bunch of nettles would—or where, at other times, we came across the harmless and beautiful coral-snake, with its black and vermilion scales set in alternate rings—and once were pointed out the vivora de sangre, the deadliest of reptiles, the bite of which causes the blood of the victim, be it man or brute, to break forth and exhaust itself to the last drop, in an intense sweat, through every pore.

Crossing the valley of Ujarras, we visited the coffee-plantation of Dr. George Guirey, of Philadelphia, where we met with a cordial hospitality, encountered another colony of monkeys, who furiously evinced on our heads their aversion to foreigners, visited the Falls of the Berbis—grandeur still than those of the Macho, the torrent, leaping from the abrupt ledge above, being but a misty speck in the chasm, five hundred feet below—and where we ate, drank, talked preposterous politics, shouted the Marsellaise, spread ourselves on Manifest Destiny and ox-hides, smoked, drank again, and finally fell off to sleep to the roar of the Reventazon.

Starting from the Doctor's at sunrise, we traveled for miles with Pedro over a narrow quagmire running along the face of the mountains of Cervantes. Gigantic laurels, arborescent ferns, oaks and cedars, wild fig-trees of enormous girth, overspread the soaking path, entangled or towered above it, while, here and there, streams gurgled across it, tumbling into the precipice we overlooked, the profound silence, at times, being broken only by the shrill clarion-notes of the wild turkey, the nervous springing of the deer through the thickets, the booming of the wild peacock, the creaking of the trapiche, crushing the sugar-cane in some lonesome clearing in the forest, the cavernous voices of the howling monkeys, or the rumbling of distant thunder. As the day brightened, we entered the sugar-plantation of Naranjo, one of the finest in the country, and breakfasted there on oranges, plucking the fruit from the tree, without dismounting from our mules. This over, away we went, down a break-neck hill, the vegetation growing ranker and the air more sultry, until, at last, looking up from the valley into which we had descended, we beheld the volcano of Turrialba—the volcano of the White Tower—with its vast pillar of smoke and fire, belted with an impervious forest of palm—remote, mysterious, awe-inspiring, inaccessible it is said—looming against the sky!

That volcano is a terror to the people—the burning agony of it is incessant—no human foot has scaled it—none have dared the exploit—and the poor Indian, with his clouded brain growing darker and stormier with the belief, tells you that the Great Fiend dwells there, and that they are lost who venture to ascend. The dense primeval forest, the ravines and chasms, the vast fields of lava, the perpendicular bare smooth rock, springing up several feet from them to the lips of the surging crater—all which are clearly visible from below—these are what to this day have rendered it fearful and inscrutable.

Three weeks after our ride to the valley of Turrialba, I had crossed the Cordilleras, and, having descended the road to La Muelle, and thence floated down the Serapiqui and San Juan in a bungo to Greytown, I was on board the James-town, U. S. sloop of war, the guest of her genial and accomplished Captain. Don Ramon had returned to Panama by the route we had come.

Looking back toward the mountains, among which we had spent these pleasant Holidays, I saw the volcano of the White Tower, high in the Heavens, burning in the gray light of the dawn, in another world it seemed to me, so remote and isolated was it. That it was unknown as though it belonged in reality to another world, millions of miles away, and that they, who lived nearest to it, were those who most feared to tempt the solitude which invests it, and that it stands there, to this hour, in its unviolated grandeur, exciting, while it repels, the curiosity and hardihood of those who would add it as another trophy to the conquests of Science and the audacity of the Age, I could not help feeling sad and abashed to think. But, when my thoughts reverted to the country of which the Flag, above me, was the glowing type, and when the exploits of her explorers at the same time recurred to me, and her pioneers and fleets crowded upon my vision, the conviction arose within me, that the day will come when the gold of the Estrella shall return to light, and the secrets of the valley of the Frio shall be made known, and Turrialba shall be scaled. In that pillar of smoke by day—in that pillar of flame by night—I read the sublime promise of confirmed liberty to the land, wealth and power, instead of comparative insignificance and humble fortunes, the wilderness a garden, and for mankind, going up there from the ends of the earth to the high places thereof, a purer happiness, a statelier altitude, and a brighter aspect.

Inwardly to behold this vision, and boldly to disclose it, no gift of prophecy, no hazardous philosophy, deducing its predictions from the laws of science or the analysis of human progress, not even that spirit of poetry, which sometimes gives to the illiterate the wisdom of the philosopher and to the profane the infallibility of the prophet, is wanting. From the great Book of Nature, which is open to all, which all can read, and from which the humblest mind seldom fails to derive lessons of high hopefulness and expansive forethought, for the land of the vanished Aztec I predict an unexampled renovation.

A permanent barrier to the encroachments of the two great seas, and gradually rising from their level in a series of ample terraces, each exhibiting its peculiar forms of animal and vegetable life, each its peculiar soil and climate, each its adaptability for some special physical condition, thus, step by step, developing the whole phenomena of creation, until, as in Costa Rica, at a height varying from three to four and six thousand feet, it rolls off into extensive plateaus or table-lands, divided by parallel and intersecting chains of mountains, crowned with fortresses like that of Turrialba, and pouring down, on their errands of health and fruitfulness, waters that never fail, Central America presents, in the language of Señor Astaburuaga, to the lover of nature, to the man of science, to the agriculturist, to those who prefer the pastoral cares, to those who covet the precious metals, to the merchant, the most ambitious and insatiable, as, indeed, to the industrious and adventurous of every denomination, a field of incomparable novelty and exhaustless wealth. In a word, the forests, the rivers, the mines, the valleys with which it abounds—all teeming and overflowing with the treasures of nature—constitute it in itself a New World, which, in the partial obscurity that encompasses it, seems to have been reserved, by a Providence of infinite views, for future generations, and for an exhibition of happiness and glory which shall transcend the fortunes and achievements of this day, justly prized and applauded as they are.

A PICTURE.

UPON her pale cheek, day by day,
No tender rosy blushes play;
The shadows gathered in her hair
Lie soft above her forehead fair—
A frailer shade is she.

No footstep on the stones goes by
But strikes a fire across her eye;
No sudden voice a word can speak
But flashes red light on her cheek—
Such guards her quick thoughts be.

All day she sees the sullen rain
Splash slow against the window-pane,
All night the south wind makes its moan
About her chamber low and lone;
She can not die nor rest.

Like some old saint in cell withdrawn,
In prayer and penance till the dawn,
So her sad soul its vigil holds,
As year on year to life unfolds,
And wears her patient breast.

Not any leech can find a cure
For these slow miseries that endure,
Till heaven before her eyes shall open—
The golden gate foreseen by hope,
And medicine her heart.

There is no new life for the dead,
No gathering up the tears once shed;
Pray, ye beloved, who pity her,
That God no more that rest defer—
Pray that her soul depart!

COINS AND COINAGE.

ALTHOUGH the article of money, in the shape of coins, is one of the most familiar objects of daily use, it is probable that very few persons have troubled themselves to consider when and where it originated. For, like all the inventions of man, it must have had a birth and a birth-place. Adam had neither purse nor pocket, and in Eden there was no one to trade with for food or clothing; and hence a means of barter was not very likely to be needed.

The origin of all human art was in necessity; or, as the proverb has it, necessity is the mother of invention. Thus the first recorded invention was an apron; or, as my oldest copy of the English Bible has it, a pair of breeches. But when the breeches had a pocket in them, and when the pocket was first filled with small change, remains a question for antiquarians.

This is worthy of remark, however, that the remains of antiquity which tombs and monuments furnish us agree remarkably with the Scripture history of the origin of our race. That is to say, the Scripture affirms that at a period about four thousand years ago the world was depopulated by a deluge, which only one family survived. Naturally we should suppose that the arts and sciences would progress with more rapidity, from the fact that this family possessed in themselves the learning and a great deal of the experience of the previous ages, in which men had lived long and learned much. But the world shows no remaining monument of any earlier period than this; and all its existing memorials indicate an age of art that dates from a time a little later than this flood. Let us record the fact, in spite of all that men have sought to establish to the contrary, that no one has found a relic of human existence on earth which antedates the period of the Noahic deluge. Bunsen has indeed founded a theory on the discovery of a piece of pottery in a deep boring in the Nile mud; but Bunsen failed to inquire whether the place of boring was not the site of an ancient lake, or the bottom of the ever-changing Nile itself; and science makes merry over the German philosopher's building without a foundation, which fell before the roof was on.

At a certain period after this deluge, when men might be supposed to need the convenience of money, and not before—having scattered, and formed nations of diverse interests—we find it coming into use.

It is no theory that we speak of, but a direct chain of existing specimens, leading us from the magnificent coinage of the Macedonian empire back to the earliest and rudest specimens of the coins of men's making. It can not be possible that any where in the world coined money had been used at a period prior to the date of the Lydian and the Ionian coins; so that, in this study of numismatics, we find at once a great tribute—the tribute which profane history has in all times paid—to the Sacred story, a confirmation of the account of the origin of our race on the earth.

The first mention that is made of money in history is eminently striking. It was used for the purchase of a grave. There is no picture in all the past more profoundly sad than that of the old man buying a place to bury his dead wife out of his sight. Who has not read the story with unutterable emotions? Who, when the first dead one in the house must be buried, has not gone out to buy a burial-place, and called to mind that sad scene before the Cave of Machpelah? Does this first record in history, sacred or profane, of the use of money, teach us that the shining stuff is of no higher value to a man than just the price of his grave? After he has bought and occupied that, it certainly ceases to matter to him whether his heaps are gold or copper or dust.

But let us glance a moment at this story, and see whether, in the days of Abraham, men had any knowledge of coin. For the first question before us is, When did coined money originate?

In the 19th verse of the 33d chapter of Genesis we find the words, "Pieces of money." The original Hebrew is Keshita. The same word occurs in Job, xlii. 11. Now this word may be translated as correctly a lamb. Does it mean, then, a lamb or a piece of money? This is the question, and one by no means uninteresting.

It may seem one of mere speculation, on which no evidence could be obtained. But Egypt is the great illustrator of the Bible, and the Egyptian monuments help us vastly to understand it.

In a tomb at Thebes, among the illustrations, on the walls, of the manners and customs of the old Egyptians, and especially of the one who lay in this tomb, we find a picture of a scribe

No one who sees it can doubt that the Egyptians of that day weighed out gold and silver by a weight whose shape was that of a lamb, and the half of it was like the hind-quarters of a lamb. This interesting discovery gives us reason to think that Abraham paid the sons of Heth in silver weighed out by these same weights. Layard found specimens of the weights themselves in Nineveh.

It is natural to suppose that the weights were originally determined by the value of a sheep or lamb; and this supposition derives additional force from facts that appear in the history of other nations, and even from the words which for many centuries have been used to express the idea of money. In early ages, when men led mostly the pastoral life, cattle were probably the most common medium of exchange and barter, and the value of a sheep was a fixed value, varying but little in places or years. When metals became standards of value can not be affirmed precisely, but it is evident that at this time, and for many centuries afterward, they were not coined into what we call money. The evidence, however, that the price of cattle was the earliest method of fixing the value of money, and that gold and other metals were valued according to the number of cattle a given quantity would buy, is found elsewhere than in this solitary instance. Our own language contains a proof of it, since the word pecuniary, which is in common use with us, is derived from the Latin word pecunia (money), and this was derived from pecus (a flock of sheep or cattle). The evidence of the derivation is found in the oldest Roman coins extant, one of which is shown in Figure 3. This gigantic copper coin was in the Pembroke collection in England, and weighed a little less than five pounds avoirdupois. It is a specimen of the earliest known coinage of Italy, and probably dates from B.C. 500 to B.C. 600, a period not much later than that of the earliest Eastern coinage, of which we shall speak hereafter. This piece was the Aes or As (the brass or the piece of brass), which subsequently changed its size and form, but which remained a Roman coin down to modern times. We refer to it at present to illustrate the theory of the origin of money value; and when the reader has studied history with reference to the price of cattle in various periods of the world's history, and in various parts of the world, he will readily adopt the idea that the first valuations of metal became fixed with regard to the value of sheep and oxen. Homer mentions no use of coined money, but speaks of a bar of brass as being equal in value to one ox, and a woman slave as worth four oxen. The father of poetry, indeed, often speaks of oxen and sheep as the representatives of wealth, as when Achilles argues boldly that he can go elsewhere and find abundant spoil of oxen and fat sheep. It is true that in the same conversation (Iliad, Book IX., line 365, etc.) Achilles also speaks of "the gold and ruddy brass and bright iron," but not as if coined into money. Homer's is perhaps the most remarkable work in the world as a description of existing arts, dress, manners, and customs, and, in short, comparative civilization. There can be no reason to suppose that he had ever seen coined money, or, if it existed in his day, that it had then existed so long as to authorize him to mention it among the arts and furniture of the Grecian camp or the Trojan city at the period of his story, which he located at about the same date with our chronological location of Samson and the judges of the Israelites.

We dwell on this subject because the idea is very prevalent that coined money was coeval with the race of man. Few ordinary thinkers have taken the trouble to inquire whether Adam had a pocket full of it (when he got a pocket), and we venture to say that most of our readers have had a general idea that it was always in use among men, at least at as early a period as any national organizations existed.

But it is also evident that gold and silver became valuable as ornaments long before they were used for coins. Thus we find Eleazar of Damascus carrying to Rebecca rings and bracelets of fixed weight, and in the same verse of the 42d chapter of Job, already referred to, we find that each of Job's friends brought him an earring as well as "a lamb" or "piece of money." That these rings and bracelets became frequently, and, at length, commonly the medium of exchange we have abundant evidence. The Egyptian monuments show that the common form of the valuable metals when in course of transfer was the ring (Figure 4). All ancient writers an Eastern market. The owner goes into the street to make a purchase and tenders his bracelet in payment. The convenient money-changer is at hand in every street with his scales, the weight is told—it is three, five, ten, or twenty mejiddi—and the merchant takes it as readily as coin. We have seen this transaction not a few times, and regarded it as the best evidence needed of the ancient custom of using similar bands of precious metals for currency.

But without pausing longer on this subject we may give the illustrations well known to numismatic scholars, of the ring money of the ancient Britons, dating before the Roman invasion, and therefore at a period not many centuries later than the invention of coined money by the Greeks, and continuing in use down to a late period in the Christian era. These rings are now found in abundance in various parts of England and Ireland. At one time, in 1832, a quantity of it, valued at £1089 14s. 1d. (intrinsic value of the gold), was dug up at St. Quentin (Figure 6). The forms varied. Some immense ornaments were manifestly worn over the shoulder. Others on the arms and around the waist. Cæsar, in his account of England, distinctly relates that rings of fixed weight were used for money in Britain. He says the same of Gaul. We find the same sort of money spoken of in the north of Europe; and the Bible contains so many allusions to similar ornaments that there is no reason to doubt that they had a fixed weight and passed current as coins.

But as yet no regular coin existed. The Greeks had been in the habit of using bars or spikes of metal. A bar was an obolus (literally translated a spike or a small obelisk), and six of these were as many as a man could grasp in his hand. Hence six oboli made one drachma (a handful), and thus originated the coins obolus and drachma, the latter being to this day the coin of Greece, and having given its name to weights and measures in all the languages of the civilized world.

It was about 800 years before Christ that the first money was actually coined. There is much doubt in the minds of antiquarians as to the precise spot where the custom had its origin. Herodotus ascribes it to the Lydians, but his authority is not conclusive.

The oldest coins extant, and probably the first coins ever made, are from Ionia in Asia Minor. Miletus, a city south of Ephesus, on the shore of the Icarian Sea, probably produced the first refer to rings and bracelets as the usual form of gold ornaments, and the modern customs in the East are doubtless accurately like the ancient.

The Oriental traveler is surprised to find the poorest woman sometimes wearing heavy gold bracelets and anklets; but his surprise ceases when he learns that there is no investment for money in the East which pays interest, and that, as a consequence, the poor and the rich, when they accumulate more or less gold, are accustomed to call in the traveling tinker, who, with crucible, furnace, and hammer, sits down in the court of the palace or on the ground-floor of the hut, and out of the coins handed him soon fashions a rude bracelet or anklet, which adorns the dusky leg or arm of the favorite wife, until necessity compels its transfer. When this necessity comes there is no delay or trouble about it in coined money. It was the gold stater (Figure 5).

It will be noticed that the coin is stamped on one side with a deep indentation. On the other, it has a rude picture of a lion's head. This form is characteristic of coinage for a long period. A die was evidently used, and the lump of metal placed in it, and a punch struck with a hammer drove the metal into the die and left the rude mark of the punch on the reverse of the coin. What induced the adoption of the lion's head as a design is left to conjecture. It is by some supposed to refer to the regal power represented by the lion, while others think that it had some connection with the worship of Cybele, the great goddess of the Ionians. A somewhat similar coin is also given in Figure 7, which by some numismatists is supposed to be of earlier date than the Ionian. It is a Lydian coin, one of those referred to by Herodotus; and we give it as a specimen of one of the earliest, if not the earliest. Coins of the kind illustrated in Figure 7 have been found in considerable quantity at Sardis, and there is reason to believe that some of these are of the period of Croesus. The value of these two coins is the same. It was called a stater or standard, and it is worthy of remark that the value of this first gold coin known has been continued in European currency, with very slight variation, down to recent times. These coins were the first specimens of stamped gold in the form that we call money. Silver was coined in Ægina not long after the date of the Lydian and Ionian gold, but when copper was introduced as a medium of exchange does not appear.

From this rude beginning the art of coinage advanced to a stage of beauty in early periods which has hardly been surpassed even in our day of splendid medals. But this advance was not instantaneous. It was measured, gradual, and slow. The first step was the placing on the end of the punch some rude figure which was indented in the coin when the blow was struck, thus producing the usual raised head or legend on the obverse, while the reverse showed the indentation of the figure on the end of the punch.

The quarter stater of Phocæa, of which a representation is given in Figure 8, illustrates this. The idea was further carried out in Greece by making the end of the punch to correspond with the die, but not so as to leave the impression raised on both sides. The result was a coinage, of which one side presented in concave the same figures which were on the other side in relief. And this led to the production of very beautiful coins, of which we was the first human head placed on coin. It appears probable, however, that his immediate predecessors had set the example, which he followed. We have one coin of Archelaus I., King of Macedonia (Figure 11), which gives us probably a portrait of that monarch; and, if it be so, it is undoubtedly the first coin which had for a device the head of a reigning prince. He reigned from 413 to 399 B.C.

give an illustration in a silver coin of Caulonia (Figure 9).

Figure 10 is a coin of Ægina, known by the emblem of the tortoise, and bearing the first form of rude punch-mark. The coins of this island are among the earliest. Indeed by some they are regarded as the first. Doubtless the first silver coinage is that of Ægina. It would seem probable that Ionia first coined gold, Ægina first coined silver, and Italia first coined copper.

The first devices on coins were emblematical. The tortoise of Ægina, the owl of Athens, the seal of Phocæa, and similar designs, are found on all the earliest issues. No heads of kings nor heads of gods are on the first coins. The deities at length took possession of the money, and thereafter the head of a god or goddess, who was the chief object of worship in a city or country, became the ordinary obverse of coins. This custom continued for centuries. It was not till very near the time of Alexander the Great that the heads of monarchs were placed on money. Indeed many have argued that the head of the great son of Philip Alexander I. had reigned about fifty years before, and during his reign a coin was struck bearing on its face a youth carrying two spears by the side of a horse (Figure 12). Possibly and probably this was a representation of the fact that Alexander was admitted to the Olympic games; but it can not be considered a portrait.

The period, then, of the introduction of human heads upon coinage may be safely placed at about 400 B.C.; and from that time to the present the coins of the various nations of the world which have outlasted time and corrosion are the most valuable and faithful historians. No one who has not pursued the study can have any idea of the admirable succession of coins which some great collections contain. The Kings of Macedonia might afford us an excellent example, if we had space for the illustration of their coins here.

Æropus, who succeeded Archelaus, and reigned from 399 to 394 B.C., left many coins now extant. Of Pausanias, his successor from 394 to 393 B.C.—only one year—we have many coins, bearing on the obverse a head, which may be a portrait, and on the reverse a horse, with the name ΠΑΥΣΑΝΙΑ. On one coin now extant of this reign there is visible on the horse a brand-mark—a fact that is interesting in connection with Arrian's statement that Alexander's steed, Bucephalus, received his name from the bull's head brand which he bore.

Amyntas II. succeeded Pausanias (393-369 B.C.). The coins of his time were of better workmanship. Up to this period and during his reign the punch-mark on the reverse of many coins had continued in use, but hereafter it is not known.

We have now arrived at a period of high perfection in the art of coinage. In the reign of Philip II. of Macedon, commencing 359 B.C. and continuing twenty-four years, some of the finest specimens of ancient coinage were issued, and among others the gold staters, which became known as Philips, and gave this name to the gold coins of Greece for a long period, precisely as in modern times we hear of Louis and Napoleons in France.

When Alexander the Great ascended the throne and proceeded to the conquest of the world he scattered his coinage over the continent, east and west, in an immense variety of forms. So many were they that they are the cheapest of ancient coins even now, and in Europe, Asia, and Africa abundance of genuine coins of this monarch can be purchased for a trifle above the weight of the gold or silver. It is not uncommon in modern times for vases of the Alexandrian coins to be turned up by the plowshare of the farmer, and in all the towns and cities of the East men are to be found with specimens for sale in a fine state of preservation. Genuine coins of Alexander can be procured at such low prices that it has hardly been an object to counterfeit them, as has been done with many others (Figure 13).

The Macedonian coinage (Figure 14) continued to be fine for more than two centuries. We have already said that our space forbids the illustration of the progression of the art at this period. We give in passing, however, some specimens of the time, for the sake of showing that it was not in Macedonia alone that the art was advancing (see Figures 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21).

In all the East, which was then the civilized world, the fine arts were progressing to a golden age. Phidias had completed the Parthenon, and a bronze coin of an early time shows a rude view of the Acropolis (Figure 24), the statue of Minerva, and the Parthenon; while another (Figure 25) shows the theatre of Dionysius on the side of the Acropolis.

It is remarkable that we have no coins of Egypt until the period of the successors of Alexander. That old land—first in arts and sciences, far in advance of all the world in architecture, sculpture, painting, music, and every thing that adorns civilization—seems never to have felt the necessity of a circulating medium other than the ordinary use of metals by weight, and the interchange of commodities by barter. This may have been owing to the character of the country, lying, as it did, along the banks of the Nile, where interchange of articles by barter was convenient. The Ptolemies introduced the Greek coinage system, and we have abundance of specimens of their issues, known by the eagle on the reverse, and the name of the king on the coin (Figure 22). In our own collection we have some noble specimens of the Ptolemaic bronze coins, of which we illustrate one as showing a high and bold style of art now prevalent on the issues of the mints. The eagle on this coin has never been equaled on an American coin. He looks as if he knew his nobility. We commend him to the United States Mint as a pattern (Figure 23).

The coinage of Egypt continued to be very fine down to the Roman Period, and we have many specimens of the Ptolemies and their queens, and various Egyptian rulers, with finely-engraved heads, down to Antony and Cleopatra (Figure 26).

In Syria also, at this period, the coinage was in a high state of perfection (see coin of Antiochus the Great, Figure 19). But in Judea it does not seem probable that coins had yet been introduced. We have already alluded to the probability that the shekel, in the earlier history of the chosen people, was a weight, and not a fixed value of metal. At what time this weight was put into a certain shape, and stamped with a certain legend or device, it is impossible with certainty to affirm; but that it did not occur before the captivity in Babylon we may be well assured. There is no reason to believe that any Jewish coin bearing a legend was issued prior to the days of the Maccabees, nor do we find any now extant appearing to be of earlier date. The "shekels of silver," as they are called by the collectors, have become quite common of late years. Within the past five years there have been quite a large number found near the pool of Siloam at Jerusalem, evidently washed down by the rains from some point on the hillside of Moriah or Zion.

Here let us remark in passing that ancient coins are by no means so rare as common opinion rates them. Many of them are very common. Thus the copper coins of Diocletian are far more plenty than American coppers of 1799 or 1804; and the small coins of Constantius are as abundant as any American or English coppers of forty years ago. The preservation of ancient coins is easily accounted for. In the absence of banks of deposit, or any means of investment, the poorer classes of people as well as the rich were accustomed to bury their treasures. The poor man's safe was under the ground-floor of his hut, so that wherever there was a village, there, under every house, were buried coins of gold, silver, and copper. An invasion would sweep away a nation and annihilate the towns and villages. The buried treasure remained undisturbed until the modern plowshare, going over the site, turns up little heaps here and there which have lain for one or two thousand years. The peasantry of the Eastern countries make the discoveries of old treasure. In Egypt, for example, the fellaheen, working on the Nile banks, are accustomed to sprinkle over their soil the dust of ancient mud villages, which they find to be a productive manure. In digging among the ruins of these villages they frequently find collections of old coins.

We once saw an Egyptian peasant woman who had about half a peck of Roman coins, nearly all of the same issue, and in as fine condition as American coppers of last year. Some were proof coins. We have over thirty of these in our own collection, purchased from this peasant woman at the rate of a khamsa (less than half a cent) for four of them. Not only nations, but many cities and provinces retained the right of coinage. It appears manifest that the value of the principal coins in all the Eastern nations was about the same. The gold stater of the Greeks was equivalent in value to the principal gold coin of other nations. The barter of different nations with each other was not much affected therefore by the variety of coins.

The only extant Jewish coins are varieties of the silver shekel beforementioned. In the first book of Maccabees, xv. 6, in the letter of Antiochus the king to Simon the high priest, and to the Jewish nation, occurs this passage: "And I give thee leave to coin money of thine own stamp in thine own country." Simon Maccabæus probably coined, under this permission, the first national coinage of the Jews. We give an example of his issue. The Jewish coinage, of course, bore no head of a God on its face. The second commandment forbade it. But the pot of manna, and the buds of Aaron's rod were the device adopted, with legends varying, but most commonly "SHEKEL ISRAEL," "JERUSALEM HOLY," or "SCHISCHIMON PRINCE OF ISRAEL" (Figure 27).

The legends were in the ancient form of Hebrew character, and not in the debased form in use since the captivity.

For what length of time this coinage continued in Jerusalem we can not say. It is not probable that it was of long duration. The Greek and Roman currency took its place in time; and although coins of Herod and of Barkochebas the rebel are extant, it seems improbable that these were issued to any great extent. The few known are small and rude.

It is impossible to give any idea of the money value of ancient coins by modern money terms. The size of the shekels now extant is larger than the American quarter dollar, and not so large as the half dollar. The weight is 274 Paris grains. In the 17th chapter of Matthew the temple tax, or tribute money, is spoken of as a didrachma. Elsewhere it is stated at a half shekel; and in the same chapter, 27th verse, a stater is made to pay the tax for two persons. These few verses, at the end of the chapter, give us some light on the relative value of the ancient Jewish, Roman, and Greek coins.

The Romans commenced the coinage of copper, according to Pliny, in the time of Servius Tullius, B.C. 578. For a long period they coined only copper, and it was not till after the time of Alexander that they had gold or silver coins.

We have already spoken of the probable origin of the word pecunia. The great coin already given is an illustration of the earliest form of Roman coinage. This was either followed by, or contemporary with, the issue of the Æs or As, which was the standard coin of Rome for many centuries (Figures 28, 29).

The As, however, was a weight, and not a coin proper, for many years. It was a pound of brass or bronze. At first square, afterward round, and when paid in large sums, it was paid by weighing it out in quantities. The same pound of bronze was known by the name stips, whence come our words stipend, stipendiary, etc. The pieces were struck in large sizes, weighing from one to one hundred pounds each. The large piece before illustrated weighs 4 pounds 9 ounces 11 pennyweights and 38 grains. It was doubtless a five-pound weight of copper or a quincussis.

The next coin of the Romans, which possesses peculiar interest to us, was the Denarius, which was originally worth ten Ases; but subsequently, when the As was reduced in value, became worth sixteen of the latter. This Denarius continued to be a Roman coin, was by them introduced into Britain, and, finally, reduced to be the silver penny of England; and to this day appears in English coinage as the letter D, which represents pence in the notation of £ s. d.

The As, by-the-way, let us remark, was used by the boys of Rome as coppers are now, and instead of "Head or Tail," they cried "Heads or Ship"—"Capita aut Navem," alluding to the heads of Janus and the prow of the ship on the opposite sides of the coin. The Semis or semi-As, the tricens, the quadrans, the sextans, and the uncia (ounce), were respectively the half, third, fourth, sixth, and twelfth part of the As. The mite of the poor woman in the Bible was possibly an uncia, or a semi-uncia. For although in early Roman times these coins were of heavy weight, as their names indicate, yet in later times, and from time to time, the value of the As was reduced, until at the time of Christ it was worth about as much as an American cent is now, and the uncia was but a twelfth part of that.

It is not our purpose to trace the history of Roman coinage, but only to show sufficient of its character to be able to connect modern coins and coinage with it, since it is manifest that we can trace our use of coins very directly to the Roman nation.

The Denarius (Den-æris), or ten Æses, was first coined after the reduction of the value of the As to the equivalent of a little over one cent and a half of our money. The Denarius was then worth about as much as sixteen cents American. It was of the same value as the Greek drachma, and took its place in currency at Rome. It was coined first about 269 B.C.

Sixty years later the first gold was coined; but we will not weary the reader with any reference to it at present. The history of Roman coins is very perfect, from the large number of specimens which are possessed in modern collections. When the Empire was established, the successive Cæsars issued splendid coins and medals. These are extant, in numerous fine specimens. More than thirty thousand varieties of Roman coin are known, and the one collection at Paris contains more than that number. As Rome increased her power and extended her dominions she coined money for her various provinces and cities, and established mints in all parts of her empire. Thus we have thousands of specimens of Roman coin struck in all parts of the East, in the West, in Egypt, and at last in England.

The value that attaches to these coins in a historical point of view need not here be dwelt upon. Take the period of Julius Cæsar. Such a coin as that on the conquest of Egypt (Figure 30), or another of Antony and Cleopatra, are of the utmost interest. So also that which commemorates the death of Julius Cæsar, bearing the daggers and the head of Brutus (Figure 32). The well-known symbols of the city, the wolf and twins, are found frequently (Figure 31). We have in our collection a small copper coin bearing this device, which is one of the most exquisite pieces of workmanship.

In the decay of the Empire the art of coinage became very debased. Many of the coins of the lower Empire are interesting as Christian memorials; but all of them indicate sadly the depression of art and good taste.

We give a few specimens of small coins, through which the eye will readily detect the gradual loss of skill in the artists down to a very late period (Figures 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41).

The Mohammedans, meantime, began to coin in the East. The general style of their coinage is to be gathered from the specimens we give. The legends were passages from the Koran or wise sayings of their fathers.

We have in our collection a glass coin, which we procured from a fellah in the fields of Upper Egypt, which belongs to a series of very interesting coins, unlike those of any other period or country, and which are still a source of doubt and debate to numismatists.

During the Middle Ages the coin of Europe continued to be rude and unartistic. There is extant an old tapestried representation of the art as then pursued, and a curious bas-relief of a coiner at work is found on an old capital at St.

Rome conquered and possessed Britain, and introduced her coinage there (Figure 45). The remains of Roman power in England are many, and none more interesting than these coins. The conquest of Britain formed a prominent legend on one coin of Antoninus Pius (Figure 46), and on another of the same monarch is found the first instance of the appearance of Britannia as a person on coin (Figure 47). This same figure of Britannia was adopted again in the seventeenth century, in the time of Charles II.; and it is said that the beautiful Frances Stuart was the model of the goddess on the coin of the later date, "especially," says Humphrey, "the leg, which was undraped in the design then adopted."

triumphal arch, rudely engraved, in honor of his triumph on the conquest of Britain.

But the early coins of the natives of the island possess even more interest than the importations of the Romans. One of the earliest of these now extant is attributed to the celebrated Boadicea. Specimens in gold have been found bearing the legend Boduo. Her name was probably originally Boduodicea. Some numismatists have fancied that these rude attempts at horses were imitations of the Greek coins of a period not long antecedent (Figure 49).

The advance of the art in England was not rapid. The skeattæ were the earliest Saxon coins. Of their value we know very little. In the laws of Æthelstan they are said to be mentioned, and 30,000 are spoken of as equivalent to £120. They gave place to the silver pennies of the Saxon kings, which continued in very regular succession, and form now a most interesting collection.

The "penny" was a word derived from the Latin pecunia, which we have before referred to in this article as originating the word "pecuniary." By some the word penny has been derived from "pendo," to weigh. The English adopted the word "cattle," and used it very much as the Latins may have used the word "pecus," to signify a man's property. From it came the word chattel, now in common use among lawyers, and recently in very familiar use in common conversation and newspaper articles.

Time and space would fail us to trace the progress of the art in England, and to show the endless varieties of coins brought into use in different periods of the history of the country. We have preferred rather to illustrate a few of the prominent specimens, and leave the reader to glance over them at his leisure. The curious legends, Scripture phrases, and pious sayings, which were from time to time adopted, make the coins oftentimes peculiarly interesting.

There have been times in the history of most modern nations when the monarch had either lost possession of the mint, or when the exigen-

the minting process. Thus at sieges of cities it has frequently been found convenient to cut plate into squares, diamonds, or irregular shapes, and stamp on the pieces their respective values. These pieces are known as siege-pieces, and are prized by collectors as curious. The Newark and Scarborough pieces, issued by Charles II. (Figures 48 and 50), illustrate this style of money.

ly entertained about it. We illustrate two of the varieties now found in many collections (Fig. 57).

COUNTERFEIT COINS.

The history of coinage involves some history of counterfeits as well. From the earliest dates of coins men have been found to imitate them in inferior metals for purposes of gain. Nor is it at all uncommon now to find ancient coins which were manifestly the work of forgers. Even the earliest coins, those of Ægina in particular, are found of this description. Herodotus states in the Thalia LVI. that he considers the report a very absurd one, but he nevertheless gives it, that Polycrates purchased the departure of the Lacedemonians from Samos by striking off "a large number of pieces of lead cased with gold like the coin of the country," and paying these to the unwary soldiers. The reader of Herodotus will couple this remark with the amusing and characteristic statement of the preceding section, that he (Herodotus) had talked in person with a son of Samius, who was the son of Archias, who was present at the siege of Samos. It is very manifest that in the day of the old historian bogus coin was a matter of common talk, and that it was well understood that it could be made so as to deceive even an army of hungry Lacedemonians. There are extant specimens of forged gold coins of Lydia, which Humphrey suggests may be specimens of the very coins made by Polycrates, Herodotus to the contrary notwithstanding. We have certainly no occasion to doubt the perfect readiness of Polycrates to adopt such a course. His general style of life and conduct, and his associates in Greece were of a similar class to those we now expect from counterfeiters and forgers.

(Per crucem tus salva nos, etc.)

Of the comparative rarity of English coins we shall not speak in this article, except to correct a blunder which has gained credit in all parts of the world. We once heard an ignorant man say that he wished he could find a Queen Anne's farthing, for it was worth more than a thousand pounds; and since that time we have heard the same idea expressed in various ways by the poor and uneducated of England and Ireland. Farthings of Queen Anne are by

From that day to this the manufacture of bogus coins has been the employment of the dishonest in all ages.

It may seem incredible that a bogus coin should be manufactured which is of higher intrinsic value than the genuine, and yet this singular instance did occur in Hayti within the last half century. The government coined base money; and while it regulated the importation of silver, so that the value of the coin should not be affected, it gave by decree a high value to the base issue. The result was that pure silver coin of the same weight or size with the genuine, and, of course, of greater value, were made in New York, smuggled into Hayti, and there passed at the rate of the genuine coin. Of course the bogus coin was worth more than the genuine coin of the realm.

But a species of forgery which more concerns the coin collector in America is the manufacture of ancient or rare coins in modern times. Many collectors, and even writers on numismatics, have been misled by forged coins, which were not even imitations of genuine. In Padua, about 1540, two engravers, Jean Cavino and Alexander Bassiano, were manufacturers of copies of coins and medals. They pursued this honest line of business until they became so skillful that their copies could not be detected from originals, and then they began to sell them as genuine coins and medals. Hence came the name Paduan, applied by collectors to any ancient coin of modern make. Dervien, a Frenchman at Florence, Carteron in Holland, and Congor-nier in France, were afterward celebrated in the same line. The latter is stated to have confined his work exclusively to coins of the Thirty Tyrants. The list of coiners might be largely multiplied. Sestini published, in 1826, a catalogue of the forged coins of Becker, who died at Hamburg so late as 1830. The number was immense of coins which he made from imagination purely, without any historical authority. The result of this is that there are now thousands of these coins in collections, and offered for sale by collectors throughout the world. The cheat has been carried so far that, in some of the cities of the East, it is not uncommon for men to have supplies of these manufactured coins buried, and "excavate" them before the eyes of travelers, to whom they at once sell them at enormous prices.

We have ourselves seen countless numbers of them offered for sale in Cairo, Smyrna, Athens, and other cities of the Levant.

But these are not the only manufactured coins. The most rare and costly of modern coins are of tempting value to counterfeiters, and not a few fine pieces, contained in collections and ranking high in catalogues, are manifestly manufactured coins.

Another style of forgery consists in splitting ancient coins and substituting the reverses. Thus a coin of Augustus might be produced with a reverse known only to coins of Diocletian, and the result would command a high price from a collector; while the Diocletian, with the reverse that belonged to Augustus, would bring an equally high price from another.

In America the art of manufacturing coins for collectors is well understood. We have seen many rare and splendid coins imitated very closely, and no one but an experienced collector can rely on his judgment in purchasing from strangers. But Roman or Greek coins command no prices in America, where the mania for collecting coins is almost wholly confined to the American series. These form a subject of great historic interest, and to the coins and coinage of America we propose to devote another article.

CAPTAIN GAYLORD'S WILL.

IT was an evening in early summer. Around a large, old-fashioned kitchen fire-place a group of persons had gathered, lured rather by the flickering light than by the warmth, for doors and windows stood wide open. Old women they were all; and they drew close together and talked with many an emphatic nod and significant gesture. Except the fire no light was in the room, and as the flame rose and fell on the hearth the fantastic shadows of the old women jerked and leaped on the wall opposite, in a manner wonderful to behold.

A simultaneous turning of heads greeted the entrance of another woman; she bore in her hand a large flat candlestick, carefully shielding the flaring flame past the current of air.

"Any change, Mrs. Spooner?" said one of the group, addressing her who had just joined them.

"Not to speak of," replied the latter. "He keeps a failing, slow but steady. Likely now he'll last till about break of day. Here is a curious winding-sheet," she continued; "I've seen a good many, and I don't know as ever I see a perfecter one." She pointed to a singular form which the material of the candle had assumed from too rapid melting, a sort of loop or shaving depending at its side.

"Sure enough, no more did I!" exclaimed a toothless, bent old crone, who had risen, the better to examine the wonder. "Well, well, what's to be, will be! That's what I said—last night was't, or night afore? I heard a dog howling; I don't know nothing whose dog 'twas, but I heard him howl three times; and next morning I said, says I, 'Something is going to happen.' Nabby Ann, she thinks it's all a notion, but says I, 'You mind my words, something's going to happen.'"

"Well," spoke another, who was rheumatic and hobbled with a staff, "I've heard the death-watch going lately, by the half hour together, I guess—for I don't sleep well o' nights. Well, we're all likely to be called—old and young, rich and poor, we must all go; just as likely me as another, for what I know." And she wound up with an asthmatic cough, which made her drop the staff as well as the old shawl wrapped around her. With a little aid she was all right again, and observing that it was growing late, she bade the others good-night, and shuffled off into the darkness.

For it was a murky night; neither moon nor stars were visible. Now and then a gust of wind swept by, stirring into a weird shivering the foliage of the old trees that stood near, and then giving place to a stillness so perfect that the ticking of the house clock on the landing, through three or four intervening rooms, grew distinctly audible.

"Who'll the property be like to go to?" said one of the lingerers. "Whoever gets it will be well off. They say there's thirty acres and better to this; then there's the great Beech-hill wood-lot—good hard wood, I've heard Noah say; hard wood's worth money now. Besides, there's the Crossfield farm over in Putney; bank-stock, too, by all accounts. He's been a hard man, though," lowering her tone; "hard to his own kin. Them that knows says that when the family used to live down to Newburyport—that's twenty years ago and more—there was three girls; and two was like him, grand and stiff, and they two was old maids. The other one, she was the youngest, she liked a young man, and he liked her, and nothing the matter only he was poor and had his own way to make. So then they all set their faces against it; but she was high strung, too, and set out she'd have her own way. They broke her spirit though, for they just give out that she was deranged, and locked her up in a room, and for fear she would get out of the windows they went and nailed boards over 'em, all only a streak at the top."

Grown very earnest in what she was relating, the old creature had unconsciously elevated her voice. She now bethought herself, and, lifting her shaking head, glanced cautiously around the room; then, having taken a pinch of snuff from a box fished out of the depths of a huge pocket, and having proffered the same solace to her companion, she went on:

"And so, finally, the young man, him that wanted to have her, he got discouraged and went away to foreign parts. All the while the brother and sisters, dressed out in the best of every thing, silks and satins and broad-cloth, they used to go riding up and down in their coach, with a nigger to drive. Nabby Ann, our Noah's wife, her father's second wife was a widow when he married her, and when her first husband was living, he was a Brice, they used to live down nigh Newburyport, and she's seen 'em come nipping along into church, proud as peacocks, with their green velvet cloaks trimmed off with fur, and feathers in their bonnets, and all; and him with a gold knob on his cane and gold-bowed specs; and then just to think of that poor creature at home, shivering in a night-gown, like enough, all alone: they never let hired help go nigh her. Well, they've gone long ago to give their accounts, the sisters have, and now his turn is come. I say, if the Lord ain't mercifuler to him than he was to her, it'll go mighty hard with him—that's all."

"What's ever become of her?" said the one who enacted listener, and who manifested her interest in the story by an appropriate accompaniment of groans, gestures, and ejaculations.

"When she got pretty well broke down, and that wasn't till they had been living here a good while, it began to be too much trouble to have her in the house. So then she was sent off somewhere, to them that would do it for pay, to be taken care of."

"And didn't the young man ever come back?"

"Not as I heard of. The Gaylords had a younger brother, and he followed the sea. Somehow or other he never used to come nigh the rest of them, and when he married a wife he took her to live in England. It got to him there how things was going on, and he sent a letter that she should come and live with him. So then their backs were up. By-and-by he started to come to this country, him and his family, and the ship was a wreck; near about all the passengers was lost, and him among them. His wife and a baby was saved. She had friends, so I suppose they took care of her and her child."

A little barefooted maiden now came pattering up to the door. "Granny," said she, "mother says, will you come home now, for it's pitch dark and like to rain?"

So they went away together. They were near neighbors and lived at half a furlong's distance, by the side of the highway, from which a chestnut-shaded avenue led to Captain Gaylord's dwelling. The noise they made in departing awoke Nancy, the kitchen-girl, who, after a busy day's work, had fallen asleep on a bench in the porch just outside the door. Finding the room vacated, she closed the windows and then sat down on the step, watching the rivers of lightning that kept pouring across the inky mass of clouds in the west.

A girl of fourteen or thereabouts appeared at the door of the adjoining room; she spoke as one having authority.

"Go to bed, Nancy. See that every thing is ready for the watchers, and bring me a glass of water—fresh from the well, mind—and then you go to bed."

Nancy obeyed the directions, one and all, muttering to herself as she ascended the stairs to her own apartment: "Ain't no lady about her neither, nohow: ordering round! mean as dirt! I despise her!"

The young lady to whom the remark applied was Miss Hannah Maria Spooner, daughter of Captain Gaylord's housekeeper.

In a large dimly-lighted upper room, on a bed from which the curtains were drawn away to give the air free access, lay the sick man, evidently near death. He was dozing, but in a broken slumber, often starting and looking around, as if he had half forgotten where he was. At times, too, he talked in his sleep, but for the most part indistinctly; once, indeed, he wrought himself into a state of almost fierce excitement against an imaginary opponent. He awoke then, and for a few minutes his mind still wandered, and he asked what was that heavy, beating sound; but there was no sound at all, and he presently dozed off again. The physician, Doctor Reid, and Matthew Horton, the watcher, sat near. Mrs. Spooner, desiring them to summon her if needful, retired to her own room.

The thunder-storm of that night was remembered in the neighborhood for years. Bolt after bolt of lurid fire left its scathing mark. An elm at the gate was splintered to the root. Now the old man slept quietly, undisturbed by the tumult; his heavy, stern features had lost no whit of their usual resolute expression, the thick gray brows were drawn closely together over the shut eyes, the hard mouth was firmly compressed. The night wore on, and the storm was spent. The clouds were scattered, and wherever the moonlight found a rift in the foliage of the trees it glided downward, and lay white and lovely on the grass beneath. When it slanted through the windows of the sick room, and fell on the pale face of the old man, it met an answering calm. The soul was sundered from its earthly dwelling. Let us hope that mercy was dealt to him in more generous measure than he had meted to others.

No mourner followed Captain Gaylord to his grave; for all that there was a great funeral after the New England country fashion, and a very long procession. Many of the poorer sort were glad of a chance for once to enter the grand parlors, to see the marvels with which they were said to be furnished. There were the brilliant carpets, the shining crimson curtains, the pianoforte, brought, it was said, from over seas; sofas and chairs all cushioned with bright velvet, looking-glasses reaching from ceiling to floor, with broad gilded frames, richly colored pictures, great gorgeous vases, and a hundred knick-knacks, of which none there knew the name or use. Country people, old men in homespun and clouted shoon, and old women in dim calico and dimmer cotton shawls, sat on the costly seats, and looked and wondered, with a thought of the rich man and Lazarus. Open-mouthed, round-eyed urchins stood on the softly-carpeted stairs, and kicked their restless little feet against the polished mahogany balusters. Little girls alternately smelled at their nosegays of pinks and southernwood, and shyly eyed the unaccustomed splendors, now and then exchanging a still whisper. The house was well filled for once.

When the clergyman had concluded his remarks and prayer, Squire Breed, who always presided over funerals of high degree, desired those who wished once more to look upon "our departed friend," to avail themselves of the present opportunity. I warrant you every one did take a peep, young and old. What a beautiful coffin! real mahogany, and all lined with white satin! Very still and pale the haughty Captain lay there and let them look, one and all, as much as ever they liked. Afterward the lid was screwed down, the coffin lifted by its silvered handles, and the Captain borne, feet foremost, through his splendid hall, down his handsome stone steps, along his shaded gravel-walk, never to come back again. "You will now please fall into procession!" says Squire Breed, authoritatively marshaling them. Every body obeys. First, after the clergyman and the bearers, come Mrs. Spooner and Hannah Maria, the former in a smart black silk, the latter in yellow barége; then a motley line, but orderly nevertheless; and the very trio who had sat in judgment by the kitchen fire-place failed not to bring up the rear. The bell tolled, and they walked slowly along. It was a calm, delicious afternoon in June when they carried Captain Gaylord to his last home—something less imposing, thought the followers, than that which he left behind. The costly coffin was inclosed in one of pine, and as the bearers lowered their burden into the narrow bed, six feet beneath the green sward, the birds trolled out glad carols, as if they had come to an especial merry-making. Two white marble slabs, close at hand, marked the graves of the Misses Sarah and Clementina Gaylord. Where was the third sister, the poor Fanny?

Had Captain Gaylord imagined that he kept his own affairs entirely to himself? Deluded man! He had known Mrs. Spooner to be a tolerably thrifty housekeeper, but he had never approximated an appreciation of her powers. There was not a pigeon-hole in his secretary whose contents were not known to her just as well as to himself; and long ago, little by little, there had come into her mind, first the possibility, next the desire, and, lastly, the determination, to avail herself of this knowledge. How many times it had happened that a will was laid away in some unsuspected place, and not brought to light, even for years! What harm if it so fell out in this case? She would not destroy a will—not for all the world—but was not her son, Ephraim Spooner, down at Greenfield, a shrewd lawyer? and there, too, resided the young person on whom this will conferred almost the whole of the great Gaylord estate; farms, bonds, and mortgages, bank-stock, and what not. Mrs. Spooner had indeed "indulged a hope" of finding her own services properly signaled; she was not so much as mentioned in the document. And since this was the case, what wonder that she dwelt upon the subject till she fancied that she could descry, though as yet only dimly and afar off, a way by which Ephraim's interests, and her own at the same time, might be promoted! At any rate she would not lose the chances; and so the will, duly executed—she knew enough to understand that—was, on the very day after the Captain's demise, transferred to a large-print copy of Josephus, and deposited at the bottom of a large wooden chest, the property of Mrs. Spooner, there for the present safely to repose.

That lady had little cause of complaint, however. During the years of her administration in that household she had received an ample, even a liberal compensation; for the Captain, to do him justice, was never close about money matters. Besides, he had allowed her to bring her daughter there, thus providing her a home free of expense. Now the most eligible plan Mrs. Spooner could devise was to betake herself to Greenfield, and form with Ephraim a joint-stock association in housekeeping—the expenses to be divided between them. She represented to him that, in this way, he could most cheaply compass the largest share of creature comforts; and as she knew that he would not regard it an exactly equitable arrangement that she should be furnished with bed and board for two, while contributing only a moiety of the cost, she farther planned that Hannah Maria should go on a visit to some far-away cousins to attend school, and pay her way by dint of working out of school hours. These circumstances all fell out precisely as she had foreordained.

A mile west of Putney village stands a deserted mill, doorless and windowless, seemingly in the last stages of decay. A solitary hemlock-tree standing near stretches its long, sombre branches quite across the sunken-in roof. Time is doing his best to efface every vestige of the ancient dam, and the brawling mill-stream leaps from gray rock to rock along its descending bed, and then disappears in the gloom of a ravine whose sides approach so near that the trunk of a fallen tree, chance-directed, bridges the chasm. A traveled road, a noted thoroughfare in the palmy days of stage-coaches, skirts the right bank of the stream, separated from it only by a low wall, or rather lengthened pile of stones, gathered from the carriage track; opposite ascends a range of pasture lands, by courtesy so called, strewn thickly with masses and splinters of rock of every imaginable shape and size. Blackened stumps, with here and there a tall trunk, charred and defiant of decay, attest that the element of fire has contributed to the ghastly dreariness of the place. A plentiful growth of briars has followed in the wake of the devastator, and a solitary tree, which has miraculously escaped, clings with brown, talon-shaped roots around the seamed and lichen-spotted granite. This drear-looking tract is sundered from the road by a fence sufficiently formidable to protect a far more tempting domain. The aspect of the inclosure sufficiently justifies its appellation—the Devil's Quarry.

A stone's-throw from the old mill the road curves around the base of the ascent, and beyond this curve the country wears quite another look. On the right rises the steep, well-wooded hill; on the left spreads a broad, green valley, with a clear, shining river flowing through its depths. The mill-stream, freed from its imprisoning walls, runs a quieter course, expanding when it reaches the level into a smooth pool, or pond, starred thick with white lilies, and sending off its surplus waters a tribute to the near river. Just at the most charming point, looking downward across the valley, and upward toward the spiry pines, stands a small, well-sheltered, pleasant-looking dwelling. A thicket of sweet-brier entirely conceals one end of the house; great clumps of barberry-bushes grow around it—that shrub against which the wheat-growers hold an invincible prejudice, but which is in itself extremely beautiful, assuming, as almost invariably it does, the form of a gigantic wheat-sheaf. It is one of my own prime favorites, from its earliest tiny leaves, as they emerge from the dark gray stem, with their dainty shape, velvety texture, and bright emerald green; then through the flowering time, those pretty panicles of lemon-hued flowers, with the mysterious stamens sensitive and alert at the approach of an intruder; and, finally, with its crowning glory, those exquisite drooping clusters of scarlet berries, like Fair Rosamond's mouth, "so dyed double red."

This house, long ago, was the miller's, and besides the house, certain acres, known as the Crossfield farm. There are people who seem to live in the world solely as targets for the arrows of outrageous fortune. Joseph Wetherell was one of these. A well-disposed, industrious man he was always; but, as the neighbors said, unlucky. He was long a tenant on this farm, which at length fell as an inheritance to his wife. Joseph ventured to hope that this circumstance was the turning in the tide of his affairs, and for a season things really bade fair to go prosperously with him. Then came a reverse; his children, one after another, sickened and died, all save one, who had gone to seek his fortune elsewhere before these hard times came. The mother, feeble and despondent always, lost all heart after her children's death, and soon followed them. Sickness brings expense, and to meet it, Joseph had been obliged to mortgage his farm; he could not redeem it, and one fine day he found himself fairly dispossessed, out of work and out of doors. So then he set his face Westward, to find a shelter with a kind-hearted and more fortunate brother, one who had already repeatedly urged him to come and try his luck where lands were better and stones fewer. It had chanced that the Crossfield farm, after changing owners two or three times, fell into the hands of Captain Gaylord, and it happened, moreover, that Philip, the absent son of Joseph Wetherell, was the rejected suitor of poor Fanny Gaylord.

Luke Tuft, and his sister, the widow Wilcox, were tenants of the farm at the time with which we have to do. Luke was a very small man, lithe and alert enough to delude you into the belief, unless you noticed his oldish face, keen, shrewd, close-set eyes, and the pent-house lid of stiff grayish hair projecting over them, that he was really a boy. Perhaps his ordinary garb contributed to this misconception; his "every-day clothes," in contradistinction from Sunday gear, including always a supernumerary garment worn exteriorly, exactly like an exaggerated pinafore, fashioned in winter of striped blue woolen, and in summer of tow cloth, with overalls to match. Mrs. Wilcox was much the more considerable-looking personage of the two. If she had honestly avowed what epithets she thought best expressive of her distinguishing traits, she would have said, "smart, sensible, and serious." She was tolerably good-natured, and yet despotic over Luke, whom she had taught his place, and kept in it, albeit he made sometimes a feeble, rush-light show of independence. She was tall, stout, and rosy; she had a liking for reasonable outward adornings, such as gay-colored calicoes, bright shawls, and caps with plenty of handsome bows of ribbon. Wind or rain, nothing kept her within doors when she chose to go out. She greatly delighted in "conference-meetings," and sometimes availed herself of the implied permission: "If any of the sisters have remarks to make an opportunity is afforded." Does it betoken retrogression, I wonder, that there is less of this particular manifestation of courtesy nowadays than formerly? or have the lordly sex proved, perhaps, in this as in other things, that, if you give them an inch the sisters will take an ell? And whatever is the reason that the sisters' voices, however agreeable and low-toned they might be in ordinary conversation, used invariably to shrill up to that ear-piercing key whose pathetic, scared quavering alone, by exciting our commiseration, held in abeyance our sense of the ludicrous!

Mrs. Wilcox and her brother had a boarder. In fact, their tenure of the premises was on the express condition that this boarder should find with them a permanent home. Food, firing, every thing was furnished her—the boarder was a woman—and, moreover, the munificent sum of fifty dollars a year. It was down in black and white, and the papers were in a lawyer's hands, so there was no evading the conditions. Howbeit, no disposition to evasion was manifested. The person was not a troublesome boarder, only she had some whimsies which must be complied with to the letter; for instance, it was her pleasure to have her meals brought to her own room; she occupied but one. At first Mrs. Wilcox proposed that they should add to the enjoyment of their refectations the zest of each other's society, but the boarder evinced then that the extreme calmness of her usual demeanor was not a part of herself, and could on occasion be laid aside—she would take her repasts exclusively by herself; and, on the whole, Mrs. Wilcox found this order of things rather more agreeable than that which herself had devised; for another peculiarity on the part of the new inmate was an unconquerable reluctance to meet unfamiliar people. She seemed instinctively aware of any unwonted arrival, and on such an occasion the tall sweet-brier which grew almost to the top of her window, and which she would not allow to be interfered with, was not shield sufficient; she drew the curtains close, even if that compelled her to sit in the twilight. Nevertheless, one did sometimes accidentally encounter the recluse. I myself did once. I had seen, in riding by the Devil's Quarry, an incredible quantity of unripe blackberries, and sufficient time having elapsed to bring them to perfection, I beguiled two little friends, members of the household where I was a guest, to accompany me to the gathering. They, however, preferred prospecting for squirrels; so I filled my own basket and sat down on a rock to await their return. While I was there, a woman of slender, bent figure came around the hill. She approached so near that I could quite distinctly see her features. I never looked on a living face so fixed, so stony, as if not happiness only, but the memory of it, were gone. She was meagre and sallow, the corners of the mouth were drawn downward, the cheeks hollowed, shriveled, lined; the eyes looked as if they had been sodden with tears till no color was left on them, till their very texture was changed: the hair, so much of it as was visible, was whiter than the poor pale forehead it shaded. She wore an antiquated sort of bonnet, a "calash," green in color, and much like the modern "ugly;" around her neck was an odd-looking, profuse, elaborately-embroidered frill; though the day was warm, she had wrapped around her a netted shawl of crimson wool, so large that it descended almost to her feet.

This time, certainly, she was not forewarned of a strange presence, for she walked leisurely along, stopping here and there to gather some of the white immortal flowers or large purple asters which grew around; and when she had come to a point whence she could best see the old mill she stood still, and, shading her dim eyes with her withered hand, looked wistfully over toward it for a few minutes, motionless as the dead pine trunk beside her. The blue sky was full of white, shining clouds, and the shadow of one of these fell around her; it seemed to chill her, for she shivered slightly, and drew her shawl closer. Then presently, as if her errand were accomplished, she turned and slowly walked toward the house, out of sight again. I confess freely that I followed her with eyes full of tears, for she seemed to have passed the gate on which is written—"Lasciate ogni speranza."

And this poor creature was what remained of Fanny Gaylord, the high-spirited, headstrong maiden who, a score of years ago, had roundly avowed to the face of her haughty brother and sisters her fixed resolve, in defiance of their opposition, to give her hand, as she had already given her love, to one whose only pretensions were worth, ability, and a strong attachment to herself. The trio, one and all, were disgusted, outraged, perplexed. But if she were determined, so were they no less, and they were three to one. Heaven only knows what measures they used to break down that high will to their own overweening pride; but they never flinched, and when one of the sisters died she left her mantle to the other; and when the second died, the brother found the work so completely done to his hand that he needed only to look about and find a home for Fanny with some quiet people, living far enough distant to take her well out of his way. The Crossfield farm had by this time come into Captain Gaylord's hands, and when Luke Tuft came to see about taking it, incidentally it came out in the conversation that Mrs. Wilcox was a very suitable person to take charge of Captain Gaylord's invalid sister—for that is what she had now become. If the thought ever presented itself that the place in question was the old home of Philip Wetherell, it was probably too insignificant for consideration. The affair was speedily decided, and as speedily executed. When Fanny Gaylord knew that she was about to change her abode, she said neither yea nor nay; she took no trouble about it, nor needed. Such clothing as she already had was packed for removal, and such as she required to have made was prepared without her voice in the matter. She passively put on bonnet and shawl when they were brought to her, and when, after this, she was left alone a few minutes, she went furtively to a bureau, and, pulling out a drawer, took from a hiding-place a little faded morocco pocket-book, which she hastily concealed about her person, and then, when they called her, she went away.

Fifteen years and more she had been shut up in that room. She had entered it still full of passionate resistance—still full of the energy of young life. She had been very beautiful, with a face brilliant as an oleander blossom, dark flashing eyes, and hair a proverb for its richness and lustre; she had been noted for grace and elegance of manner. And now she went away almost as veritable a corpse as if she had been carried in her coffin. Her brother stood at the window of his front parlor, thinking it wise to avoid excitement, and congratulating himself that it was all so quietly and expeditiously managed. She did not see him; she never once looked up. If she felt an added trouble at this change in her life, she kept it well to herself. The room assigned her in the new home she took without remark, and never voluntarily remained a moment in any other. Sometimes she went out a little way into the fields near the house, but she never spoke to any one whom she met, nor would she ever go to church. Often at night she had been heard walking about her room till a late hour. Sometimes she wrought assiduously at her old-fashioned needle-work or netting, at other times she spent whole weeks in listless inaction. One thing alone seemed to have a permanent interest for her, she liked to read the column of ship news in the weekly Boston paper, which Mrs. Wilcox and another "sister" took in partnership. To be sure the intelligence was none of the freshest by the time it reached Miss Gaylord, since the other partner had the first reading of the paper, but that circumstance no whit diminished the particularity with which every item was perused. Mrs. Wilcox, to do her justice, when she observed this inclination of Miss Gaylord's, administered to it very cheerfully.

One summer afternoon, when Mrs. Wilcox had been decorating with a fresh purple ribbon her brown straw bonnet, and was holding it off at a little distance to observe the effect, Luke came into the house at an unwonted hour, and with an independent briskness of step, rather foreign to his usual indoor demeanor. He planted himself in a chair, took off his straw-hat, and seeing no convenient place of deposit in his immediate vicinity, aimed it at a nail in the wall which it did not hit, and failing to hit, fell directly into the water-pail. The splash made Mrs. Wilcox look around, and the survey made her come at once to the rescue of the hat, and the immediate and violent purification of the water-pail, with plenty of appropriate remarks.

"You won't have to write that next letter to Captain Gaylord," said Luke, somewhat irrelevantly as it seemed.

"What do you mean to say by that?" asked his sister, a little sharply.

"He won't be likely to read any more letters, I guess," answered Luke.

"Is Captain Gaylord dead?" inquired Mrs. Wilcox, with a changed tone, her energetic action suddenly arrested.

"He's dead and gone," replied Luke; "if you know where he's gone, you know a heap more'n I do."

"Let us hope that he has entered into his reward," said Mrs. Wilcox. You see it was a way she had of talking.

"By all accounts that's exactly what he wouldn't like to enter into," rejoined Luke, whose way was a different one. They do say, "sister Wilcox"—just a soupcon of irony in that—"that he's been an all-fired hard case in some respects. I've nothing special against him myself; him and me always kept square. But I shouldn't want to swop with him now."

His sister took no notice of this remark; she was thoughtful and silent for the space of five minutes. "Well, I don't see," said she at length, "as it's going to make any odds with us. At all events, we shall all go on for the present, I suppose, just as we have. And now you're here, you can fasten that loose hinge of the wood-shed door."

"Ephraim Spooner, Esquire," in bright yellow letters on a green ground, indicated to all whom it might concern that a fountain of law was accessible in the little one-story office over the way from the new brick hotel in Greenfield. Mr. Spooner's residence was in the rear of his office, and a continuation of the same edifice. In a small, dingy apartment, which served the several uses of kitchen, dining-room, and sitting-room, Mrs. Spooner, with the skirt of her dress carefully pinned up out of harm's way, with her cap strings fastened at the back of her head, and with a general fly-away appearance, moved to and fro settling the room after the final meal of the day. These were different times from those of her dominion in Captain Gaylord's household. But then, it is incredible how little she contrived to live upon, herself and Ephraim. And the latter yielded the kitchen department to her sway without misgiving; he knew well it could not be in more frugal hands. This evening, by the same solitary lamp which illuminated her labors, Ephraim sat and pored over some hard-featured manuscripts, evidently of the species law-paper.

"Which was right, Ephraim, you or I, about the Fithian place?" said Mrs. Spooner, as she carefully set away in a closet some scraps of cold viands, and then, opening a door, rewarded the hungry mew of a gaunt-looking cat with a thrust into the outer darkness—"only that, and nothing more." A current of air extinguished the lamp, and while his mother sought and found a match wherewith to relight it, Mr. Spooner did not vary his position. He sat with his chair tilted back, and his feet elevated to the mantelpiece behind the rusty cooking-stove, which did double duty, not only preparing the food for their delectation, but also furnishing requisite warmth in cold weather. Ephraim's attitude, it is true, imposed on his mother the necessity of making a considerable circuit in the performance of some of her avocations, but neither of them seemed to regard that circumstance.

The query was repeated before it elicited a reply; "I can't tell you more about it than I could day before yesterday."

"Why didn't you go to the clerk's office? Didn't you find the record?"

"I went to the office, but there was nothing there. Just what you might expect. The man who was so high that no house but the best in town was good enough for him—who was so free with his money that a hundred dollars, more or less, would not stand in his way in a bargain—was, as I should think he would be, just fool enough to neglect seeing the deed recorded."

Mrs. Spooner kept her sharp little eyes fixed on Ephraim's. "What harm can come of that? It is not too late for it to be done still, is it?"

"Suppose the deed got lost, and there was nothing to show he ever bought the place or paid for it. I don't see then what hold his heirs have got on it."

Ephraim resumed the papers he had been examining. Mrs. Spooner, who during the discourse had been regulating her cap and dress, now took her knitting work and sat down on the flag-bottomed rocking-chair. But she was so intent on evolving in her own mind what might be Ephraim's reserved forces—for, like all wary people's, his speech was to his thought what the shop-keeper's inch "sample" is to the widespread glories of his delaines and calicoes—that the gray woolen stocking remained motionless in her suspended hand. Presently she smiled a slow, grim smile to herself, and, adjusting her knitting-sheath and spectacles, fell vigorously to work.

Some of the circumstances in question were these: A valuable estate was offered for sale at a fraction of its real worth. Ephraim, whose worldly possessions would not have availed to pay for half of it, had nevertheless—the time being one of great money-pressure and himself justly reputed a close-fisted, accumulative man—ventured to make the purchase; shrewdly confident that Mr. Fithian, whom he knew to be looking about for a pleasant homestead, would take the bargain off his hands. The event justified his foresight; the transfer was made, leaving Ephraim a gainer by the transaction to an amount not very startling certainly, but yet sufficient to encourage him in his favorite dream—that he should live to see himself the richest man in Greenfield. Mr. Fithian had scarcely become the occupant of his new home when he suddenly died, leaving his possessions to Miss Helen Fithian, his sole surviving child; and here that lady, still Miss Fithian, had ever since resided. She would have been very lonely but for the presence of her young friend and relative, Grace Fithian Gaylord, the daughter of her deceased and only sister. In a recent railroad disaster one of the witnesses to the deed about which Ephraim and his mother were discoursing had been gathered to his fathers. The remaining witness was Mrs. Spooner herself.

Mrs. Spooner, then, sat pondering these things when she heard a light tap at the door, and, opening it, discovered the very individual with whom her thoughts had just now for one moment been occupied—Lucy Hill, the village dress-maker. Lucy smilingly accepted an invitation to enter, Ephraim meanwhile having suddenly retreated to his own sanctum, the office, leaving the intervening door ajar, so that he could still, if he liked, listen to the conversation. She was a rather pretty girl, Lucy Hill, with a broad rosy face, eyes like black beads, and smooth, shining hair; she was very deft with her needle, and therefore much in request. It was surmised that she had money laid up in the Savings bank.

She had come to see if Mrs. Spooner couldn't wait a little while about the new waist to her black silk dress. Miss Fithian wanted her the rest of this week and the next. She had already finished two dresses, and there were several more. Usually Miss Fithian and Miss Gaylord sewed with her, but they were going to Springfield Wednesday morning, and would not be home till Friday night; so that left her the more to do.

Mrs. Spooner was quite unusually gracious to Lucy this evening; so was Ephraim too, for he did what he had never done before; when he heard Lucy preparing to depart he came out from the office, as if accidentally, and seeing her at the door offered to escort her home.

Lucy was pleased at this; it was really a distinction. For though Mr. Spooner was any thing but personally agreeable, being in fact a little notorious for homeliness both of aspect and demeanor, he was still a man of mark, because he was of those who, given the mere postulate of time, are sure to turn out rich.

It is wonderful how accessible are some women's hearts. Ephraim was the merest empiric; I do not suppose he had ever before tried his skill in any thing of the kind, but before he had seen Lucy to Miss Fithian's gate—to be sure he led her a rather roundabout way—he had convinced her, without saying it out either, that he had long been her ardent though silent admirer. Nay, he had ventured mystically to hint, that if all the people in the world had their due, that very mansion, imposing as it looked there, with its ivy-wreathed verandas, and handsome French windows through whose transparent curtains the solar lamp shone with such cheerful brilliancy, would, in all probability, belong to another than its present occupant.

"You see, Lucy," said the wily serpent, "I speak right out to you. In fact, I feel to-night—you must excuse me, but I can't help it—just as if our interests were somehow connected."

Lucy, poor little foolish thing, said she was sure she took an interest—she did not know how to finish.

"Don't you think you could come and see mother a while to-morrow evening?" asked Ephraim. "Mother thinks a great deal of you. She was saying this morning she wished you would come oftener."

Lucy didn't know but she could; she guessed she might, perhaps.

Ephraim bade her good-night at the gate, leaving her in a flutter of silly delight; while he, deceitful above all things and desperately wicked, was congratulating himself, and despising her for this facile success, which he chose to regard as an earnest of the results of a far more important scheme—one, indeed, seen by himself as yet, only as through a glass, darkly.

The next morning Miss Fithian sat in the breakfast-room, reading. It was just a pleasant room; every thing about it, the mistress included, looked altogether sensible, tasteful, and comfortable. The table, spread for the morning refecton, looked charmingly attractive, particularly the glittering coffee-service. Entered Daphne, an ebony-hued matron, with shining face, her crisped locks decorated with a turban, winged like the cap of Mercury, and fashioned out of a crimson and yellow Madras handkerchief. She brought in one hand a pitcher of milk, and in the other, a dish lined with vine-leaves and heaped with brilliant scarlet strawberries. At another door came in Grace Gaylord, bringing a basket full of flowers, among them some superb moss-roses, with the dew-spangles still on them.

"Look, Aunt Helen!" said she; "look! what beauties! and there are buds enough to keep us supplied with plenty of such for a fortnight. Besides, those in the north garden have hardly begun to come on yet. Do you know what a perfect morning it is? Just listen to the birds!"

"You oughter heard 'em this mornin'," said Daphne, with a toss of her turban. "When I got up the clock hadn't struck four, and they was a-goin' it."

"Too early, Daphne!" said Miss Fithian.

"You should keep better hours; five o'clock is quite soon enough for you."

"Bless you! no, Miss Fithian," returned Daphne. "I couldn't lie abed till five o'clock, no-how! First place, I put the bread spongin' last night, so's to get it riz and baked 'fore it's hot. Next place, I milked; Horner gives the big tin pail full; can't bear to have a man mussin' roun' an' milkin'; never could! Next place, I churned. Butter looks ef cows lived on dandelions; just you look in that creamer! Takes a sight o' cream for our family, but we've got enough, thank goodness!"

She busied herself placing the chairs at the table and bringing vases for the flowers, and went on: "Come, Miss Lucy!"—to the young woman in the next room, of which the door stood open—"come and eat your breakfast. Lie abed in the mornin'!" repeated she. "Wouldn't do it if I had to pick up chips 'n throw 'em down again! Why, ain't no time o' day so pleasant as the fresh of the morning! Old Miss Sperry sent you word you don't send her no more black tea, cause it don't agree with her; much as she could do to drink it. She says poor folks got feelin's to 'em all the same as rich folks." Daphne's eyes and teeth glittered more than usual, for she enjoyed the humor of this, old Mrs. Sperry for a long time having been Miss Fithian's pensioner.

"Very well, Daphne; send her green tea the next time, and some white sugar, too," said Miss Fithian.

"She wants a frock for little Nance," continued Daphne; "something that won't tear, she says, cause she don't want to keep patchin'; her eyes is got to be poor. You better get her a good strong home-made gingham. I'll sew it for her myself, if you'll let Lucy cut it out."

"I'll attend to it at once, Daphne," said Grace; "any thing else?"

"Susy Lee's been here to tell you somebody's put her cow into the pound, and she hain't got no money to get her out again. She says she'll work, but I told her we ain't got nothing for her to do. I'm pestered myself to find enough to keep me from settin' holdin' my hands. But I knowed you'd help her, all the same, cause she's poor."

This matter also was arranged.

"My scissors stuck in the floor last night," pursued Daphne; "they pintoed right that way; so somebody's comin' from there. And there was three letters in my candle; so you see if you don't hear from somebody or other to-day." She had spent her quiver, and disappeared kitchenward.

Miss Fithian and Grace talked over the practicability of a flight of rude stone steps down the slope from the back of the garden to the river. When this subject and the breakfast were disposed of, Grace took her way to the village, half a mile distant, to do some errands, of which the chief were, to bring home whatever might await them at the post-office—Daphne's prognosticated letters inclusive—and to buy the strong dress for old Mrs. Sperry's little grand-daughter. She met now and then a man going to his work, or a child on its way to the district school, for each and all of whom she had a cheerful greeting; she was one of those whose very presence is sunshiny. Her purchases were speedily made, and she next directed her steps toward the post-office. As she entered here, she received a profound and awkward salutation from a person with whom she had never before exchanged such courtesies; nor could it now be called an exchange, for with no thought of appropriating the honor, she inadvertently glanced behind her, to see for whom a salam so deferential could have been intended. There was a harvest of newspapers, pamphlets, and letters; and this perhaps was the reason why she never bestowed another thought on Ephraim Spooner, Esquire, for he, no less, was the knight of the elaborate bow. Not so unheeding was Squire Spooner. His thoughts ran something on this wise:

"Stuck up, eh? Well, I knew that already. But before six months are gone by, just see if she isn't Mrs. Ephraim Spooner for all that. And who knows, after all, if there will be any need of such an overture at the house there as I spoke of to Lucy last night? Lucy—faugh! I couldn't put up with a fool like Lucy, if she was to inherit the whole Gaylord property."

A few steps from the door Mr. Parker overtook Grace; they were old friends, Mr. Parker and herself. He walked on with her toward home. They met half-witted Harry Willard and stopped to speak with him. Mr. Parker desired him to come soon and see if his garden were all right. It always pleased Harry extremely that gentlefolks should notice him thus. Mr. Parker and Grace thought the weather had never been lovelier than for the last week or two; showers at night, just enough to keep the foliage perfect, and days either brilliant or soft; no dryness, no excessive heat. When they reached the house Miss Fithian was on the veranda, busied with her needle-work. Mr. Fithian would not have a chair; he sat down on the steps.

"You have made the view perfect on this side," said he; "two spires, that bend in the river, and the summit of Monadnock, all brought into sight by the removal of a single tree. How does the ash endure its transplanting?"

Grace, who was coming with strawberries and cream for Mr. Parker, said it did not know it had been stirred at all; it had flowered full, and would have no end of red bunches in the fall.

Miss Fithian said they were indebted to Mr. Parker for suggesting a way in which the removal could be carried into effect without the loss of the favorite tree.

Mr. Parker was Miss Fithian's adviser, and Grace left them. Indeed she had something of her own to think of.

"Lockhart of Fitzwilliam writes me," said he, "that three years ago Captain Gaylord instructed him to draw up a will including a considerable bequest, in fact the most of his estate, to your Grace. Gaylord was a strange man, but it seems an unlikely thing that he should destroy that will without making some other disposal of his affairs. Nevertheless nothing of the kind has been forthcoming. I should have liked it well enough for Grace; it would not have spoiled her. Very likely she would have been neither more nor less happy for it."

Miss Fithian was a little slow to reply: truth to tell, she had already, with womanlike celerity, laid the lower course of a handsome edifice in Spain.

"But I came this morning to get that bond of Wilmer's; we need it. Now can you tell in what possible lurking-place, in what cranny of a drawer, or work-box, or cabinet, or secretary, it may be? I ought to have sent you word last week; women can never tell—"

A malicious libel, Miss Fithian averred. She had one only place in the world for business papers—fortunately she had few documents of the kind; this contained them all. She had entered the room and brought thence a light writing-case.

As Miss Fithian went in, Lucy, who dearly loved to listen to every thing, and who had taken a position in the next room as near the door as she dared, suddenly and safely retreated. She had not lost a word of the conversation, however, and what she heard she always remembered.

After Mr. Parker was gone Miss Fithian read the letters and newspapers. While she was reading Grace came through the house, bringing in her hand Miss Fithian's garden bonnet. Whatever was it that made the child so beautiful? Such a clear splendor as shone in her eyes, a dewy tenderness over them, too; her cheeks a little paler than usual, perhaps; her scarlet lips tremulous; and her voice sounded different from its usual tone, though she only said—"I want you, Aunt Helen." So they went down the garden walk together, toward the river.

When they were away from the house Grace began: "Oh, Aunt Helen, I can not think why it is that you and every one else have always been so good to me! The very best mother that ever lived could have been no kinder, not more thoughtful and gentle and loving toward me than you have been invariably, ever since I can remember. God only knows how dearly I love you, how much I thank you. And now, only think, Aunt Helen! Randolph has written to me; he has come home; he is in New York; and, Aunt Helen, he says he loves me, and wishes me to be his wife. He says I must have known this two years ago; only he thinks he had then no right to say it to me; but he has succeeded beyond what he dared expect, and now, if I can answer to his wish, he will not go away again. Indeed I did not know he loved me. I have thought sometimes that the woman he did love would be very happy; but that he, so wise, so manly, and excellent, so beautiful every way, should care as he does for me! I can't make it seem real, Aunt Helen, but I would not have it otherwise for the world!" And then, happy as she was, she cried like a child, and I am not sure but Aunt Helen did too. I know they staid down in the garden till Daphne called them to dinner.

Happiness dulls some consciences; Grace's it quickened. She had plenty of time for thought that July night, for she never fell asleep at all till Daphne was astir. One resolve she had firmly taken—that she would find out that poor old aunt of hers, of whom she had heard, but whom she had never seen, who had once been young and loved too; she would find her out, and try to impart to her some of her own happiness.

She slept so late in the morning that Miss Fithian came to summon her to breakfast. They were going to Springfield in the early train, and there was no time to lose. So while Grace made herself ready, brushed and braided that beautiful chestnut-brown hair, and donned her pretty gray traveling-dress, they talked over what she had been thinking about. Miss Fithian, unused to say her nay, was hardly likely to thwart Grace on this point; she approved and seconded her wish, and it was determined that it should be put in execution as soon as possible after their return from Springfield.

Lucy usually took a walk after her day's sewing. The evening after Miss Fithian and Grace went to Springfield she failed not to call on Mrs. Spooner, nor did Ephraim fail to accompany her homeward. Lucy's tongue was loosened; and, finding that her attendant listened with apparent interest, her volubility grew unlimited. Every thing she had seen, every word she had heard, she detailed. Mr. Parker's call, the talk about the will, the rallery in reference to the place where business-papers were kept, nothing was omitted. In his turn Ephraim informed Lucy that he had lost several papers of much importance—that he had reason to suppose they might be in Miss Fithian's possession—that the recovery of them would make a difference to him personally of several thousands of dollars, in some business which he had to settle. At first Lucy did not divine what was required of her, but when she did, she demurred nothing thereat. The feeblest rush-light is more than lure enough for the silly moth. The timely absence of Miss Fithian and Miss Gaylord furnished the very best of opportunities, since there would be about the premises only John, the man-servant, who slept in a room beyond the wood-shed, and Daphne, who occupied a chamber near that assigned to Lucy, and who, as Lucy had audible proof, was a sound sleeper. Perhaps Ephraim felt a misgiving at Lucy's entire absence of consideration, since it implied such extreme folly. In any case, however, he trusted in his own craft for salvation.

Harry Willard, the demented, stood in the shadow of the cedar-hedge which surrounded Miss Fithian's garden. It was not a cold night, and yet Harry was shaking, for, like Wordsworth's lunatic, he was smitten with a perpetual shiver. Summer or winter, thinly clad or warmly, he walked about with his arms folded, and shook as if an ague fit were on him. He was no longer young, and there were people in the village who remembered him a bright, promising boy; a fall on the ice had changed him from that into a quaking, moping, and mowing lunatic. Harry had a home in the poor-house, but in the summer time he chose to occupy a little deserted shanty, where he staid at night, wandering about the neighborhood during the day, entirely harmless, troublesome to none except to the young woman who chanced for the time to be the object of his gallant attentions. His likings, however, were so notoriously mutable that the transitoriness of the annoyance rendered it endurable. The present queen of his devoirs was Lucy, the dress-maker.

It was a clear night; the moon was near the full, and already far in the west, for it was late. Ever since nine o'clock poor, witless Harry, who had seen Lucy and Ephraim walking together, and who had followed them in the bootless hope of an opportunity, unobserved by the latter, to offer Lucy a bouquet, one which he had that afternoon begged from Mr. Parker's garden expressly for her, and made up of the most brilliant flowers that grew there—larkspurs, sweet-williams, London pride, marigolds, and great red roses—ever since Lucy, entering, had shut the high wire gate with a clang and walked rapidly up toward the house, while Ephraim went his ways, Harry had stood there. And still he stood and looked around him. Doubtless he felt through his shattered intellect the tranquil loveliness, the mysterious beauty of the night. The shadows of the tall elm-trees slanted over the moonlit grass, the trunks in long prostrate columns, the foliage in irregular inky-black masses, through the branches overhead the sky was purple, cloudless, and flecked with only the largest stars. Not a leaf was astir; shrill insect sounds, the fall of a far-off brook, seldom heard at this distance, alone broke—intensified rather—the perfect calm. Suddenly—his senses of sight and hearing were preternaturally acute—he heard some one stealthily approaching. He soon recognized Ephraim, and cowered silently farther into the shadow. He heard the click of the raised fastening of the gate; he heard Lucy's voice, and not a syllable of the few words interchanged between the two escaped him. A fierce, jealous anger sprang up in him, but fear was more powerful still; often and often has Ephraim, out of pure evil-mindedness, terrified him with dire threats of some vague, horrible infliction; so the strong passion is conquered by the stronger. He listens to Lucy, again and again urging Ephraim to expedition; he hears the ready, oily replies and promises of the latter; he sees him receiving from Lucy's hand something—what it is he knows not—the gate is carefully, silently closed, not fastened; Lucy goes with noiseless steps toward the house, and Ephraim walks along the opposite way. He turns down a lane where the trees are thick, walking always in the shadow, and keeps along the river bank. A little way down there stands an old dwelling, long deserted, apart from all others, the doors half-wrenched from their hinges, and the windows broken. Here, cautiously avoiding all needless sound, Ephraim enters. With stealthy steps Harry has followed him, sufficiently near to keep him in sight. Harry too approaches the old house; he does not enter, but looks in through the broken window. Him too the shadows favor; a butternut-tree, its lower branches drooping tent-wise, effectually screens him. At first it is so dark that he can not see, but presently Ephraim lights a lantern. This is darkened on three sides, but the fourth shines brightly on his cunning, wicked face, and Harry sees that he has with him what seems to be a kind of leathern box. It is locked, for Ephraim applies a key: that one does not answer, and he tries another and yet another: the last is successful, the lock has yielded. Package after package, Ephraim looks carefully over some papers; he selects several and lays them apart; the others are restored to their place, the key is again turned, the selected papers are deposited in a leathern pocket-book, the light is extinguished, and a moment or two afterward Ephraim emerges from the door, and so out into the clear, pure, dewy night. The moon nears the horizon now; he walks slowly—he would much rather it were dark. What sound is that like footsteps? He stands quite still to listen. Harry, who does not know this, proceeds quietly, steadily onward. Ephraim sees but does not recognize him, and, unnerved by the cowardice of guilt, he starts aside. The edge of the bank was nearer than he knew. The turf, undermined, yields beneath him. Instinctively he throws away that which he was carrying, and clutches at some boughs overhead. Too late! there is a heavy crashing sound, then a sullen plunge into the water—that is all. There is none looking on, and if there were any, none could see, for it is black darkness down there; the bed of the river is low, and no ray of moonlight reaches it now. The water, though still, is swift and deep.

Harry hears the fall, and it arrests him: he looks cautiously all around; Ephraim is nowhere visible. There is a glimmer of moonlight on something bright lying on the grass yonder: attracted by the sheen, Harry approaches and takes it up; it is the writing-case with its polished steel lock. He knows it to be what Ephraim took from Lucy, for he saw its glitter when she gave it to him. He will carry it back to her, he thinks; so onward he goes, the cherished nosegay still in his hand.

Lucy, with a shawl drawn over her head, crouches near a thicket of lilacs just inside the gate, awaiting Ephraim's return. It has grown so dark now that she can not distinguish the approaching figure till very near; she has already spoken before she is aware that it is not Ephraim but Harry Willard. Bewildered, she asks, "Why, where is Ephraim! how came you by this?" But it is difficult to obtain a sensible response from Harry at any time; she will have to do with conjectures of her own instead of replies to her questioning. At all events it is something to have the writing-case in her possession again;

she had become half afraid in the dark there. "An odd messenger to choose," she thinks; "crazy Harry Willard!" Meanwhile she accepts unheeding the flowers which he, grown shamed-faced in her presence, offers without the speech he had intended to make. "Good-night, Harry—go home!" she says, in a low tone, but authoritatively, while she silently secures the fastening of the gate. He obeys, and Lucy, with a guiltier feeling than she had ever known before, creeps up the walk, enters the house by the veranda window, which she closes after her, feels her way through the darkness up to her own room, and goes to bed. Sleep does not come at her bidding though, and when at last it approaches it brings bad dreams. She is riding with Ephraim; all at once she discovers that their carriage is the hearse, with a coffin for a seat, and that she is wearing the pall draped around her instead of a shawl. Then they are married, and with the thought that there is no help for it, she feels an inexpressible loathing toward him. There is the ghost of a glad feeling when she wakes out of this to find it only a dream. So the rest of the night wears on, and by morning she is really ill.

A soft gray vapor filled the whole river valley next morning. Quite early it seemed likely to rain, but a few counter indications, such as the misty webs on the grass, the wide-open dandelions, and the upright column of smoke from the kitchen chimney, triumphantly vindicated themselves. The vapor lifted, detached itself into rounded, silver-white masses, and disappeared.

"Miss Lucy," said Daphne, "if you'll please to 'scuse me, I'll bring your breakfast in here this morning, cause it's going to be fust rate to clean house; 'n I want to take up the carpet in the other room when I can catch a chance. Miss Fithian don't never like to be all topsy-turried, so I allus do it when she's gone away." Lucy did not demur, only she didn't care for any breakfast this morning. "Be you sick?" inquired Daphne, "cause you look all kind o' brown round your eyes, 'n you're pale, too. Don't you feel well?"

No, Lucy said; her head ached a good deal.

Daphne would fain have administered some of her favorite specifics, but Lucy thought she should be better by-and-by without any thing.

Busy as a bee was Daphne all day, but her song was something louder; she had a special liking for Methodist hymn-tunes, and always the harder she worked the more zealously she sang; so it was to-day. Once she bethought herself to inquire if the noise disturbed Lucy, offering in that case to forego her gratification. Lucy said she was not disturbed; but that was, nevertheless, the most wretched day she ever experienced; a sense of guiltiness, superstitious fears, and a foreboding of some dreadful evil oppressed her, till she was really unable to work. She wished she could go to her own home; but that was too far away. Daphne, with all her hurry, would fain have prepared some delicacy to tempt her appetite; but she would have nothing. In the afternoon she put on her bonnet, and said she was going to the house of an aunt who lived in the village. On her way she called at Mrs. Spooner's, and learned that Ephraim had not been at home since the preceding evening; his mother thought he might have gone on the night train up the river to Charlestown; he had recently spoken of business which would call him there. Lucy's aunt, observing how ill she looked, said she was not fit to sew, and that she should keep her until she was better.

Seven o'clock came, and with it came Miss Fithian and Grace. Daphne had taken care to prepare a most tempting supper. Mr. Parker came in unexpectedly, and occupied a place at the table, whose appetizing odor, he averred, greatly to Daphne's delight, had lured him thitherward. The delicate broiled chicken, the golden-brown waffles, Daphne's especial pride, and the fragrant Mocha, offered a very enticing bill of fare, and were properly appreciated.

When Daphne came in to clear the table she brought intelligence that a man had that afternoon been found drowned, two miles down the river, at the flume; it was one of the villagers—Mr. Spooner, the lawyer, she had heard.

"Was it true?" they asked Mr. Parker.

"Yes, it was true: there had been an inquest—Accidental drowning."

They talked this over as people do in a country place; Miss Fithian and Grace asking about the man's friends, pitying his mother, and glad there were no wife and children to be made sorrowful. Mr. Parker walked up and down the room till Daphne had finally disappeared; then he asked,

"Miss Fithian, besides Daphne and John, whom have you had about the house lately?"

"There had been no one," she replied; "not an individual, except Lucy Hill, the dress-maker. She was sewing there now; only this afternoon she had a headache, and was gone over to the village to see her aunt. Mr. Parker knew Lucy Hill?"

"Yes, I have seen her," he said; "and you have entire confidence in her trustiness?"

Oh, certainly; entire confidence. Why, Lucy was almost one of the family; they called one room Lucy's room. They had known her these three years; they all liked her, she was so obliging and quiet. Oh yes, indeed, Miss Fithian said: she was sure she could rely entirely on Lucy.

Even while she was saying it they were interrupted. Lucy herself stood at the door with a white, scared face, which none of them ever forgot.

"Miss Fithian," she said, "I can not ask you to forgive me; I have no right to ask that. I have been too guilty, too ungrateful to you, to whom I owed so much. Only do let me confess to you how dreadfully wicked I have been."

So she told the whole, extenuating no circumstance, nor exonerating herself in the least particular. It would all be made public to-morrow, she said, and she deserved it; she deserved the worst that could befall her.

Her penitence was so genuine that it moved them one and all, even calm, clear-sighted Mr. Parker. Miss Fithian spoke kindly and encouragingly to her—assured her of her own forgiveness and compassion—called Mr. Parker to witness that there was no need of giving publicity to Lucy's share in the transaction she so much regretted, nor any wisdom in doing so.

Truly Lucy's repentance needed not to be repented of. A serious illness ensued upon this excitement, from which, however, she recovered, and thenceforth she was a wiser and better woman.

Poor Harry, obedient to Lucy, had gone home to his shanty. As usual, after a late evening, he slept very soundly and very long; he did not appear again in the village till the inquest was over. When he did come he told his story, but interweaving with it so much which was evidently imaginary that it obtained little credence.

Almost immediately after Ephraim's death, with the conviction that no possibility now existed of turning the document to her own profit, and, it may be, with a dim sense that retributive justice had overtaken her, Mrs. Spooner decided to bring to light the hidden will. So she sent for Mr. Parker, and made it over to him, with a story of how she had that very day discovered it in an old volume, accidentally brought away from Captain Gaylord's, and which, till just now, had remained unopened. This version, not very probable certainly, but admitting neither proof nor refutation, passed unquestioned. The will was proved and uncontested, so making Grace a lassie of abundant "means."

Mr. Parker and Miss Fithian—Mr. and Mrs. Parker they are now—were duly pleased with the turn things had taken. Grace herself did not know whether to be glad or troubled until she had Randolph's view of the matter. Randolph did not deem it requisite, in consequence, to alter his plans for the future; he had already succeeded in that which he had most at heart, and with health, ability, resoluteness of purpose, and, more than all, firmness of religious principle; he could have no misgiving.

One pleasant morning, very soon after these occurrences, Mrs. Wilcox was taken by surprise. Two ladies had alighted from a carriage and were approaching the door. Mrs. Wilcox was a little fluttered, for, as she afterward said, she knew at a glimpse they were real ladies; and she had only just time to hasten to a bureau and get out another cap, which in her hurry she put on over the one she already wore—a circumstance very mortifying to her in the retrospect, when they knocked for admittance.

People who had seen Fanny Gaylord in her youth said that Grace was very like her, but no such thought occurred to Mrs. Wilcox at the sight of the fair brilliant young face, with its clear hazel eyes and drooping chestnut curls; she would have been reminded rather of that splendid carnation, just come into bloom, on the window-seat there.

She went in to prepare Miss Gaylord for a guest.

Apparently there was some reluctance on that lady's part, for Mrs. Wilcox's voice was heard in a tone of expostulation. At last it was announced that the young lady might enter.

When Grace went in, Miss Gaylord sat in her arm-chair, upright and rigid, and regarded her steadfastly with eyes that seemed to have forgotten long, long ago how to express any gladness. And sitting there thus immovable, in the green-curtained room whose light exaggerated her pallor, clad in her antiquated costume, a white handkerchief drawn around her face and tied beneath the chin, she looked weird and ghostly enough to intimidate any one less in earnest than Grace; she, kind heart, felt enough warmth within her to melt away that ice. All the compassion of her nature was awakened; she had much ado to sustain her self-control. She had planned beforehand what to say, but she never thought of that now; she sat down on a low seat, and took in her own hands those others, so pale and thin with large purple veins.

"Aunt Fanny," she began, "I am your niece, Grace Gaylord, your brother William's daughter—I have come to see you."

No answer at first; the eyes still kept their cold, steady look: at length, "What do you want with me?" she said.

"Only, if I could, to make you happier, Aunt Fanny. May I tell you just what I do want?—to persuade you to come home with me. I will take the very best care of you—I will do every thing in the world I can for you. Do come now, Aunt Fanny; at all events, do come for a little while, and try how you like us. I should so dearly love to make you happier."

"Happier!" repeated Miss Gaylord; "it is a great many years too late for that—more years than you have seen." The stony eyes softened, actually two great tears gathered in them and rolled down the colorless cheeks. Grace renewed her entreaties. Miss Gaylord shook her head.

"Where do you live?" she asked, after a pause. Grace told her.

"You say you are my brother William's child: have you brothers and sisters?" Grace answered that she had none. She had had two brothers; both were lost with her father.

"You should thank God, then," said Miss Gaylord. "If they had lived they would hate you, insult you, do worse than to kill you; and what then?—you would hate them too. So just thank God that you have neither sister nor brother. Only William was ever good to me, and he is long ago dead, and his wife too. You are his child, you say, and your name is Grace. Well, Grace, I can see William's looks in you; but don't you ask me to go away from this place. I never shall, while I live—never."

Grace tried vainly to persuade her. Afterward, when her persevering efforts had made the poor lady regard her with affection, she renewed the attempt, but to no purpose. Yet she had the pleasure of knowing that she made the rest of that lonely, blighted life less dreary.

Miss Gaylord survived her brother, Captain

Gaylord, less than two years. When she felt that her death was approaching, she requested that she might be buried in the grave-yard at the foot of the hill: the request was of course complied with. A few weeks afterward a gentleman, past middle age, staid a day or two in the village. He seemed to feel an interest in every person and every thing about it; he took long walks, and once, after spending an hour around the old mill, he knocked at Mrs. Wilcox's door. He asked many questions, and, Miss Gaylord's name being incidentally mentioned, he listened so attentively that Mrs. Wilcox was induced to give him many particulars of that poor lady's history. When questioned in his turn, he accounted for his interest in the place by the circumstance that he had himself once lived there, and gave her his name, Philip Wetherell.

Grace, now Mrs. Randolph Lee, resides in one of our eastern cities. She is one of the very happiest, as well as one of the most altogether charming persons I have ever known.

CARLSBAD ON CRUTCHES.

Second Paper.

IV.

AS I have heretofore remarked, the first few days after my arrival in the grand hospital of Carlsbad, I was guided, in the topography of the town and general observation of the waters and inhabitants, by the medium of a donkey-cart; in which vehicle I went rolling from point to point, according to the temper and inclination of the donkey himself. But as he was a time-honored institution of the place—with a back like an old hair trunk and ears like strips of gutta percha—who had practiced professionally with generations of maimed or halting patients, he had, in some degree, acquired their habits, and rarely extended his rambles beyond the most contracted limits; so that my own explorations were in consequence rather circumscribed. So soon, however, as I could limp about on my own legs and crutch, I dispensed with the aid of my obstinate donkey attendant, and began the treatment—or cure, as it is termed—after the general mode. This interval, however, gave me the opportunity of studying the natural history of the country, though that, too, was by no means extensive. In fact, the only animals I observed besides the donkey breed were dogs and pigs. The dogs were of the white-half-shaved-woolly species, with intelligent muzzles and small round feet like checkers; all evidently propagated without a sinister blemish from the portrait of Zum Weissen Pudel, which one sees at the upper end of the little Prado. As for the pigs, they are a long-legged, wiry race, and capable of great physical endurance. They seem to have descended from an Arabian stock of the desert, with much bone and not an ounce of superfluous meat, or even so much as a ham-sandwich upon them; and I should say, from the malevolent look out of their cruel gimlet eyes and length of snout, that they were of vicious dispositions and delighted in tusk combats; highly dangerous indeed to the pig-sticking nobles of Bohemia, who are fond of preying upon them in spearing pursuits of the chase.

I had likewise leisure, during this donkey relaxation, to take a mental inventory of the furniture of my lodgings—especially the chairs and tables, which were manifestly modeled after the pigs I have described. Many pigs of tapering structure have, no doubt, stood at no remote periods to furniture artists in designing the forms one sees in Bohemian lodgings. The crooked leg, the sharp split hoof, and carved medallion boars' heads and bristles are always truthfully copied. As for the German bedsteads, it is impossible to state at what era of the world's history, by whom invented, or for what purpose, or by what architectural freak they were devised. They are simply boxed parallelograms, containing a hard sack of hair, a loose bundle of feathers, and so indecently short that one is led to wonder in despair for what race of Liliputs they could have been originally intended. The bedclothes are likewise surprising, commonly a thick quilted coverlet with a sheet stitched to the under side, and sometimes a large-sized napkin to lie upon. But a really comfortable bed, with its proper human equipment, has never yet been found in travelers' abodes in all Germany. Then the washing apparatus is another mystery, varying, in material and shape, all through the country, though never big enough to rinse a doll-baby's face in. At Carlsbad the contrivances are either flat oval pie-plates or else small soup dishes of the capacity of coffee cups, scarcely as large as some of the meerschaum pipe-bowls transmitted as heir-looms in ancient families; but yet quite equal to any water and ewer emergencies which the natives apparently care to indulge in.

The first intimation I had of having become a resident of the town was the presentation of a regular and official printed document, by which I learned that, for the inestimable privilege of using the waters, I was to pay five florins for the embellishment of the public grounds, and two florins additional for the support of the great leader and composer—with his coadjutors in music—the Herr Labitzky. In return for these florins, the Imperial Council of Prague, under a special edict, dating any time from the beginning of the present century, had been pleased to cause my name to be inscribed on the list of visitors, and to remit the tax heretofore imposed on the keys of the Latrina, together with other exemptions, which I do not feel called upon specially to recite, and ending by invoking my charity for the support of a hospital for sick strangers and poor persons. To all of which requests—they being humane and moderate—I willingly contributed.

The next document I inspected was the Cur-list, which is published daily, and contains a correct transcript of your passport, including your name, titles, profession, and country, all done into the German language. As I had read in one of Murray's universal guide-books that Carlsbad was a great resort for crowned heads, I, of course, lost no time in reading over the Cur-list from beginning to end, so that I might make myself acquainted with the rank and pedigrees of the monarchs with whom I should be brought in drinking contact. But to my chagrin, among the two thousand and some hundreds of guests there was not the least hint or vestige of an emperor, king, or kaiser. An English duke, two or three lords, a brace of Bohemian princes, a few Austrian Herzogs, and no end of counts were all remarkable. Among lesser notabilities, however, there was no lack; but since I could not understand their callings, or even pronounce their names properly, it gave me no great satisfaction. Here are a few of the names which I copy from the list before me: Frau Sabine Bokatcher; Verlagsbuchhändlers-Witwe in Böhmen; Juliana Stoboy, Steuereinehmer aus Prag; Herr Swoboda Pilliwax, Doktor der Domprobst und Finanzprocuratur-adjunkt; Karl Pippig Zschetzscwhe, Galanteriewaarenhändler; Herr Hellmuth Papi Hellenstein, Zuckerfabriksbeister mit Bruder; Excellenz Herr Graf von Suppankik, Bevollmächtigter und Ausserordentlicher aus Padderborn; Herr Benbow Diner, Rittergutsbesitzerin mit Gesellschaftlerin aus Diepensee; Frau Binneball Beer mit Tochter aus Gross-Oschersleben.

V.

Stored with all the foregoing abstract knowledge, I arose one morning and emerged from my domicile out upon the Wiese. It was not six o'clock, and the mist was coming down like fine mustard seed shot in my face from the steep sides of the Hirschsprung. The bakers' shops, however, were open, and the graveled walk was nicely swept and raked into fanciful patterns for the day. Peasant girls, trim and tidy, with baskets of flowers on their heads, were tripping along to the fountains, while moving in opposite directions were others of their sex—quite unsexed, however, to all outward appearance—going to their early toil in the fields, to be hitched with cows and horses at the plow, or to gather heavy loads of wood on their backs in the distant forests. All said "Guten morgen!" as I hobbled slowly on to the Marktplatz. There the "guests" were pouring in by a steady human stream from all points, and there were, at the least, full three hundred thirsty souls, who, cups in hand, were marching in solemn single file to the spring near at hand. There is fashion in the choice of a fountain at Carlsbad as well as in all other pursuits and habits of life, and during my two seasons the Marktribrunn and Nieubrunn were most numerously attended. I tailed on to the cue in rear of a portly old lady with a crutch stick in her hand, attired in a slouched beaver hat and a coarse brown single-breasted pea-jacket, buttoned closely up to the chin over her double-breasted, expansive shoulders, and who strongly reminded me of Dirk Hatterick. Behind me again came Prince Paul Esterhazy—

a jaunty, slim little old dandy in a white hat, cocked to one side, and dressed in a loose suit of pepper and salt—quite unlike his ambassadorial costume in days of yore at Saint James, when he was "all jewels from his jasey to his diamond boots"—and chattering away in great glee and good humor. I noticed him, too, very frequently afterward, as he danced gayly along the promenades, poking the pretty peasant girls with the end of his dainty cane about the ribs and bodices—to see, perhaps, if their hearts were in the right place—pinching their blooming cheeks, chuckling compliments through the most perfect of his sets of teeth, and, in a word, conducting himself in the most affectionate manner possible. And, by-the-way, the last time I had the honor of being dazzled by the shadow of His Serene Transparency, the venerable Paul, was in the ante-room of Baron Humboldt, at Berlin, a year ago last September. There the pair stood shaking hands and laughing with all their might; and when the Prince departed the good old Baron turned to us and said, "That, my dear, is old Prince Esterhazy. I have not seen him for more than thirty years; but he still seems to be a pleasant, lively little old fellow." Their united ages being, on this occasion I speak of, about one hundred and seventy years.

To return to the Marktribrunn: when my turn came a little girl filled my goblet, and withdrawing, like a bit of ham from a sandwich, from between my noble companions, I retired to a corner, and slowly sipped my allowance. I then crawled up the paved hill in the rear of the Schlossbrunn, when I filled and emptied my cup again; and so down by the zigzag paths, beneath the dripping foliage, to the Nieubrunn, where is a long covered promenade beside the river itself, and where the Herr Labitzky was discoursing the sweetest of Bellini's music. Here I took my third sip of the goblet, as I wished to experiment upon the effects produced by the different springs. It is not a plan commonly recommended, and not considered at all times and in all cases beneficial; but yet I tried it, and found no ill effects to arise. Indeed I frequently pursued the same course, and when one spring gave me headache or dizziness I quaffed at another—from hot to hottest, or hottest to hot—until I found the water to suit me. In quantity, too, I was guided by the immediate effects produced after drinking; and though, for intervals of days and even weeks, I could swallow as much as eight or nine six-ounce cups, yet, at other times, I dropped down to four or five—in a sort of sliding scale, regulated by the symptomatic indications of my eyes and head. The water never acted violently upon the stomach or urinary organs, though quite enough to carry off all secretions chemically opposed to it, not otherwise dissipated through the blood and pores of the skin.*

* I may here observe that the waters are put up for exportation, and are used pretty extensively in India and in the hospitals of Vienna; and an agency has recently been established by Mattoni in Boston. In the process

Having swallowed my third and last allowance at the Nieubrunn, I limped on to the great bubbling Sprudel, which bursts forth a little way beyond, on the right bank of the river. Here, likewise, is a long covered colonnade, beside the Tepel, where the young Herr Labitzky, in emulation of his sire, leads another orchestra. The principal feed-pipe from the huge caldron below spouts up at the lower end of the colonnade; but the water is so hot that you have to slide your cup into a tin pouch, with a long wooden handle, when it is dipped up by one of the half-dozen little girls around the reservoir. Near by, on the same level, is another covered place, where the Jews mostly congregate, and, with an open walk adjoining, are called the "Halls of Abraham" and "Gallery of the Circumcision." A great throng of Polish Jews are always found in Carlsbad during the season. They, as well as Gentiles, are no doubt afflicted with various disorders; and since they get their medicine here for nothing, live in little dens about the sides of the hills, practice the most frugal economy in food, and do the while a little barter in soap-stone ornaments and jet trinkets, Carlsbad seems to be the very place for them. Nor is their costume an expensive one, for it only consists of a conical beaver hat, a gaberdine of bombazine, reaching to their heels, and a pair of long boots. The last articles serving them for stockings, drawers, trowsers, and shirt, for no under raiment is ever visible, save that which nature provides, and that not kept up to its original color. They are a sharp-featured race of Jews, and what gives a particularly weazen-eyed fierceness to their expression, are long spiral locks of hair—like so many ebony shavings—which hang down their hollow cheeks. The women bear the same type, though more comely in the absence of the cork-screw ringlets; but less comely—if I may be excused the pun—owing to their hair being cut off entirely. The men play the part of Dalilahs, and not only shear but shave the heads of their mates the moment they are married. Perhaps it is done in revenge for rites performed upon them in early life. As some slight recompense, however, for this hirsute deprivation, the wives wear black or brown silk wigs, or any other colors which will match their gowns.

Having thus taken a cursory glance of these Jews—who, I was happy further to observe, huddled together by themselves, and who, when not drinking, were scratching and making awful faces—I betook me to a bench in the Sprudel promenade, and devoted my attention to the so-called Christians. What a crowd was there! Nothing but a photograph could delineate them. Battalion after battalion, men and women together, backward and forward they marched—their only arms their cups, and their only ammunition Sprudel water. Among them all there was not one who was not an invalid, or, at least I presume, fancied they were; but if one could form a rough guess from external symptoms, the waters should possess miraculous powers to cure them. There were individuals with squint eyes, club feet, knock knees, high shoulders, scalded faces, snub noses, and red hair. Others, again, black with jaundice—no Mozambique or Benin resident blacker—or lame with wounds or gout, pale, quivering, and bleary-eyed. Russians from the Crimea, with frozen stumps of limbs, or shattered by shot or bayonet thrust—one, a gaunt, soldierly general, with his lower jaw almost gone by a Minié bullet at Inker-mann; lots of English officers, with yellow, liverless faces, from the hot plains of India, or wounded in the revolt; and a few cadaverous objects from long suffering in the Leeward Islands or yellow fever. Many of them going about in donkey carts, dragged along by flunkies, or upheld by crutches. Others, too—especially old women—monsters in rancid fat, the accumulation of ages, waddling wearily about; and beside them flabby old he veterans—one with legs like bear barrels, and stomach big in girth as a ground-tier butt—worn out by disease or vice; and more wrinkled, tottering, and decrepit, with shriveled-up faces, pot-bellies, and their legs gone entirely.

What a painful sight it is, and how each one, as he passes, glares inquisitively at their neighbor, and mentally speculates whether they can be cured or not? Perhaps, too, thinking and believing that the neighbor's case is hopeless, and one's own only admits of relief. Even that bright pretty girl I see there in the chip hat and fluttering blue ribbons, who so gayly sips from the steaming goblet, gallantly handed by the dashing young officer in gold aiguillettes and varnished jack-boots, she has a bad-looking pimple on her nose; and notwithstanding those brilliant eyes and rosy lips, her admirer detects incipient cancer from that pimple, and pities her from his inmost soul. She, too, is not destitute of sympathy; and when she perceives a scurfy mark on the hand beneath the gold-braided cuff which presents the goblet, she knows the young aid-de-camp is a victim to scrofula or king's evil. In fact, she told me at a later day her fears for this elegant soldier, and even went so far as to pity me—the minx!—and to hint, moreover, that paralysis was quite beyond the reach of Carlsbad water virtue! But I did not believe her, and thought I saw the red, vein-like fibres of the cancer pimple spreading down to her soft cheeks and up toward the corners of her sparkling eyes! There was likewise another wretch, this time a repulsive-looking one, with whom I scraped acquaintance, who had rudimentary stumps of gouty, chalky fingers; and of corking, the jars are injected with carbonic acid gas, which prevents any partial decomposition of the water; and in all important respects the virtues of the waters are retained; that is, when warmed up to the temperature of the spring from which they may have been drawn. "With regard to the foreign manufacture of the Carlsbad waters, however scientific their composition or successful their imitation in taste or smell, they can not possess the real virtues of the natural waters; for though they may have all the known ingredients as discovered by chemical analysis, they can not retain those which are unknown, and which have hitherto baffled all chemical investigation." So says Dr. Mannl.

who, I really believe, wore a silver nose, told me that my case was the worst he had ever heard of, and begged me to return at once to my home and kindred, and die peacefully in my native land. This suggestion, however, though conscientiously volunteered, did not in the least disturb me, because I felt a conviction that the Devil already had a tight grip on my silver-nosed ally, as much as if I saw his dread tormentors stuck into those gouty old toes, and so I bore his observations cheerfully. Indeed I was quite convinced that had all the patients I saw in Carlsbad written down their separate opinions of one another in a book, and all the conclusions proved true, there would not now be a single survivor of us to tell the tale or notch off the fatal tally!

When my eyes fairly ached with beholding all this train of animated misery, and my ears taken in the last melodious crash of the Labitzky band, I hobbled back over the Tepel to the Wiese. Here, in a melée of jostling crinoline, I gently ambled my way into a baker's shop, and selected my bread. I have said, I think, that these shops are very numerous in Carlsbad, and that the bread is alike excellent in all; but I have forgotten to mention that the persons who sell it are very pretty persons indeed, some of them altogether charming, and one envies the bread its kneading under such fair plump hands. "Tank you, Sir," said the pretty fraulein, as she took the money with a pleasant smile, and pitched the little loaves into a paper bag, "may love go with you!" and off I went to a little table in front of my lodgings, where the good Madame Mattoni provided the delicious café au lait, which made up the other half of my breakfast. Sometimes an egg was added to this repast; and while seated there beneath the stunted trees I became as much an object of solicitude, and underwent as close a scrutiny—including my egg—as if I were myself a new species of ovum, and for the first time submitted to scientific inspection. All the lovely matrons and the bouffante maidens in hoops, and the fat dowagers and paralytic old codgers, stopped to gaze at me. Even good-natured Baron Rothschild—who never deigned to look at the distinguished Rabbins of his persuasion, whose cashmere goat beards alone made them worthy of a glance—honored me with the most marked regard. I felt then that, had a mutton-chop or a bit of beefsteak appeared on my little white table, I should have been placed under the action of the microscope in presence of the whole town. As it was I did not murmur, or by word, look, or gesture, hint that this universal attention was disagreeable; for I knew that novelties, whatever their zest, were not tolerated in Carlsbad, and I was therefore willing to pay tribute to the general curiosity.

I would finish my simple breakfast about half past nine o'clock, as would the multitude with theirs, and be returning from the valley or hill-side cafés in cheerful groups, when perhaps my good doctor would make me an al fresco call, and sit beside me on the bench.

"Much headache?" says he.

"Not much."

"Bon. Take much exercise?"

"A little," I reply.

"Bon. How many cups to-day?"

"Six."

"Bon."

And so my doctor pats me on the back, and goes to look after others of his flock. On other occasions I return the visit of my doctor, who, during drinking hours, is always seated in an angle of the Marketplatz, where peer and peasant, count and commoner, fraus and frauleins bow low before him, and give heed to his counsels. Ay, there he sits, as handsome a man, with as fine a head as any of the Aulic Council, of which he is a worthy member. Not a cottage within leagues around but has known the tramp of his horses' feet, and welcomed the sound of his cheerful voice, when sickness and want visits their poverty-stricken dwellings. There are besides my doctor plenty of other people's doctors, who drive around, with much rattle and clatter, in low, double Broughams without doors, so as to be ready any moment to spring out upon a patient on either hand in case their services are needed; and who go about in early morning from spring to spring administering, as it were, ambulating advice. All are thought to be skillful, and no doubt they are; and all seem to get on most harmoniously together, and never quarrel over the live body of a patient.

It is about ten o'clock when the doctor leaves me, and I hobble along the Wiese, past the prettily embowered shops and cafés, until I sit down again before the door of ancient Joseph Wagner. I had already exchanged pleasant salutations with graceful Fannie Woczaddler, who is the fashionable modiste from Prag; and said Guten morgen, Mynheer, to the stout Herr Hern Pupp—a sort of stomach plumber, and famous for his works in pewter; and I intend presently to nod to Carl Damm and Joseph Danz on the corner; but now I am with my venerable friend Wagner, who was once a splendid old soldier and fought every where; since retiring from the profession of arms and taking to the manufacture of beautiful wooden boxes, by which he has made a fortune. Joseph is one of the Burgers of the Wiese, and for more than thirty years he has held court in his little shop, where many of the greatest statesmen and nobles of Europe have held familiar confabs with him. The Metternichs, Esterhazys, Polignacs, and scores like them, have, and still do, discuss the affairs of state with him. While I, however, manage to talk a little French and German jargon with Joseph, over comes the handsome Herr Wolf, from the brilliant glass and China shop opposite; and perhaps I go into that magazine and admire the delicate beauty of the muslin glass of Bohemia, as pure as spring water and light as paper, fashioned into the most graceful forms, and altogether the rarest productions of taste and skill to be seen in all the great glass marts of the Empire. Then I wander slowly on again, till I get to my banker.

This is the Herr Seifert, an active, dapper, obliging little man who speaks English, keeps a large shop of heterogeneous articles, and does a polyglot sort of business in every thing, from steel pens to lodgings and livery horses. It was here that I drew money, and first began to discover the true value of German silver; which coinage I found to consist of an alloy of old pewter spoons and grease; and which, with dirty and almost worthless florin bank-notes, are not a currency one would care to carry to Australia or California with the expectation of turning it into sterling metal. It might, in fact, prove more cumbersome than useful. But during the whole time I was in the Austrian dominions, and especially while the war was raging in Lombardy, when all through Bohemia the people were taxed about forty per cent. on their incomes—those who had any left—I did not see a single bit of gold or silver used in ordinary traffic; and even then the peasantry and small shopkeepers were in the habit of hiding the nasty nickel kreutzer pieces, believing, in their ignorance, that it possessed some intrinsic value of its own. I always felt sorry for the receivers to whom I was obliged to pay out this rascally trash in return for solid comforts in food or lodgings; though, on the other hand, I ever felt the bitterest animosity at myself for being obliged to exchange my glittering Napoleons or solid English gold for such bad pewter.

To return to my friend Seifert: I paid him daily visits, sometimes two or three, and soon made a bosom companion of him; receiving his views, as well pecuniary as political, as so much intellectual law. Seifert first took me to the Cabinet reading-room, a very nice retreat with a very polite conductor, where all the leading journals of Europe are taken, whenever nothing is contained in them disrespectful to the house or dominions of Hapsburg, and where I subscribed for the season. Then Seifert carried me to see the Military Hospital. This is a quadrangle of huge size, standing on the left bank of the Tepel, near the edge of the town. It accommodates about two hundred officers and soldiers, and was built, at Doctor Hofberger's suggestion, with the money raised by a national subscription to commemorate the escape of the young Emperor from the knife of the assassin on the ramparts of Vienna in 1852. By a happy accident powerful springs of Carlsbad water, for drinking and bathing, were found within the foundation walls; and the whole structure is supplied with it. It was here, as well as to all the mineral spas in the heart of Bohemia, that came the wounded warriors from the battles in Italy. Day by day the mournful litters went slowly by with their maimed burdens. One young officer of cavalry, who was frightfully mutilated by a rifle cannon bolt at Solferino, told me that he never even distinguished a French uniform during the combat, and though nearly three thousand metres in rear of the Austrian line of battle, he was knocked over, with his charger, by the before-mentioned bolt.

VI.

A few days after this visit to the hospital the Herr Seifert hitched up his Poni equipagen—a small four-wheeled vehicle, with a pair of spirited black rats for horses—to drive me to the Hans Heiling rocks. The road lies along the western face of the Stag's Leap, from where you look down on the valley of the Eger—a thread of a river which mingles with the Tepel, and winds about a wide grain-covered sloping plain, dotted with hamlets, until the distant view is bounded by the mountains of the Bohemian frontier. On the way we stopped to visit a broad rock, perched in the cleft of a narrow gorge, which commands a pretty peep—though scarcely an eyeball-full—of smiling landscape between the green and waving foliage. It is called the Russell Sitz, in compliment to the well-beloved gentleman who first discovered its beauties; and who—in deep-felt gratitude I say it—first induced me to visit Carlsbad. A mile or more beyond we left the Poni equipagen, and descended by a steep and well-swept path to the banks of the Eger, where the little-stream ripples noisily over its uneven bed, and where it is held in by a precipitous wall of pine-clad hills and rocky palisades. Skirting along a pathway facing the rocky framing of the picture, we came to a rural restauration, where, as well as every where else within ten miles of Carlsbad, excellent coffee is to be had; and likewise a kind of Seltzer water, in jugs, called Geishübel, which, with sugar, is a delightfully effervescent drink, and much encouraged by the faculty. Here, too, is music; for where is there not music in Bohemia? And while we sit here, in the cooling shade of the valley, you may, kind reader, perhaps incline a lazy ear to the legend of those tall rocks there of Hans Heiling, which look down upon us from across the running water: I tell it as it was told to me by the old music man at my elbow, who leads and plays his own entire orchestra. But be it understood, however, that though my performance may be wanting in the Teutonic gravity of the original version, by its transmutation into homely Saxon, yet I believe the interest and horror of the narrative will remain unimpaired.

THE DREADFUL LEGEND OF HANS HEILING.

In a time now long since passed away there lived a farmer, with a farm full forty leagues round, named Beit. He had a lovely daughter inclining to corpulency, who weighed four sacks of grain, and on account of those charms and the reputed wealth of her father she gave herself airs and turned up her snub nose at the brave gallants of the village. Her name, of course, was the Fraulein Beit, though she was occasionally, out of affectionate regard, designated as Beitsy. Just in front of old Beit's house there dwelt an enemy, who died at the opening of this story, leaving, however, an only son named Bout, who inherited the family feud. This young Bout had a slight squint to his otherwise expressive eyes, large ears, and a hair lip; but in ether respects he was considered a very captivating fellow, and when fashionably dressed in the style then in vogue, in leather trowsers and boots—all in one piece, which came up to his armpits—and a cocked hat, with an elegant black-stemmed pipe in his mouth, he was very much smiled upon by the Eger maidens. In the course of time it so happened that one day, while prowling about the Beit property, he spied Beitsy Beit hoeing potatoes in a field hard by; and he became so suddenly and deeply enamored of her charms that he volunteered to carry the vegetables home for her. Though the pretty Fraulein declined this delicate offer, yet since the politeness was very unusual in that part of the country—and is, in fact, to this day—she could not resist saying, as well as her panting bosom would admit: Mein deer Herr Bout mein heert ein thein. This sentiment, uttered in her native tongue, was equivalent to hinting that she felt interested in Bout, in a friendly way, with a view, perhaps, to that budding regard ending in a permanent attachment; whereupon he immediately put his arms around the maiden, as far as he could reach, and exclaimed: Mein deer Fraulein, I could eat you up! Bout was often heard to regret in after-life that he did not eat her up, as stout as she was, at the time; but when we consider that love is very rarely carnivorous in the sanguine days of youth, he should not, perhaps, be blamed. However, the ice around Beitsy's heart having been cracked, the next step to be taken was to ask old Beit's consent for his daughter's soft fat hand; and, accordingly, the Eger swain dressed himself up in his long boots and trowsers—all nicely polished with black grease—and then he thundered at the ancient gates of Beit. "Come in!" roared the old wretch, in a harsh, husky voice; and in Bout walked, and without any preamble whatever he demanded the hand of Beitsy. The venerable Beit was inhaling the smoke from the great meerscham at the time, which had been in the family for four centuries, and weighed full forty pounds. This he slowly removed from his mouth and hurled it at the astonished lover, and which knocked out several of his front teeth and seriously injured his gums. His wrath not assuaged by this, he next pitched a huge chest of oak drawers and the boar's-head carving-knife at Bout; then a pan of live coals, the heavy brass candlesticks, and a pot of sour-kroust; then flew the family feather bed and the crockery utensils; then a dozen of German-silver spoons, which Bout caught in his pockets, believing they were pure metal; then the iron boot-jack and a live pig; and finally the enraged parent seized the great beer barrel and emptied it on top of Bout's cocked hat. But fortunately the perturbed lover had a strong head under his hat, and besides a good deal of the beer ran down, it is to be presumed, into his mouth, or else he would not have been steady enough to walk out of the house, as he did, without assistance. Bout, however, was so hurt in spirit at this unkind, not to say rude behavior, that he declared he would never speak to old Beit until he apologized; and there being no hope of such a condescension, Bout rode away for ever so many hundred leagues, and built himself a castle on a high rock in a fertile country, which he filled with robbers, and worked off his chagrin by beating and pillaging the peasantry thereabouts until they were taught to believe the country belonged to him. Meanwhile the old Beit never spoke to any body, and the only abstraction he enjoyed was in sticking a wooden pitchfork into the tender and adipose body of his only daughter, and in smoking the family jar of meerscham. Well, a great many years passed away and nothing was heard of the discarded Bout, or indeed any other visitors, until one day there came walking by a tall, fierce-looking man, with a black plume of cock's feathers stuck in his cap. He wore a large gleaming ring on his thumb; his eyes were red as blood, his nose was hooked, and his feet were like hoofs. He introduced himself as Hans Heiling, but every one knows him to be the Devil at the first glance, so there is no need of any further disguise about him. For some time he paid the most devoted attention to the Fraulein Beit, and on one occasion attempted to take liberties with her by the offer of a chaste salute. This Beitsy repulsed, and being at the same time defended by a talisman in shape of a meat cleaver, which she wore habitually by a chain around her neck, she did not hesitate to make battle with it, and thus kept her devil of a lover at bay. This sort of coquetry did not, however, last long, and old Beit having been won over by the present of a new pair of leather trowsers, and Beitsy having pretty well made up her mind that Bout would not return, and that one man was as good as another, an early day was appointed for her marriage with the Herr Hans Heiling. Accordingly, every thing was prepared for this happy event, when all at once a great galloping of horses was heard, and presently the long-lost Bout dashed through the portals, attended by a troop of his choicest robbers, and precipitated himself into the arms of his fat but beloved Beitsy. On this occasion the Herr Heiling had the good sense to withdraw, but at the same time snapping his teeth and vowing revenge; and then, more preparations were quickly made for the nuptials of Bout and Beitsy. The hour drew nigh; guests from all the land around assembled on the grassy banks of the Eger; a great meat pasty had been baked for the feast; music made the air melodious, and the company were dancing or reposing—prior to the ceremony—upon the damp herbage. During the height of these festivities, which had now extended well into the night, the great clock of the village slowly tolled twelve! Scarcely had the sound of the last stroke died away when a terrible storm struck the company with dismay. The thunder muttered and crashed, the lightning flashed, the rain came down in torrents, and the river boiled in angry waves over its turbulent bed. In the midst of this uproar Hans Heiling, devil as he was, came snorting and plunging in among the company, and, after a demoniac dance of short duration, he sprang toward the affrighted Beitsy, snatched the cleaver talisman from her exposed bosom, flourished it over his horns, clacked his hoofs together, gathered up his pronged tail in convenient links in his claws, and then leaped with a blasphemous yell into the Eger. The river opened to receive him, a sheet of blue flame and red fires started up, the waters hissed and boiled, and for a long time afterward tasted of brimstone and sulphur. As for those tender and expectant lovers, Bout and Beitsy, they, together with all the bridal party, were transformed by the power of the Evil One into those tall rocks we see there, dripping tears amidst the green and twining foliage, and looking down, with their sad and expressionless stony faces, upon the passers-by. So ends this dreadful legend.

VII.

About a week after my arrival in Carlsbad my doctor asked me how I felt. I said, better. He said, "Bon;" and then patting me on the back he told me to begin the baths. So one morning, after the usual drinking process and breakfast, I made my first plunge. There are plenty of bathing-houses in the town, and all of them tolerably well arranged, clean, and convenient; but the one I liked best was the "Drei Kettens"—no allusion, however, to cats—and which means the House of the Three Chains. Iron pipes convey the water from the Great Sprudel Bubbler right and left down the banks of the Tepel, but since it is too hot to bathe in as it comes direct from the source, it is cooled by water from the stream pumped into tanks for the purpose. This process dilutes the Sprudel and makes it milder in its effects; but when one feels able to test the full strength—as I did in the course of a few weeks—in what is called a "Sprudel bath," then it should be drawn off into the bath and allowed to remain undisturbed for some hours before using. It preserves its temperature, even in these china-tiled or marble-lined baths, wonderfully, and in the process of cooling a thick white scum rises to the surface, tasting, looking, and smelling like thin chicken broth. This scum is the efflorescence of the alkaline properties of the water, and, after bathing, leaves an irritating, itching sensation—though by no means unpleasant—on the skin of the bather.

On my first dip I staid in only fifteen minutes, with the temperature at 92° of Fahrenheit; but later, and especially during my second season, I went in for an hour at a stretch, with the water fizzing from 116° to 120°. I feel quite sure that I derived as much relief and positive good from the baths as I did from drinking, and, moreover, the bathing was far more pleasant. Both treatments, in fact, acted perfectly; and while one allayed my spasms of pain and rapidly reduced the internal inflammation, the other seemed to bring circulation and vitality to my numbed and paralyzed leg, and soon gave me reasonable hopes of a permanent cure. I found, too, that the greatest effect was produced when I took the bath within an hour after drinking, and without taking breakfast between whiles; then the saturation seemed complete. After drinking or bathing it is not thought judicious to lie down, or go to sleep, or indulge in drowsiness in any way, either reclining or sitting. If you do—and it is at times difficult to resist the indulgence of a nap—you are almost sure to wake with headache, a blinding dizziness in the eyes, and a bad sodary taste in the mouth. The physicians always advise the patient to work the water out of the system by moderate exercise, through the blood and pores of the body, and go to bed at night on an empty stomach; and it is for these reasons that the waters are drank so early in the morning. Though there is no fixed time for remaining in the bath, yet it is not thought advisable to make chicken soup or one's self; and while there is indeed a luxurious fascination in the bath, and one dislikes to leave the amorous water, still it is best not to woo it too far. The water is delightfully soft, and makes the skin as smooth as ivory; and on account of this beautifying principle the ladies seek the baths more than the men. There are, however, exceptions; and one day I heard a vain son of Paris exclaim to a companion in an adjoining bath: "Sapristie! mon cher Antoine, je suis enchanté avec mes jambes!" Having some curiosity to observe the enchanting style of legs that had so fascinated their owner, I waited till he emerged from his marble tub and appeared in the open air. Then I beheld a pair of sturdy balustrade supporters inclosed in peg-top trousers, and, so far as I could see, entirely destitute of enchanting grace or symmetry; and I therefore concluded that the idea was an optical delusion, and produced solely on the mind of the owner by the mirage-like effect of the water. During my first season in Carlsbad I took forty-two baths in nine weeks; and the last, thirty-one in seven weeks. The steam baths I never tried, but the method consists in boxing the body up to the neck in an air-tight chest, with the Sprudel steam admitted from below. There are likewise mud baths which are successfully used for gout and cutaneous disorders; but as I did not try either mud or steam, I can not speak from actual experience.

VIII.

Among the pleasantest recollections of my visit to Carlsbad, surrounded as we were by a little coterie of charming women and agreeable men, was meeting my old friend Ole Bull. Our acquaintance went back for many a year, from the time of his first visit to America, and here we met again in the heart of Bohemia to talk over the past. I found him ill and care-worn, and just returned from a professional tour along the Lower Danube, where he had been received with such wild enthusiasm as he had never known before. Illness, however, the result of over-work, mental cares and troubles—too sacred to mention—came upon him, and he wandered to Carlsbad, like the rest of us, for a new lease of life. And he found it too, with sympathizing friends around him; and when he left with me, at a later day, for Norway, his step had resumed its elasticity, his blue eye sparkled, and he was once more himself—the king of the violin. He was a constant companion in all our drives and rambles; to the lonely castle of Engel Haus; to the peak of the Aberg; the drives and trout dinners at Hammer; the glorious old oaks of Dalwitz; our tea-drinks on the hill-side resorts, and our wanderings in the groves; and always the observed of all observers among the princes and magnates of the land. I never wondered that the women adored him—not only for his great and manly beauty and unrivaled genius in music, but for that touching simplicity and gentleness of heart and manner that loved the child for its helplessness, and worshiped the hills for their grandeur. He has indeed an almost superhuman fascination, rarely accorded to his fellows. He could not be persuaded to give a concert in Carlsbad; but he sometimes played for us in private. His touch had lost none of its marvelous power. The bright eyes of lovely women rained tears for his music, and the men held their breath in rapturous wonder. And when, too, he played the grand melodies of Mozart—his love for the works of that grand master amounts to adoration—the very composers who accompanied him forgot their parts, and seemed half paralyzed with admiration. But it was the reverence due to genius; and while he wailed in plaintive, heart-broken tones, or pierced like lightning, with exquisite purity, through the deep sounds of his accompaniments, they almost knelt down in homage before him. At other times he loved to dwell on his native land and the scenes of his boyhood; and his quaintness and mobile expression always made him an entertaining narrator. Once he told us that, when but eight years old, “a little fiddle, no bigger than a lemon and of the same color, was given him, and he began to worry the strings.” This early taste for music induced his mother to ask a “dance fiddler” to give him lessons; but the boy soon began to upbraid the master for playing false; whereupon an uncle, who had quartette parties, took the little Bull under his own instruction. Then the old uncle made a seat for the boy in the case of the violoncello, where he kept quiet as a mouse, in great fear and jeopardy lest the bow of the big fiddle, in the savage hands of his uncle, should cut his ears off. In this painful position, with eyes and ears wide open, he learned the music by heart, notwithstanding that the quartette party smoked and drank at every interlude like mad. The leading violin, however, always got tipsy first, and the uncle would abuse him soundly for not being able to stand a glass or two, and threaten to take the instrument away from him and give it to the little boy. So it came to pass that once, when the first violin slid out of his chair in a musicless condition, the little Ole was given the bow. This was his first distinguished position, and he played so well that he was elected their leader. In later years, when Bull had become famous and returned to Norway in 1838, his old drunken friend, Heinrich by name, at the age of eighty, sent for Bull, and while on his death-bed begged him to play for him, so that he might have the consolation of hearing what the violin was capable of. First, however, he wished to see and handle the violin itself—a real Stradivarius, remarking at the time, “Ah! my little Ole, many a Cremona have I sold, but I never saw one in my life before.” Bull told us that the old fellow, among other “industries,” made a trade of buying German fiddles for a dollar, counterfeiting them up by stamps and varnish, and then disposing of them as old relics. Bull played by the bedside of his old friend until the spirit left the body. On another occasion, while in England, Bull and Bochs, the pianist, were to give a concert at Worthing, near London. A storm, however, prevented their arrival until two hours after the time announced, and then the audience were in such a rage that they hissed the Herr Bochs to utter perdition. Bull appeared and the tumult increased; but he bore it coolly until a fellow in the gallery whistled, when Bull made his violin whistle like an echo. Then the fellow crowed and groaned; but Bull followed him up, by braying like a heart-broken donkey and yelping like a kennel, until the audience got in good humor and turned his tormentor out. But still Bull could not fairly begin, because of a fat woman who sat in front, and who looked so cross and sleepy that he became nervous and could not command his thoughts. Presently, however, he paused, and by a gentle lullaby movement he fiddled her into a doze; then he made his violin snore a concerto with her; and finally he awoke her by a loud crash, which so struck his victim aghast that she tumbled off the bench in a collapsed state and was borne away!

I trust I may be excused for thus using my friend Ole in this my Carlsbad experience; but as I believe he contributed very materially to my cure, by the pleasure I derived from his society and peculiar conversational treatment, I have therefore—in a magnetic sense—swallowed him whole. I had already swallowed three hundred and ninety-seven cups of the various waters, which I had indelibly carved on my drinking goblet, and the time drew nigh for me to leave. The weary days of my long and painful illness and the black dreams of night were fading away before the dawn of renewed life and vigor, and the future seemed bright before me. I had so far recovered the use of my leg that I could walk a mile without fatigue; the internal inflammation had entirely subsided; and I suffered very little pain. This state of affairs continued, with partial relapses, during the subsequent winter; but whatever of actual disease remained was, I have reason to hope, eradicated by a second course of Carlsbad the last summer. And though my leg has become shorter than its fellow, and gives me a lee roll occasionally if I work it too hard, yet I am entirely thankful for it as it is, and would not part with it for any conceivable amount of money.

To return, however, for another moment to Carlsbad—where, could I pen a suitable inscription, I would place a bronze or marble plate of thanksgiving with others of the kind upon the rocky galleries of the Tepel—one day my good doctor Hofberger came to see me. He said I had taken quite as much of the waters as was good for me in one season, but that I must return to them again. This time it was my turn to say "Bon;" and after a hearty embrace we parted. Early the following morning our carriage rolled gently away from our kind friends the Mattonis, and we were waved farewell by the other happy people of the Wiese. At the little bridge by the Nieubrunn we drew up for a moment, and Ole Bull and I drained a last steaming goblet and gave a heartfelt cheer for the Sprudel waters. The postillions cracked their whips, the horses started, and under a heavy shower of bouquets and roses we bade adieu to Carlsbad.

RELICS OF GENERAL CHASSÉ.

A TALE OF ANTWERP.

THAT Belgium is now one of the European kingdoms, living by its own laws, resting on its own bottom, with a King and Court, palaces and Parliament of its own, is known to all the world. And a very nice little kingdom it is; full of old towns, fine Flemish pictures, and interesting Gothic churches. But in the memory of very many of us, who do not think ourselves old men, Belgium, as it is now called—in those days it used to be Flanders and Brabant—was a part of Holland; and it obtained its own independence by a revolution. In that revolution the most important military step was the siege of Antwerp, which was defended, on the part of the Dutch, by General Chassé, with the utmost gallantry, but nevertheless ineffectually.

After the siege Antwerp became quite a show place; and among the visitors who flocked there to talk of the gallant general, and to see what remained of the great effort which he had made to defend the place, were two Englishmen. One was the hero of this little history; and the other was a young man of considerable less weight in the world. The less I say of the latter the better; but it is necessary that I should give some description of the former.

The Rev. Augustus Horne was, at the time of my narrative, a benefited clergyman of the Church of England. The profession which he had graced sat easily on him. Its external marks and signs were as pleasing to his friends as were its internal comforts to himself. He was a man of much quiet mirth, full of polished wit, and on some rare occasions he could descend to the more noisy hilarity of a joke. Loved by his friends, he loved all the world. He had known no care and seen no sorrow. Always intended for holy orders, he had entered them without a scruple, and remained within their pale without a regret. At twenty-four he had been a deacon, at twenty-seven a priest, at thirty a rector, and at thirty-five a prebendary; and as his rectory was rich and his prebendal stall well paid, the Rev. Augustus Horne was called by all, and called himself, a happy man. His stature was about six feet two, and his corpulence exceeded those bounds which symmetry would have preferred as being most perfectly compatible even with such a height. But nevertheless Mr. Horne was a well-made man; his hands and feet were small; his face was handsome, frank, and full of expression; his bright eyes twinkled with humor; his finely-cut mouth disclosed two marvelous rows of well-preserved ivory; and his slightly aquiline nose was just such a projection as one would wish to see on the face of a well-fed, good-natured dignitary of the Church of England. When I add to all this that the reverend gentleman was as generous as he was rich—and the kind mother in whose arms he had been nurtured had taken care that he should never want—I need hardly say that I was blessed with a very pleasant traveling companion.

I must mention one more interesting particular. Mr. Horne was rather inclined to dandyism, in an innocent way. His clerical starched neckcloth was always of the whitest, his cambric handkerchief of the finest, his bands adorned with the broadest border; his sable suit never degenerated to a rusty brown; it not only gave, on all occasions, glossy evidence of freshness, but also of the talent which the artisan had displayed in turning out a well-dressed clergyman of the Church of England. His hair was ever brushed with scrupulous attention, and showed in its regular waves the guardian care of each separate bristle. And all this was done with that ease and grace which should be the characteristics of a dignitary of the established English Church.

I had accompanied Mr. Horne to the Rhine; and we had reached Brussels on our return, just at the close of that revolution which ended in affording a throne to the son-in-law of George the Fourth. At that moment General Chassé's name and fame were in every man's mouth, and, like other curious admirers of the brave, Mr. Horne determined to devote two days to the scene of the late events at Antwerp. Antwerp, moreover, possesses perhaps the finest spire, and certainly one of the three or four finest pictures, in the world. Of General Chassé, of the Cathedral, and of the Rubens, I had heard much, and was therefore well pleased that such should be his resolution. This accomplished, we were to return to Brussels; and thence, via Ghent, Ostend, and Dover, I to complete my legal studies in London, and Mr. Horne to enjoy once more the peaceful retirement of Ollerton rectory. As we were to be absent but one night we were enabled to indulge in the gratification of traveling without our luggage. A small sac-de-nuit was prepared; brushes, combs, razors, strops, a change of linen, etc., etc., were carefully put up; but our heavy baggage, our coats, waistcoats, and other wearing apparel, were unnecessary. It was delightful to feel one's self so light-handed. The reverend gentleman, with my humble self by his side, left the portal of the Hôtel de Belle Vue at 7 A.M., in good humor with all the world. There were no railroads in those days; but a cabriolet, big enough to hold six persons, with rope traces and corresponding appendages, deposited us at the Golden Fleece in something less than six hours. The inward man was duly fortified, and we started for the castle.

It boots not here to describe the effects which gunpowder and grape-shot had had on the walls of Antwerp. Let the curious in these matters read the horrors of the siege of Troy, or the history of Jerusalem taken by Titus. The one may be found in Homer, and the other in Josephus. Or if they prefer doings of a later date, there is the taking of Sebastopol, as narrated in the columns of the English Times newspaper. The accounts are equally true, instructive, and intelligible. In the mean time, allow the Rev. Augustus Horne and myself to enter the private chambers of the renowned though defeated general.

We rambled for a while through the covered way, over the glacis and along the counterscarp, and listened to the guide as he detailed to us, in already accustomed words, how the siege had gone. Then we got into the private apartments of the General, and, having dexterously shaken off our attendant, wandered at large among the deserted rooms.

"It is clear that no one ever comes here," said I.

"No," said the Rev. Augustus; "it seems not: and, to tell the truth, I don't know why any one should come. The chambers in themselves are not attractive."

What he said was true. They were plain, ugly, square, unfurnished rooms, here a big one and there a little one, as is usual in most houses—unfurnished, that is, for the most part. In one place we did find a table and a few chairs, in another a bedstead, and so on. But to me it was pleasant to indulge in those ruminations which any traces of the great or unfortunate create in softly sympathizing minds. For a time we communicated our thoughts to each other as we roamed free as air through the apartments; and then I lingered for a few moments behind, while Mr. Horne moved on with a quicker step.

At last I entered the bedchamber of the General, and there I overtook my friend. He was inspecting, with much attention, an article of the great man's wardrobe which he held in his hand. It was precisely that virile habiliment to which a well-known gallant captain alludes, in his conversation with the posthumous appearance of Miss Bayley, as containing a Bank of England £5 note.

"The General must have been a large man, George, or he would hardly have filled these," said Mr. Horne, holding up to the light the respectable leathern articles in question. "He must have been a very large man—the largest man in Antwerp, I should think; or else his tailor has done him more than justice."

They were certainly large, and had about them a charming regimental military appearance. They were made of white leather, with bright metal buttons at the knees, and bright metal buttons at the top. They owned no pockets, and were, with the exception of the legitimate outlet, continuous in the circumference of the waistband. No dangling strings gave them an appearance of senile imbecility. Were it not for a certain rigidity, sternness, and mental inflexibility—we will call it military ardor with which they were imbued—they would have created envy in the bosom of a fox-hunter.

Mr. Horne was no fox-hunter, but still he seemed to be irresistibly taken with the lady-like propensity of wishing to wear them. "Surely, George," he said, "the General must have been a stouter man than I am"—and he contemplated his own proportions with complacency—"these what's-the-names are quite big enough for me."

I differed in opinion; and was obliged to explain that I thought he did the good living of Ollerton insufficient justice.

"I am sure they are large enough for me," he repeated, with considerable obstinacy. I smiled incredulously; and then, to settle the matter, he resolved that he would try them on. Nobody had been in these rooms for the last hour, and it appeared as though they were never visited. Even the guide had not come on with us, but was employed in showing other parties about the fortifications. It was clear that this portion of the building was left desolate, and that the experiment might be safely made. So the sportive rector declared that he would for a short time wear the regimentals which had once contained the valorous heart of General Chassé.

With all decorum the Rev. Mr. Horne divested himself of the work of the London artist's needle; and, carefully placing his own garments beyond the reach of dust, essayed to fit himself in military garb.

At that important moment—at the critical instant of the attempt—the clatter of female voices was heard approaching the chamber. They must have suddenly come round some passage corner; for it was evident by the sound that they were close upon us before we had any warning of their advent. At this very minute Mr. Horne was somewhat embarrassed in his attempts, and was not fully in possession of his usual active powers of movement, nor of his usual presence of mind. He only looked for escape; and seeing a door partly open he with difficulty retreated through it, and I followed him. We found that we were in a small dressing-room; and as, by good luck, the door was defended by an inner bolt, my friend was able to protect himself.

"There shall be another siege, at any rate as stout as the last, before I surrender," said he.

As the ladies seemed inclined to linger in the room, it became a matter of importance that the above-named articles should fit, not only for ornament but for use. It was very cold, and Mr. Horne was altogether unused to move in a Highland sphere of life. But alas, alas! General Chassé had not been nurtured in the classical retirement of Ollerton. The ungiving leather would stretch no point to accommodate the divine, though it had been willing to minister to the convenience of the soldier. Mr. Horne was vexed and chilled; and throwing the now hateful garments into a corner, and protecting himself from the cold as best he might, by standing with his knees together and his body somewhat bent, so as to give the skirts of his coat an opportunity of doing extra duty, he begged me to see if those jabbering females were not going to leave him in peace to recover his own property. I accordingly went to the door, and opening it to a small extent I peeped through.

Who shall describe my horror at the sight which I then saw? The scene, which had hitherto been tinted with comic effect, was now becoming so decidedly tragic that I did not dare at once to acquaint my worthy pastor with that which was occurring—and, alas! had already occurred.

Five countrywomen of our own (it was easy to know them by their dress and general aspect) were standing in the middle of the room; and one of them, the centre of the group, the senior harpy of the lot, a maiden lady—I could have sworn to that—with a red nose, held in one hand a huge pair of scissors, and in the other—the already devoted goods of my most unfortunate companion! Down from the waistband, through that goodly expanse, a fell gash had already gone through and through; and in useless, unbecoming disorder the broadcloth fell pendant from her arm on this side and on that. At that moment I confess that I had not the courage to speak to Mr. Horne—not even to look at him.

I must describe that group. Of the figure next to me I could only see the back. It was a broad back, done up in black silk not of the newest. The whole figure, one may say, was dumpy. The black silk was not long, as dresses now are worn, nor wide in its skirts. In every way it was shimpy, considering the breadth it had to cover; and below the silk I saw the heels of two thick shoes, and enough to swear by of two woolen stockings. Above the silk was a red-and-blue shawl; and above that a ponderous, elaborate brown bonnet, as to the materials of which I should not wish to undergo an examination. Over and beyond this I could only see the backs of her two hands. They were held up as though in wonder at that which the red-nosed holder of the scissors had dared to do.

Opposite to this lady, and with her face fully turned to me, was a kindly-looking, fat, motherly woman, with light-colored hair, not in the best order. She was hot and scarlet with exercise, being perhaps too stout for the steep steps of the fortress; and in one hand she held a handkerchief, with which from time to time she wiped her brow. In the other hand she held one of the extremities of my friend's property, feeling—good, careful soul!—what was the texture of that cloth. As she did so, I could see a glance of approbation pass across her warm features. I liked that lady's face, in spite of her untidy hair, and felt that had she been alone my friend would not have been injured.

On either side of her there stood a flaxen-haired maiden, with long curls, large blue eyes, fresh red cheeks, an undefined lumpy nose, and large good-humored mouth. They were as like as two peas, only that one was half an inch taller than the other; and there was no difficulty in discovering, at a moment's glance, that they were the children of that overheated matron who was feeling the web of my friend's cloth.

But the principal figure was she who held the centre place in the group. She was tall and thin, with fierce-looking eyes, rendered more fierce by the spectacles which she wore; with a red nose, as I have said before; and about her an undescribable something which quite convinced me that she had never known—could never know—ought of the comforts of married life. It was she who held the scissors and the black garments. It was she who had given that unkind cut. As I looked at her she whisked herself quickly round from one companion to the other, triumphing in what she had done, and ready to triumph further in what she was about to do. I immediately conceived a deep hatred for that Queen of the Harpies.

"Well, I suppose they can't be wanted again," said the mother, rubbing her forehead.

"Oh dear no!" said she of the red nose. "They are rélics!"

I thought to leap forth; but for what purpose should I have leaped? The accursed scissors had already done their work; and the symmetry, nay, even the utility of the vestment was destroyed.

"General Chassé wore a very good article—I will say that for him," continued the mother.

"Of course he did!" said the Queen Harpy.

"Why should he not, seeing that the country paid for it for him? Well, ladies, who's for having a bit!"

"Oh my! you won't go for to cut them up," said the stout back.

"Won't I?" said the scissors; and she immediately made another incision. "Who's for having a bit? Don't all speak at once."

"I should like a morsel for a pin-cushion," said flaxen-haired Miss No. 1, a young lady about nineteen, actuated by a general affection for all sword-bearing, fire-eating heroes. "I should like to have something to make me think of the poor General!"

Snip, snip went the scissors with professional rapidity, and a round piece was extracted from the back of the calf of the left leg. I shuddered with horror; and so did the Rev. Augustus Horne with cold.

"I hardly think it's proper to cut them up," said Miss No. 2.

"Oh, isn't it?" said the harpy. "Then I'll do what's improper!" and she got her finger and thumb well through the holes in the scissors handles. As she spoke, resolution was plainly marked on her brow.

"Well, if they are to be cut up, I should certainly like a bit for a pen-wiper," said No. 2. No. 2 was a literary young lady with a periodical correspondence, a journal, and an album. Snip, snip went the scissors again, and the broad part of the upper right division afforded ample materials for a pen-wiper.

Then the lady with the back, seeing that the desecration of the article had been completed, plucked up heart of courage and put in her little request: "I think I might have a needle-case out of it," said she, "just as a swivener of the poor General!"—and a long fragment cut rapidly out of the waistband afforded her unqualified delight.

Mamma, with the hot face and untidy hair, came next. "Well, girls," she said, "as you are all served, I don't see why I'm to be left out. Perhaps, Miss Grogram"—she was an old maid, you see—"perhaps, Miss Grogram, you could get me as much as would make a decent-sized reticule."

There was not the slightest difficulty in doing this. The harpy in the centre again went to work, snip, snip, and extracting from that portion of the affairs which usually sustained the greater portion of Mr. Horne's weight two large round pieces of cloth, presented them to the well-pleased matron. "The General knew well where to get a bit of good broadcloth, certainly," said she, again feeling the pieces.

"And now for No. 1," said she whom I so absolutely hated, "I think there is still enough for a pair of slippers. There's nothing so nice for the house as good black-cloth slippers that are warm to the feet and don't show the dirt." And so saying, she spread out on the floor the lacerated remainders.

"There's a nice bit there," said young lady No. 2, poking at one of the pockets with the end of her parasol.

"Yes," said the harpy, contemplating her plunder. "But I'm thinking whether I couldn't get leggings as well. I always wear leggings in the thick of the winter." And so she concluded her operations, and there was nothing left but a melancholy skeleton of seams and buttons.

All this having been achieved, they pocketed their plunder and prepared to depart. There are people who have a wonderful appetite for relics. A stone with which Washington had broken a window when a boy—with which he had done so or had not, for there is little difference; a button that was on a coat of Napoleon's or on that of one of his lackeys; a bullet said to have been picked up at Waterloo or Bunker Hill; these, and such like things, are great treasures. And their most desirable characteristic is the case with which they are attained. Any bullet or any button does the work. Faith alone is necessary. And now these ladies had made themselves happy and glorious with "Relics" of General Chassé cut from the ill-used habiliments of an elderly English gentleman!

They departed at last, and Mr. Horne, for once in an ill humor, followed me into the bedroom—here I must be excused if I draw a veil over his manly sorrow at discovering what fate had done for him. Remember what was his position! unclothed in the castle of Antwerp! The nearest suitable change for those which had been destroyed was locked up in his portmanteau at the Hôtel de Belle Vue in Brussels! He had nothing left to him—literally nothing, in that Antwerp world. There was no other wretched being wandering then in that Dutch town so utterly denuded of the goods of life. For what is a man fit—for what can he be fit—when left in such a position? There are some evils which seem utterly to crush a man; and if there be any misfortune to which a man may be allowed to succumb without imputation on his manliness, surely it is such as this. How was Mr. Horne to return to his hotel without incurring the displeasure of the municipality? That was my first thought.

He had a cloak, but it was at the inn; and I found that my friend was oppressed with a great horror at the idea of being left alone; so that I could not go in search of it. There is an old saying, that no man is a hero, to his valet de chambre—the reason doubtless being this: that it is customary for his valet to see the hero divested of those trappings in which so much of the heroic consists. Who reverences a clergyman without his gown, or a warrior without his sword and sabre-tasche? What would even Minerva be without her helmet?

I do not wish it to be understood that I no longer revered Mr. Horne because he was in an undress; but he himself certainly lost much of his composed, well-sustained dignity of demeanor. He was fearful and querulous, cold, and rather cross. When, forgetting his size, I offered him my own, he thought that I was laughing at him. He began to be afraid that the story would get abroad, and he then and there exacted a promise that I would never tell it during his lifetime. I have kept my word; but now my old friend has been gathered to his fathers, full of years.

At last I got him to the hotel. It was long before he would leave the castle, cloaked though he was; not, indeed, till the shades of evening had dimmed the outlines of men and things, and made indistinct the outward garniture of those who passed to and fro in the streets. Then, wrapped in his cloak, Mr. Horne followed me along the quays and through the narrowest of the streets; and at length, without venturing to return the gaze of any one in the hotel court, he made his way up to his own bedroom.

Dinnerless and supperless he went to his couch. But when there he did consent to receive some consolation in the shape of mutton cutlets and fried potatoes, a savory omelet, and a bottle of claret. The mutton cutlets and fried potatoes at the Golden Fleece at Antwerp are—or were then, for I am speaking now of well-nigh thirty years since—remarkably good; the claret, also, was of the best; and so, by degrees, the look of despairing dismay passed from his face, and some scintillations of the old fire returned to his eyes.

"I wonder whether they find themselves much happier for what they have got?" said he.

"A great deal happier," said I. "They'll boast of those things to all their friends at home, and we shall doubtless see some account of their success in the newspapers."

"It would be delightful to expose their blunder—to show them up. Would it not, George? To turn the tables on them?"

"Yes," said I, "I should like to have the laugh against them."

"So would I, only that I should compromise myself by telling the story. It wouldn't do at all to have the story told at Oxford with my name attached to it."

To this also I assented. To what would I not have assented in my anxiety to make him happy after his misery?

But all was not over yet. He was in bed now, but it was necessary that he should rise again on the morrow. At home, in England, what was required might, perhaps, have been made during the night; but here, among the slow Flemings, any such exertion would have been impossible. Mr. Horne, moreover, had no desire to be troubled in his retirement by a tailor.

Now the landlord of the Golden Fleece was a very stout man—a very stout man indeed. Looking at him as he stood with his hands in his pockets at the portal of his own establishment, I could not but think that he was stouter even than Mr. Horne. But then he was certainly much shorter, and the want of due proportion probably added to his unwieldy appearance. I walked round him once or twice wishfully, measuring him in my eye, and thinking of what texture might be the Sunday best of such a man. The clothes which he then had on were certainly not exactly suited to Mr. Horne's tastes.

He saw that I was observing him, and appeared uneasy and offended. I had already ascertained that he spoke a little English. Of Flemish I knew literally nothing, and in French, with which probably he was also acquainted, I was by no means voluble. The business which I had to transact was intricate, and I required the use of my mother tongue.

It was intricate and delicate, and difficult withal. I began by remarking on the weather, but he did not take my remarks kindly. I am inclined to fancy that he thought I was desirous of borrowing money from him. At any rate he gave me no encouragement in my first advances.

"Vat misfortune?" at last he asked, when I had succeeded in making him understand that a gentleman up stairs required his assistance.

"He has lost these things," and I took hold of my own garments. "It's a long story, or I'd tell you how; but he has not a pair in the world till he get back to Brussels—unless you can lend him one."

"Lost hees br—?" and he opened his eyes wide, and looked at me with astonishment.

"Yes, yes, exactly so," said I, interrupting him. "Most astonishing thing, isn't it? But it's quite true."

"Vas hees money in de pocket?" asked my suspicious landlord.

"No, no, no. It's not so bad as that. His money is all right. I had the money luckily."

"Ah! dat is better. But he have lost hees b—?"

"Yes, yes." I was now getting rather impatient. "There is no mistake about it. He has lost them as sure as you stand there." And then I proceeded to explain that the gentleman in question was very stout, and as he, the landlord, was stout also, he might assist us in this great calamity by a loan from his own wardrobe.

When he found that the money was not in the pocket, and that his bill therefore would be paid, he was not indisposed to be gracious. He would, he said, desire his servant to take up what was required to Mr. Horne's chamber. I endeavored to make him understand that a sombre color would be preferable; but he only answered that he would put the best that he had at the gentleman's disposal. He could not think of offering any thing less than his best on such an occasion. And then he turned his back and went his way, muttering as he went something in Flemish, which I believed to be an exclamation of astonishment that any man should, under any circumstances, lose such an article.

It was now getting late; so when I had taken a short stroll by myself, I went to bed without disturbing Mr. Horne again that night. On the following morning I thought it best not to go to him unless he sent for me; so I desired the boots to let him know that I had ordered breakfast in a private room, and that I would await him there unless he wished to see me. He sent me word back to say that he would be with me very shortly.

He did not keep me waiting above half an hour; but I confess that that half-hour was not pleasantly spent. I feared that his temper would be tried in dressing, and that he would not be able to eat his breakfast in a happy state of mind. So that when I heard his heavy footstep advancing along the passage my heart did misgive me, and I felt that I was trembling.

That step was certainly slower and more ponderous than usual. There was always a certain dignity in the very sound of his movements, but now this seemed to have been enhanced. To judge merely by the step, one would have said that a bishop was coming that way instead of a prebendary.

And then he entered. In the upper half of his august person no alteration was perceptible. The hair was as regular and as graceful as ever, the handkerchief as white, the coat as immaculate; but below his well-filled waistcoat a pair of red plush began to shine in unmitigated splendor, and continued from thence down to within an inch above his knee, nor, as it appeared, could any pulling induce them to descend lower. Mr. Horne always wore black silk stockings—at least so the world supposed—but it was now apparent that the world had been wrong in presuming him to be guilty of such extravagance. Those, at any rate, which he exhibited on the present occasion were more economical. They were silk to the calf, but thence upward they continued their career in white cotton. These then followed the plush; first two snowy, full-sized pillars of white, and then two jet columns of flossy silk. Such was the appearance, on that well-remembered morning, of the Reverend Augustus Horne, as he entered the room in which his breakfast was prepared.

I could see at a glance that a dark frown contracted his eyebrows, and that the compressed muscles of his upper lip gave a strange degree of austerity to his open face. He carried his head proudly on high, determined to be dignified in spite of his misfortunes, and advanced two steps into the room without a remark, as though to show that neither red plush nor black cloth could disarrange the equal poise of his mighty mind.

And after all what are a man's garments but the outward husks in which the fruit is kept duly tempered from the wind?

"The rank is but the guinea stamp,
The man's the gowd for a' that."

And is not the tailor's art as little worthy, as insignificant as that of the king who makes

"A marquis, duke, and a' that?"

Who would be content to think that his manly dignity depended on his coat and waistcoat, or his hold on the world's esteem on any other garment of usual wear? That no such weakness soiled his mind Mr. Horne was determined to prove; and thus he entered the room with measured tread and stern, dignified demeanor.

Having advanced two steps his eye caught mine. I do not know whether he was moved by some unconscious smile on my part—for in truth I endeavored to seem as indifferent as himself to the nature of his dress—or whether he was invincibly tickled by some inward fancy of his own, but suddenly his advancing step ceased, a broad flash of comic humor spread itself over his features, he retreated with his back against the wall, and then burst out into an immoderate roar of loud laughter.

And I—what else could I then do but laugh? He laughed, and I laughed. He roared, and I roared. He lifted up his vast legs to view till the rays of the morning sun shone through the window on the bright hues which he displayed; and he did not sit down to his breakfast till he had in every fantastic attitude shown off to the best advantage the red plush of which he had so recently become proud.

An Antwerp private cabriolet on that day reached the yard of the Hôtel de Belle Vue at about 4 p.m., and four waiters, in a frenzy of astonishment, saw the Reverend Augustus Horne descend from the vehicle and seek his chamber dressed in the garments which I have described; but I am inclined to think that he has never since favored any of his friends with such a sight.

It was on the next evening after this that I went out to drink tea with two maiden ladies, relatives of mine, who kept a seminary for English girls at Brussels. The Misses Macmanus were very worthy women, and earned their bread in an upright, painstaking manner. I would not for worlds have passed through Brussels without paying them this compliment. They were, however, perhaps a little dull, and I was aware that I should not probably meet in their drawing-room many of the fashionable inhabitants of the city. Mr. Horne had declined to accompany me; but in doing so he was good enough to express a warm admiration for the character of my worthy cousins.

The elder Miss Macmanus, in her little note, had informed me that she would have the pleasure of introducing me to a few of my "compatriots." I presumed she meant Englishmen; and as I was in the habit of meeting such every day of my life at home, I can not say that I was peculiarly elevated by the promise. When, however, I entered the room, there was no Englishman there—there was no man of any kind; there were twelve ladies collected together with the view of making the evening pass agreeably to me, the single virile being among them all. I felt as though I were a sort of Mohammed in Paradise; but I certainly felt also that the Paradise was none of my own choosing.

In the centre of the amphitheatre which the ladies formed sat the two Misses Macmanus—there, at least, they sat when they had completed the process of shaking hands with me. To the left of them, making one wing of the semicircle, were arranged the five pupils by attending to whom the Misses Macmanus earned their living; and the other wing consisted of the five ladies who had furnished themselves with relics of General Chassé. They were my "compatriots."

I was introduced to them all, one after the other; but their names did not abide in my memory one moment. I was thinking too much of the singularity of the adventure, and could not attend to such minutiae. That the red-nosed harpy was Miss Grogam, that I remembered—that, I may say, I never shall forget. But whether the motherly lady with the somewhat blowsy hair was Mrs. Jones, or Mrs. Green, or Mrs. Walker, I can not now say. The dumpy female with the broad back was always called Aunt Sally by the young ladies.

Too much sugar spoils one's tea; I think I have heard that even prosperity will cloy when it comes in overdoses; and a school-boy has been known to be overdone with jam. I myself have always been peculiarly attached to ladies' society, and have avoided bachelor parties as things execrable in their very nature. But on this special occasion I felt myself to be that school-boy—I was literally overdone with jam. My tea was all sugar, so that I could not drink it. I was one among twelve—what could I do or say? The proportion of alloy was too small to have any effect in changing the nature of the virgin silver, and the conversation became absolutely feminine.

I must confess also that my previous experience as to these compatriots of mine had not prejudiced me in their favor. I regarded them with—I am ashamed to say so, seeing that they were ladies—but almost with loathing. When last I had seen them their occupation had reminded me of some obscene feast, of harpies, or almost of ghouls. They had brought down to the verge of desperation the man whom of all men I most venerated. On these accounts I was inclined to be taciturn with reference to them—and then what could I have to say to the Misses Macmanus's five pupils?

My cousins at first made an effort or two in my favor; but these efforts were fruitless. I soon died away into utter unrecognized insignificance; and the conversation, as I have before said, became feminine; and indeed that horrid Miss Grogam, who was, as it were, the princess of the ghouls, nearly monopolized the whole of it. Mamma Jones—we will call her Jones for the occasion—put in a word now and then, as did also the elder and more energetic Miss Macmanus. The dumpy lady with the broad back ate tea-cake incessantly; the two daughters looked scornful, as though they were above their company with reference to the five pupils; and the five pupils themselves sat in a row with the utmost propriety, each with her hands crossed on her lap before her.

Of what they were talking at last I became utterly oblivious. They had ignored me, going into realms of muslin, questions of maid servants, female rights, and cheap under-clothing; and I therefore had ignored them. My mind had gone back to Mr. Horne and his garments. While they spoke of their rights, I was thinking of his wrongs; when they mentioned the price of flannel, I thought of that of broadcloth.

But of a sudden my attention was arrested. Miss Macmanus had said something of the black silks of Antwerp, when Miss Grogam replied that she had just returned from that city, and had there enjoyed a great success. My cousin had again asked something about the black silks, thinking, no doubt, that Miss Grogam had achieved some bargain; but that lady had soon undeceived her.

"Oh no," said Miss Grogam, "it was at the castle. We got such beautiful relics of General Chassé! Didn't we, Mrs. Jones?"

"Indeed we did," said Mrs. Jones, bringing out from beneath the skirts of her dress and ostensibly displaying a large black bag.

"And I've got such a beautiful needle-case," said the broad-back, displaying her prize. "I've been making it up all the morning." And she handed over the article to Miss Macmanus.

"And only look at this duck of a pen-wiper," simpered flaxen-hair No. 2. "Only think of wiping one's pens with relics of General Chassé!" and she handed it over to the other Miss Macmanus.

"And mine's a pin-cushion," said No. 1, exhibiting the trophy.

"But that's nothing to what I've got," said Miss Grogam. "In the first place, there's a pair of slippers—a beautiful pair—they're not made up yet, of course; and then—"

The two Misses Macmanus and their five pupils were sitting open-eared, open-eyed, and open-mouthed. How all these sombre-looking articles could be relics of General Chassé did not at first appear clear to them.

"What are they, Miss Grogam?" said the elder Miss Macmanus, holding the needle-case in one hand and Mrs. Jones's bag in the other. Miss Macmanus was a strong-minded female, and I revered my cousin when I saw the decided way in which she intended to put down the greedy annoyance of Miss Grogam.

"They are relics."

"But where do they come from, Miss Grogam?"

"Why, from the castle, to be sure—from General Chassé's own rooms."

"Did any body sell them to you?"

"No."

"Or give them to you?"

"Why, no—at least not exactly give."

"There they were, and she took 'em," said the broad-back.

Oh, what a look Miss Grogam gave her! "Took them! of course I took them. That is, you took them as much as I did. They were things that we found lying about."

"What things?" asked Miss Macmanus, in a peculiarly strong-minded tone.

Miss Grogam seemed to be for a moment silenced. I had been ignored, as I have said, and my existence forgotten; but now I observed that the eyes of the culprits were turned toward me—the eyes, that is, of four of them. Mrs. Jones looked at me from beneath her fan; the two girls glanced at me furtively, and then their eyes fell to the lowest flounces of their frocks; Miss Grogam turned her spectacles right upon me, and I fancied that she nodded her head at me as a sort of answer to Miss Macmanus; the five pupils opened their mouths and eyes wider; but she of the broad back was nothing abashed. It would have been nothing to her had there been a dozen gentlemen in the room. "We just found a pair of black —." The whole truth was told in the plainest possible language.

"Oh, Aunt Sally!" "Aunt Sally, how can you?" "Hold your tongue, Aunt Sally!"

"And then Miss Grogam just cut them up with her scissors," continued Aunt Sally, not a whit abashed, "and gave us each a bit, only she took more than half for herself." It was clear to me that there had been some quarrel, some delicious quarrel, between Aunt Sally and Miss Grogam. Through the whole adventure I had rather respected Aunt Sally. "She took more than half for herself," continued Aunt Sally. "She kept all the —."

"Jemima," said the elder Miss Macmanus, interrupting the speaker, and addressing her sister, "it is time, I think, for the young ladies to retire. Will you be kind enough to see them to their rooms?" The five pupils thereupon rose from their seats and courtesied. They then left the room in file, the younger Miss Macmanus showing them the way.

"But we haven't done any harm, have we?" asked Mrs. Jones, with some tremulousness in her voice.

"Well, I don't know," said Miss Macmanus. "What I'm thinking of now is this—to whom, I wonder, did the garments properly belong? Who had been the owner and wearer of them?"

"Why, General Chassé, of course," said Miss Grogam.

"They were the General's," repeated the two young ladies; blushing, however, as they alluded to the subject.

"Well, we thought they were the General's, certainly; and a very excellent article they were," said Mrs. Jones.

"Perhaps they were the butler's?" said Aunt Sally. I certainly had not given her credit for so much sarcasm.

"Butler's!" exclaimed Miss Grogam, with a toss of her head.

"Oh! Aunt Sally, Aunt Sally! how can you?" shrieked the two young ladies.

"Oh laws!" ejaculated Mrs. Jones.

"I don't think that they could have belonged to the butler," said Miss Macmanus, with much authority, "seeing that domestics in this country are never clad in garments of that description; so far my own observation enables me to speak with certainty. But it is equally sure that they were never the property of the General lately in command at Antwerp. Generals, when they are in full dress, wear ornamental lace upon their—their regimentals; and when—" So much she said, and something more, which it may be unnecessary that I should repeat; but such were her eloquence and logic that no doubt would have been left on the mind of any impartial hearer. If an argumentative speaker ever proved any thing, Miss Macmanus proved that General Chassé had never been the wearer of the article in question.

"But I know very well they were his!" said Miss Grogam, who was not an impartial hearer. "Of course they were; whose else's should they be?"

"I'm sure I hope they were his," said one of the young ladies, almost crying.

"I wish I'd never taken it," said the other.

"Dear, dear, dear!" said Mrs. Jones.

"I'll give you my needle-case, Miss Grogam," said Aunt Sally.

I had sat hitherto silent during the whole scene, meditating how best I might confound the red-nosed harpy. Now, I thought, was the time for me to strike in.

"I really think, ladies, that there has been some mistake," said I.

"There has been no mistake at all, Sir!" said Miss Grogam.

"Perhaps not," I answered, very mildly; "very likely not. But some affair of a similar nature was very much talked about in Antwerp yesterday."

"Oh laws!" again ejaculated Mrs. Jones.

"The affair I allude to has been talked about a good deal, certainly," I continued. "But perhaps it may be altogether a different circumstance."

"And what may be the circumstance to which you allude?" asked Miss Macmanus, in the same authoritative tone.

"I dare say it has nothing to do with these ladies," said I; "but a piece of cloth, of the nature they have described, was cut up in the Castle of Antwerp on the day before yesterday. It belonged to a gentleman who was visiting the place; and I was given to understand that he is determined to punish the people who have wronged him."

"It can't be the same," said Miss Grogam; but I could see that she was trembling.

"Oh laws! what will become of us?" said Mrs. Jones.

"You can all prove that I didn't touch them, and that I warned her not," said Aunt Sally. In the mean time the two young ladies had almost fainted behind their fans.

"But how had it come to pass," asked Miss Macmanus, "that the gentleman had—"

"I know nothing more about it, cousin," said I; "only it does seem that there is an odd coincidence."

Immediately after this I took my leave. I saw that I had avenged my friend, and spread dismay in the hearts of those who had injured him. I had learned in the course of the evening at what hotel the five ladies were staying; and in the course of the next morning I sauntered into the hall, and finding one of the porters alone, asked if they were still there. The man told me that they had started by the earliest diligence. "And," said he, "if you are a friend of theirs, perhaps you will take charge of these things, which they have left behind them?" So saying, he pointed to a table at the back of the hall, on which were lying the black bag, the black needle-case, the black pin-cushion, and the black pen-wiper. There was also a heap of fragments of cloth, which I well knew had been intended by Miss Grogam for the comfort of her feet and ankles.

I declined the commission, however. They were no special friends of mine, I said; and I left all the relics still lying on the little table in the back hall.

"Upon the whole, I am satisfied!" said the Rev. Augustus Horne, when I told him the finale of the story.

THE ARABS IN SPAIN.*

FROM the contemporary barbarism of the native people of Europe, who could scarcely be said to have emerged from the savage state, unclean in person, benighted in mind, inhabiting huts in which it was a token of wealth if there were bulrushes on the floor and straw mats against the wall, miserably fed on beans, vetches, roots, and even the bark of trees, clad in garments of untanned skin, or, at the best, in leather—perennial in durability, but not conducive to personal purity—a state in which the pomp of royalty was sufficiently and satisfactorily manifested in the equipage of the sovereign, an ox-cart drawn by not less than two yokes of cattle, quickened in their movements by the goads of pedestrian serfs whose legs were wrapped in wisps of straw; from a people devout believers in all the wild fictions of shrine-miracles and preposterous relics; from the degradation of a base theology, and from the disputes of ambitious ecclesiastics for power, it is pleasant to turn to the southwest corner of the continent, whence, under auspices of a very different kind, the irradiations of light were to break forth. The crescent in the west was soon to pass eastward to its full.

These were the circumstances of the Arab conquest of Spain. In that country the Arian creed had been supplanted by the Orthodox, and the customary persecutions had set in. From the time of the Emperor Hadrian, who had transported 50,000 Jewish families into Spain, that race had singularly increased, and, as might be expected, had received no mercy at the hands of the Orthodox. Ninety thousand individuals had recently suffered compulsory baptism; and so had been brought under the atrocious Catholic law, that whoever has been baptized shall be compelled to continue the observances of the Church. The Gothic monarchy was elective, and Roderic had succeeded to the throne, to the prejudice of the heirs of his predecessor. Though a very brave soldier, he was a luxurious and licentious man. It was the custom of the Goths to send their children to Toledo to be educated; and under these circumstances a young girl of extraordinary beauty, the daughter of Count Julian, Governor of Ceuta, in Africa, was residing there. King Roderic fell passionately in love with her, and, being unable to overcome her virtuous resolution by persuasion, gratified himself by violence. The girl found means to inform her father of what had occurred. "By the living God!" exclaimed the Count, in a paroxysm of wrath, "I will be revenged!" But dissembling his rage, he crossed over into Spain, had an understanding with Oppas, the Archbishop of Toledo, and other disaffected ecclesiastics, and under specious pretenses lulled the suspicions of Roderic, and brought his daughter away. And now he opened communications with the Emir Musa, prevailing upon him to attempt the conquest of the country, and offering that he himself would lead the way. The conditions were settled between them, and the consent of the Calif to the expedition obtained. Tarik, a lieutenant of the Emir, was sent across the straits with the van of the army. He landed on the rock called in memory of his name Gibraltar, April, 711. In the battle that ensued, a part of Roderic's troops, together with the Archbishop of Toledo, consummated their treasonable compact, and deserted to the Arabs; the rest were panic-stricken. In the rout Roderic himself was drowned in the waters of the Guadalquivir.

Tarik now proceeded rapidly northward, and was soon joined by his superior, the Emir Musa, who was not, perhaps, without jealousy at his success. As the Arab historians say, the Almighty delivered the idolators into their hand, and gave them one victory after another. As the towns successively fell, they left them in charge of the Jews, to whose revenge the conquest was largely due, and who could be thoroughly trusted; nor did they pause in their march until they had passed the French frontier and reached the Rhone. It was the intention of Musa to cross the European continent to Constantinople, subjugating the Frank, German, and Italian barbarians by the way. At this time it seemed impossible that France could escape the fate of Spain, and if she fell the threat of Musa would inevitably have come to pass, that he would preach the Unity of God in the Vatican.

But a quarrel had arisen between him and Tarik, who had been imprisoned and even scourged. The friends of the latter, however, did not fail him at the court of Damascus. An envoy from the Calif Alwalid appeared, ordering Musa to desist from his enterprise, to return to Syria and exonerate himself of the things laid to his charge. But Musa bribed the envoy to let him advance. Hereupon the angry Calif dispatched a second messenger, who, in face of the Moslems and Christians, audaciously arrested him at the head of his troops by the bridle of his horse. The conqueror of Spain was compelled to return; he was cast into prison, fined 200,000 pieces of gold, publicly whipped, and his life with difficulty spared. As is related of Belisarius, Musa was driven as a beggar to solicit charity, and the Saracen conqueror of Spain ended his days in grief and absolute want.

These dissensions among the Arabs, far more than the sword of Charles Martel, prevented the Mohammedanization of France. Their historians admit the great check received at the battle of Tours, in which Abderrahman was killed; they call that field the Place of the Martyrs; but their accounts by no means correspond to the relations of the Christian authors, who affirm that 375,000 Mohammedans fell, but only fifteen hundred Christians. The defeat was not so disastrous but that in a few months they were able to resume their advance, and their progress was arrested only by renewed dissensions among themselves—dissensions not alone among the leaders in Spain, but also more serious ones of aspirants for the Caliphate in Asia. On the overthrow of the Omniade house, Abderrahman, one of that family, escaped to Spain, which repaid the patronage of its conquest by acknowledging him as its sovereign. He made Cordova the seat of his government. Neither he nor his immediate successors took any other title but that of Emir, out of respect to the Calif, who resided at Bagdad, the metropolis of Islam, though they maintained a rivalry with him in the patronage of letters and science. Abderrahman himself strengthened his power by an alliance with Charlemagne.

If it be true that the Arabs burned the library of Alexandria, there was at that time danger that their fanaticism would lend itself to the Byzantine system; but it was only for a moment that the Califs fell into this evil policy. They very soon became distinguished patrons of learning. It has been said that they overran the domains of science as quickly as they overran the realms of their neighbors. It became customary for the first dignities of the state to be held by men distinguished for their erudition. Some of the maxims current show how much literature was esteemed. "The ink of the doctor is equally valuable as the blood of the martyr." "Paradise is as much for him who has rightly used the pen as for him who has fallen by the sword." "The world is sustained by four things only—the learning of the wise, the justice of the great, the prayers of the good, and the valor of the brave." Within twenty-five years after the death of Mohammed, under Ali, the fourth Calif, the patronage of learning had become a settled principle of the Mohammedan system. Under the Califs of Bagdad this principle was thoroughly carried out. The cultivators of mathematics, astronomy, medicine, and general literature abounded in the court of Almansor, who invited all philosophers, offering them his protection whatever their religious opinions might be. His successor, Alraschid, is said never to have traveled without a retinue of a hundred learned men. This great sovereign issued an edict that no mosque should be built unless there was a school attached to it. It was he who confided the superintendence of his schools to the Nestorian Masué. His successor, Almaimon, was brought up among Greek and Persian mathematicians, philosophers, and physicians. They continued his associates all his life. By these sovereigns the establishment of libraries was incessantly prosecuted, and the collection and copying of manuscripts properly organized. In all the great cities schools abounded; in Alexandria there were not less than twenty. As might be expected, this could not take place without exciting the indignation of the old fanatical party, who not only remonstrated with Almaimon, but threatened him with the vengeance of God for thus disturbing the faith of the people. However, what had thus been commenced as a matter of profound policy soon grew into a habit, and it was observed that whenever an Emir managed to make himself independent, he forthwith opened academies.

The Arabs furnish a striking illustration of the successive phases of national life. They first come before us as fetich worshippers, having their age of credulity, their object of superstition being the black stone in the temple at Mecca. They pass through an age of inquiry, rendering possible the advent of Mohammed. Then follows their age of faith, the blind fanaticism of which quickly led them to overspread all adjoining countries; and at last comes their period of maturity, their age of reason. The striking feature of their movement is the quickness with which they passed through these successive phases, and the intensity of their national life.

This singular rapidity of national life was favored by very obvious circumstances. The long and desolating wars between Heraclius and Chosroes had altogether destroyed the mercantile relations of the Roman and Persian empires, and had thrown the entire Oriental and African trade into the hands of the Arabs. As a merchant, Mohammed himself makes his first appearance. The first we hear in his history are the journeys he has made as the factor of the wealthy Cadijah. In these expeditions with the caravans to Damascus and other Syrian cities, he was brought in contact with Jews and men of affairs, who from the nature of their pursuits were of more enlarged views than mere Arab chieftains or the petty tradesmen of Arab towns. Through such agency the first impetus was given.

As to the rapid success, its causes are in like manner so plain as to take away all surprise. It is no wonder that in fifty years, as Abderahman wrote to the Calif, not only had the tribute from the entire north of Africa ceased, through the population having become altogether Mohammedan, but that the Moors boasted an Arab descent as their greatest glory. For besides the sectarian animosities on which I have dwelt, as facilitating the first conquest of the Christians, and the dreadful shock that had been given by the capture of the Holy City, Jerusalem, the insulting and burning the sepulchre of Our Saviour, and the carrying away of his cross as a trophy by the Persians, there were other very powerful causes. For many years the taxation imposed by the Emperors of Constantinople on their subjects in Asia and Africa had been not only excessive and extortionate but likewise complicated. This the Califs replaced by a simple, well-defined tribute, of far less amount. Thus, in the case of Cyprus, the sum paid to the Calif was only half of what it had been to the Emperor, and indeed the lower orders were never made to feel the bitterness of conquest, the blows fell on the ecclesiastics not on the population, and between them there was but little sympathy. In the eyes of the ignorant nations the prestige of the patriarchs and bishops was utterly destroyed, by their detected helplessness to prevent the capture and insult of the sacred places. On the payment of a trifling sum the conqueror guaranteed to the Christian and the Jew absolute security for their worship. An equivalent was given for a price. Religious freedom was bought with money. Numerous instances might be given of the scrupulous integrity with which the Arab commanders complied with their part of the contract. The example set by Omar on the steps of the Church of the Resurrection was followed by Moawiyah, who actually rebuilt the church of Edessa for his Christian subjects; and by Abdalmalik, who, when he had commenced converting that of Damascus into a mosque, forthwith desisted on finding that the Christians were entitled to it by the terms of the capitulation. If these things were done in the first fervor of victory, the principles on which they depended were all the more powerful after the Arabs had become tinctured with Nestorian and Jewish influences, and were a learned nation. It is related of Ali, the son-in-law of Mohammed, and the fourth successor in the Caliphate, that he gave himself up to letters. Among his sayings are recorded such as these: "Eminence in science is the highest of honors;" "He dies not who gives life to learning;" "The greatest ornament of a man is erudition." When the sovereign felt and expressed such sentiments it was impossible but that a liberal policy should prevail.

Besides these there were other incentives not less powerful. To one whose faith sat lightly upon him, or who valued it less than the tribute to be paid, it only required the repetition of a short sentence acknowledging the unity of God and the divine mission of the Prophet, and he forthwith became, though a captive or a slave, the equal and friend of his conqueror. Doubtless many thousands were under these circumstances carried away. As respects the female sex, the Arab system was very far from being oppressive; some have even asserted that "the Christian women found in the seraglios a delightful retreat." But above all, polygamy acted most effectually in consolidating the conquests; the large families that were raised—some are mentioned of more than one hundred and eighty children—compressed into the course of a few years events that would otherwise have taken many generations for their accomplishment. These children gloried in their Arab descent, and being taught to speak the language of their conquering fathers, became to all intents and purposes Arabs. This diffusion of the language was sometimes expedited by the edicts of the Califs; thus Alwalid I. prohibited the use of Greek, directing the Arabic to be employed in its stead.

If thus without difficulty we recognize the causes which led to the rapid diffusion of the Arab power, we also without difficulty recognize those which led to its check and eventual dissolution. Arab conquest implied, from the scale on which it was pursued, the forthgoing of the whole nation. It could only be accomplished, and in a temporary manner sustained, by an excessive and incessant drain of the native Arab population. That immobility, or, at the best, slow progress, the nation had for so many ages displayed, was at an end, society was moved to its foundations, a fanatical delirium possessed it, the greatest and boldest enterprises were entered upon without hesitation, the wildest hopes or passions of men might be speedily gratified, wealth and beauty were the tangible rewards of valor in this life, to say nothing of Paradise in the next. But such an outrush of a nation in all directions implied the quick growth of diverse interests and opposing policies. The necessary consequence of the Arab system was subdivision and breaking up. The circumstances of its growth rendered it certain that a decomposition would take place in the political, and not, as has been in the case of the ecclesiastical Roman system, in the theological direction. All this is illustrated both in the earlier and later Saracenic history. Their intestine divisions and quarrels checked the advance of the Arabs in the south of France; it was similar divisions and quarrels which led to their expulsion from Spain. The political decomposition went on until there were almost as many independent sovereignties as towns—Cordova, Toledo, Seville, Jaen, Granada, and many other places, were examples. In the rivalries and petty oppositions necessarily arising the African connections were not cultivated, and when the time of trial came no reliance could be placed on that country.

War makes a people run through its phases of existence fast. It would have taken the Arabs many thousand years to have advanced, intellectually, as far as they did in a single century, had they, as a nation, remained in profound peace. They did not so much shake off that dead weight which clogs the movement of a nation—its inert mass of common people; they converted that mass into a living force. National progress is the sum of individual progress; national immobility the result of individual quiescence. Arabian life was run through with rapidity, because an unrestrained career was opened to every man; and yet, quick as the movement was, it manifested all those unavoidable phases through which, whether its motion be swift or slow, humanity must unavoidably pass.

Scarcely had the Arabs become firmly settled in Spain before they commenced a brilliant career. Adopting what had now become the established policy of the Commanders of the Faithful in Asia, the Califs of Cordova distinguished themselves as patrons of learning, and set an example of refinement strongly contrasting with the condition of the native European princes. Cordova, under their administration, at its highest point of prosperity, boasted of more than two hundred thousand houses, and more than a million of inhabitants. After sunset a man might walk through it in a straight line for ten miles by the light of the public lamps. Seven hundred years after this time there was not so much as one public lamp in London. Its streets were solidly paved. In Paris, centuries subsequently, whoever stepped over his threshold on a rainy day stepped up to his ankles in mud. Other cities, as Granada, Seville, Toledo, considered themselves rivals of Cordova. The palaces of the Califs were decorated with inconceivable luxury. Those sovereigns might well look down with supercilious contempt on the dwellings of the rulers of Germany, France, and England, which were scarce better than stables—chimneyless, windowless, and with a hole in the roof for the smoke to escape, like the wigwags of certain Indians. The Spanish Mohammedans had brought with them all the luxuries and all the prodigalities of Asia. Their residences stood forth against the clear blue sky, or were embosomed in woods; they had polished marble balconies overhanging orange-gardens, courts with cascades of water, shadowy retreats provocative of slumber in the heat of the day, retiring rooms vaulted with stained glass, speckled with gold, over which streams of water were made to gush; the floors and walls were of exquisite mosaic; here, a fountain of quicksilver shot up in a glistening spray, the glittering particles falling with a tranquil sound like fairy bells; there, apartments into which cool air was drawn from flower-gardens, in summer, by means of ventilating towers, and in the winter through earthen pipes, or caleducts, embedded in the walls; the hypocaust in the vaults below breathing forth volumes of warm and perfumed air through these hidden passages. The walls were not covered with wainscot, but adorned with arabesques, and paintings of agricultural scenes and views of Paradise. From the ceilings, corniced with fretted gold, vast chandeliers depended; it is said that one was so large that it contained 1084 lamps. Clusters of frail marble columns surprised the beholder with the vast weights they bore. In the boudoirs of the sultanas they were sometimes of verd antique, and incrustated with lapis lazuli. The furniture was of sandal and citron wood, inlaid with mother-of-pearl, ivory, silver, or relieved with gold and precious malachite. In orderly confusion were arranged vases of rock crystal, Chinese porcelains, and tables of exquisite mosaic. The winter apartments were hung with rich tapestry; the floors were covered with embroidered Persian carpets. Pillows and couches, of elegant forms, were scattered about the rooms, which were perfumed with frankincense. It was the intention of the Saracen architects, by excluding the view of the external landscape, to concentrate attention on his work; and since the representation of the human form was religiously forbidden, and that source of decoration denied, his imagination ran riot with the complicated arabesques he introduced, and sought every opportunity of replacing the prohibited works of art by the trophies and rarities of the garden. It was for this reason that the Arabs never produced artists; religion turned them from the beautiful, and made them soldiers, philosophers, and men of affairs. Splendid flowers and rare exotics ornamented the court-yards, and even the inner chambers. Great care was taken to make due provision for the cleanliness, occupation, and amusement of the inmates. Through pipes of metal, water, both warm and cold, to suit the season of the year, was delivered into baths of marble; in niches where the current of air could be artificially directed hung dripping alcazzaras. There were whispering-galleries for the amusement of the women; labyrinths and marble play-courts for the children; for the master himself, grand libraries. The Calif Alhakam's was so large that the catalogue alone filled forty volumes. He had also apartments for the transcribing, binding, and ornamenting of books. A taste for calligraphy and the possession of splendidly-illuminated manuscripts seems to have anticipated in the Califs, both of Asia and Spain, the taste for statuary and paintings among the later Popes of Rome.

Such were the palace and gardens of Zehra, in which Abderrahman III. honored his favorite sultana. The edifice had 1200 columns of Greek, Italian, Spanish, and African marble; its hall of audience was incrustated with gold and pearls. Through the long corridors of its seraglio black eunuchs silently glided. The ladies of the harem, both wives and concubines, were of inconceivable beauty. To that establishment alone 6300 persons were attached. The body-guard of the sovereign was composed of 12,000 horsemen, whose cimiers and belts were studded with gold. This was that Abderrahman who, after a glorious reign of fifty years, sat down to count the number of days of unalloyed happiness he had experienced, and could only enumerate fourteen. "O man!" exclaimed the plaintive Calif, "put not thy trust in this present world."

No nation has ever excelled the Spanish Arabs in the beauty and costliness of their pleasure-gardens. To them, also, we owe the introduction of very many of our most valuable cultivated fruits, such as the peach. Retaining the love of their ancestors for the cooling effect of water in a hot climate, they spared no pains in the superfluity of fountains, hydraulic works, and artificial lakes in which fish were raised for the table. In such a lake, attached to the palace of Cordova, many loaves were cast each day to feed the fish. There were also menageries of foreign animals; aviaries of rare birds; manufactories in which skilled workmen, obtained from foreign countries, displayed their art in textures of silk, cotton, linen, and in all the miracles of the loom; in jewelry and filagree work, with which they ministered to the female pride of the sultanas and concubines. Under the shade of cypresses cascades disappeared; among flowering shrubs there were winding walks, bowers of roses, seats cut out of the rock, and crypt-like grottoes hewn in the living stone. Nowhere was ornamental gardening better understood, for not only did the artist try to please the eye as it wandered over the pleasant gradation of vegetable color and form—he also boasted his success in the gratification of the sense of smell by the studied succession of perfumes from beds of flowers.

To these Saracens we are indebted for many of our personal comforts. Religiously cleanly, it was not possible for them to clothe according to the fashion of the natives of Europe, in a garment unchanged till it dropped to pieces of itself, a loathsome mass of vermin, stench, and rags. No Arab, who had been a minister of state, or the associate or antagonist of a sovereign, would have offered such a spectacle as the corpse of Thomas à Becket when his haircloth shirt was removed. They taught us the use of the often changed and often washed under-garment of linen or cotton, which still passes among ladies under its old Arabic name. But to cleanliness they were not unwilling to add ornament. Especially among women of the higher classes was the love of finery a passion. Their outer garments were often of silk, embroidered and decorated with gems and woven gold. So fond were the Moorish women of gay colors, and the lustre of chrysolites, hyacinths, emeralds, and sapphires, that it was quaintly said that the interior of any public building, in which they were permitted to appear, looked like a flower-meadow in the spring besprinkled with rain.

In the midst of all this luxury, which can not be looked upon by the historian with disdain, since in the end it produced a most important result in the south of France, the Spanish Califs, emulating the example of their Asiatic compeers, and in this strongly contrasting with the Popes of Rome, were not only the patrons but the personal cultivators of all the branches of human learning. One of them was himself the author of a work on Polite literature in not less than fifty volumes, another wrote a treatise on Algebra. When Zaryab the musician came from the East to Spain, the Calif Abderrahman rode forth to meet him in honor. The college of music in Cordova was sustained by ample government patronage, and is said to have produced many illustrious professors.

The Arabs never translated into their own tongue the great Greek poets, though they so sedulously collected and translated the Greek philosophers. Their religious sentiments and sedate character caused them to abominate the lewdness of our classical mythology, and to denounce indignantly any connection between the licentious, impure Olympian Jove and the Most High God as an insufferable and unpardonable blasphemy. Haroun Alraschid had gratified his curiosity by causing Homer to be translated into Syriac, but he did not adventure on rendering the great epics into Arabic. Notwithstanding this aversion to our graceful but not unobjectionable ancient poetry, among them originated the Tensons or poetic disputations, carried afterward to perfection among the Troubadours; from them also the Provençals learned to employ jongleurs. Across the Pyrenees literary, philosophical, and military adventurers were perpetually passing; and thus the luxury, the taste, and, above all, the chivalrous gallantry and elegant courtesies of Moorish society, found their way from Granada and Cordova to Provence and Languedoc. The French and German and English nobles imbibed the Arab admiration for the horse; they learned to pride themselves on skillful riding. Hunting and falconry became their fashionable pastimes; they tried to emulate that Arab skill which had produced the celebrated breed of Andalusian horses. It was an age of grandeur and gallantry, the pastimes were tilts and tournaments; the refined society of Cordova prided itself in its politeness. A gay contagion also spread from the beautiful Moorish miscreants to their sisters beyond the mountains; the South of France was full of the witcheries of female fascinations, and of dancing to the lute and mandolin. Even in Italy and Sicily the love-song became the favorite composition, and out of these genial but not orthodox beginnings, the polite literature of modern Europe arose. The pleasant epidemic spread by degrees along every hill-side and valley. In monasteries, voices that had been vowed to celibacy, might be heard caroling stanzas of which St. Jerome would hardly have approved; there was many a juicy Abbot, who could troll forth in jocund strains, like those of the merry sinners of Malaga and Xeres, the charms of women and wine, though one was forbidden to the Moslem and one to the monk. The sedate gray beards of Cordova had already applied to the supreme judge to have the songs of the Spanish Jew, Abraham Ibn Sahal, prohibited, for there was not a youth nor woman nor child in the city, who could not repeat them by heart. Their immoral tendency was a public scandal. The light gayety of Spain was reflected in the coarser habits of the northern countries. It was an Archdeacon of Oxford who sung,

"Mihi sit propositum in tabernâ mori,
Vinum sit appositum morientis ori,
Ut dicant, cum venerint angelorum chori;
'Deus sit propitius huic potatori,'" etc.

Even as early as the tenth century persons having a taste for learning, and for elegant amenities, found their way into Spain from all adjoining countries—a practice in subsequent years still more indulged in, when it became illustrated by the brilliant success of Gerbert, who passed from the infidel University of Cordova to the Papacy of Rome.

The Califs of the West carried out the precepts of Ali, the fourth successor of Mohammed, in the patronage of literature. They established libraries in all their chief towns; it is said that not less than seventy were in existence. To every mosque was attached a public school, in which the children of the poor were taught to read and write, and instructed in the precepts of the Koran. For those in easier circumstances there were academies usually arranged in twenty-five or thirty apartments, each calculated for accommodating four students; the academy being presided over by a rector. In Cordova, Granada, and other great cities, there were Universities frequently under the superintendence of Jews; the Mohammedan maxim being that the real learning of a man is of vastly more public importance than any particular religious opinions he may entertain. In this they followed the example of the Asiatic Calif, Haroun Alraschid, who actually conferred the superintendence of his schools on John Ibn Masuë, a Nestorian Christian. The Mohammedan liberality was in striking contrast with the intolerance of Europe. Indeed it may be doubted whether at this moment any European nation is sufficiently advanced to follow such an example. In the Universities the professors of polite literature gave lectures upon Arabic classical works; others taught rhetoric, or composition, or mathematics, or astronomy, or other sciences. From these institutions many of the practices observed in our colleges were derived. They held Commencements as we do, in which poems were read and orations delivered in presence of the public. They had also, in addition to these schools of general learning, professional ones, particularly for medicine.

With a pride perhaps not altogether inexcusable, the Arabians boasted of their language as being the most perfect spoken by man. Mohammed himself, when challenged to produce a miracle in proof of the authenticity of his mission, uniformly pointed to the composition of the Koran, its unapproachable excellence vindicating its inspiration. The orthodox Moslems—the Moslems are those who are submissively resigned to the Divine will—are wont to assert that every page of that book is indeed a conspicuous miracle. It is not then surprising that, in the Arabian schools, great attention was paid to the study of language, and that so many celebrated grammarians were produced. By these scholars dictionaries, similar to those now in use, were composed; their copiousness is indicated by the circumstance that one of them consisted of sixty volumes, the definition of each word being illustrated or sustained by quotations from Arab authors of acknowledged repute. They had also lexicons of Greek, Latin, Hebrew; and cyclopedias such as the Historical Dictionary of Sciences of Mohammed Ibn Abdallah, of Granada. In their highest civilization and luxury they did not forget the amusements of their forefathers—listening to the tale-teller, who never failed to obtain an audience in the midst of Arab tents. Around the evening fires in Spain the wandering literati exercised their wonderful powers of Oriental invention, edifying the eager listeners by such narrations as those that have descended to us in the Arabian Nights' Entertainments. The more sober and higher efforts of the educated were, of course, directed to pulpit eloquence, in conformity to the example of all the great Oriental Califs, and sanctified by the practice of the Prophet himself. Their poetical productions embraced all the modern minor forms—satires, odes, elegies, etc.; but they never produced any work in the higher walks of poesy, no epic, no tragedy. Perhaps this was due to their false fashion of valuing the mechanical execution of a work. They were the authors and introducers of rhyme; and such was the luxuriance and abundance of their language, that in some of their longest poems the same rhyme is said to have been used alternately from the beginning to the end. Where such mechanical triumphs are popularly prized, it may be supposed that the conception and spirit would be indifferent. Even among the Spanish women there were not a few who, like Velada, Ayesha, Labana, Algasania, achieved reputation in these compositions; and some of them were daughters of Califs. And this is the more interesting to us, since it was from the Provençal poetry, the direct descendant of these efforts, that European literature arose. Sonnets and romances at last displaced the grimly-orthodox productions of the wearisome and ignorant Fathers of the Church.

If fiction was prized among the Spanish Arabs, history was held in not less esteem. Every Calif had his own historian. The instincts of the race are perpetually peeping out; not only were there historians of the commanders of the Faithful, but also of celebrated horses and illustrious camels. In connection with history statistics were cultivated, this having been, it may be said, a necessary study from the first enforced on the Saracen officers in their assessment of tribute on conquered misbelievers, and subsequently continued as an object of taste. It was, doubtless, a similar necessity arising from their position that stamped such a singular practical aspect on the science of the Arabs generally. Many of their learned men were travelers and voyagers, constantly moving about for the acquisition or diffusion of knowledge, their acquirements being a passport to them wherever they went, and a sufficient introduction to any of the African or Asiatic courts. They were thus continually brought in contact with men of affairs, soldiers of fortune, statesmen, and became imbued with much of their practical spirit; and hence the singularly romantic character which the biographies of many of these men display, wonderful turns of prosperity, cruel necessities, violent deaths. The scope of their literary labors offers a subject well worthy of meditation; it contrasts with the contemporary ignorance of Europe. Some wrote on Chronology; some on Numismatics; some, now that military eloquence had become objectless, wrote on pulpit oratory; some on agriculture and its allied branches, as the art of irrigation. Not one of the purely mathematical, or mixed, or practical sciences was omitted.

Our obligations to the Spanish Moors in the arts of life are even more marked than in the higher branches of science, perhaps only because our ancestors were better prepared to take advantage of things connected with daily affairs. They set an example of skillful agriculture, the practice of which was regulated by a code of laws. Not only did they attend to the cultivation of plants, introducing very many new ones; they likewise paid great attention to the breeding of cattle, especially sheep and the horse. To them we owe the introduction of the great products, rice, sugar, cotton, and also, as we have previously observed, nearly all the fine garden and orchard fruits, together with many less important plants, as spinach and saffron. To them Spain owes the culture of silk; they gave to Xeres and Malaga their celebrity for making wine. They introduced the Egyptian system of irrigation by flood-gates, wheels, and pumps. They also promoted many important branches of industry, improved the manufacture of textile fabrics, earthenware, iron, steel; the Toledo sword-blades were every where prized for their temper. The Arabs, on their expulsion from Spain, carried the manufacture of leather, in which they were acknowledged to excel, to Morocco, from which city the leather itself has now taken its name. They also introduced inventions of a more ominous kind, gunpowder and artillery. The cannon they used appeared to have been made of wrought iron. But perhaps they more than compensated for these evil contrivances by the introduction of the mariner's compass.

The mention of the mariner's compass might lead us correctly to infer that the Spanish Arabs were interested in commercial pursuits—a conclusion to which we should also come when we consider the revenue of some of their califs. That of Abderrahman III. is stated at five and a half millions sterling—a vast sum if considered by its modern equivalent, and far more than could possibly be raised by taxes on the produce of the soil. It probably exceeded the entire revenue of all the sovereigns of Christendom taken together. From Barcelona and other ports an immense trade with the Levant was maintained, but it was mainly in the hands of the Jews, who, from the first invasion of Spain by Musa, had ever been the firm allies and collaborators of the Arabs. Together they had participated in the dangers of the invasion; together they had shared its boundless success; together they had held in irreverent derision, nay, even in contempt, the woman-worshippers and polytheistic savages beyond the Pyrenees, as they mirthfully called those whose long-delayed vengeance they were in the end to feel; together they were expelled. Against such Jews as lingered behind the hideous persecutions of the Inquisition were directed. But in the days of their prosperity they maintained a merchant marine of more than a thousand ships. They had factories and consuls on the Tanais. With Constantinople alone they maintained a vast trade; it ramified from the Black Sea and East Mediterranean far into the interior of Asia; it reached the ports of India and China, and extended along the African coast as far as Madagascar. Even in these commercial affairs the singular genius of the Jew and Arab shine forth. In the midst of the tenth century, when Europe was about in the same condition that Caffraria is now, enlightened Moors, like Abul Cassem, were writing treatises on the principles of trade and commerce. As on so many other occasions, on these affairs they have left their traces. The smallest weight they used in trade was the grain of barley, four of which were equal to one sweet pea, called in Arabic, carat. We still use the grain as our unit of weight, and still speak of gold as being so many carats fine.

Such were the califs of the West; such their splendor, their luxury, their knowledge; such some of the obligations we are under to them—obligations which Christian Europe, with singular insincerity, has ever been fain to hide. The cry against the misbeliever has long outlived the Crusades. Considering the enchanting country over which they ruled, it was not without reason that they caused to be engraven on the public seal, "The Servant of the Merciful rests contented in the decrees of God." What more, indeed, could Paradise give them? But considering also the evil end of all this happiness and pomp, this learning, liberality, and wealth, we may well appreciate the solemn truth which these monarchs, in their day of pride and power, grandly wrote in the beautiful mosaics on their palace walls, an ever-recurring monition to him who owes dominion to the sword, "There is no conqueror but God."

LITTLE BROTHER.

IN THREE PARTS.—I. A BOY TOO MUCH.

IT was of no use to tell Kate that Augustus—of the same surname, and aged seven years—was a sweet little fellow. He ought to be, considering the number of paper-bags, labeled "Stewart's Assorted Candies," he consumed per week. Of as little use to say he was a child; there were some children who didn't put newspapers on the strings of their sister's piano, and play it was a banjo. Oh! he would outgrow it, would he? Then, why wasn't he sent away somewhere till he did? Or put into something, and locked up? Or put under somewhere—a large barrel, for instance, with the head knocked out to give him air, as they do with young tomatoes and pie-plants till they arrive at an age when they can come to the table?

Then Kate Jones's mother—just like a mother, as she was!—assumed the part of a tender variety of Judge-Advocate; and while she acknowledged that the little Augustus did almost exhaust her patience on occasions, recalled a number of very pretty ways he had, nice things he had done, affectionate words he had said, and the truly good heart that the child possessed beneath all his boy-mischief!

For instance: Did not Kate remember how, when the family was boarding at the St. Jimmy—that gilded cage, where families not yet able, in their own estimation, to be happily domestic in a house of their own at a moderate price, were accommodated with facilities for being very fashionably miserable at an exorbitant one—the dear little fellow had once shown such an affectionate solicitude for his mother and sister? How, when after wondering all one Friday why the washer-woman didn't come home with the clothes—because they wanted to darn the stockings and see the shirts all right—they found, in the evening, that she had come in the forenoon, while they were shopping down town, and that Gus had taken all the clothes out of the basket, and put them away in all sorts of inconceivable drawers, presses, and trunks before the two ladies returned; and when he was asked if he had any thing to say why the sentence of being spanked until he was red should not be passed upon him, he sobbed, and put his little fists into his eyes, and faltered out something which led them to understand that the "Song of the Shirt," read by his father to them all, three evenings before, had left such an impression on his young mind that he had hidden the clothes, to prevent his mother and sister sewing on them and dying of consumption? Didn't Kate remember that?

Yes; Kate did remember it. And she remembered also another occasion, since they had rented their present house in Twenty-third Street, when the dear little fellow drove away from their connection one of the most aristocratic young gentlemen in all New York society—young Schumakers Fyndings. To be sure his papa did business down in some awful place that her papa called the Swamp; but Kate didn't believe he ever went there, or knew any thing about where it was even. Both directly and indirectly his papa might have furnished the calf-skin for his delicate polished boots; but there was not the slightest suspicion of the ancestral leather about him otherwise. No, not in the least! And he would have been such a desirable person to know—but for that little pest! And Kate went on rapidly to recite how Master Augustus, contrary to her own mature advice, had been permitted to "sit up" at the party, and had the little Misses Blummerie invited over to make it pleasant for him; and yet, ingrate that he was, when the gentlemen were all out in the hall, ready to go, after the breaking-up, and Harold Fitz-Blacktease, the son of the China trader, came down stairs, and said, "Tellahs! who's got a cigar for me to smoke on my way home?" and no man gave unto him, how that wretched Augustus, leaning over the balcony at his side, with slow, unmoving finger selected young Fyndings out of the throng, and said, in a voice distinctly audible to all present, "He's got some; he has: I saw him take six out of papa's box up in the gentlemen's dressing-room, and they're in the inside pocket of his Raglan!" And how young Fyndings turned the color of his papa's boot-top morocco, and, in a humiliated manner, extended one of the said six to Fitz-Blacktease; and how she nearly dropped with mortification; and how young Fyndings never came to make his party call—nor, indeed, a call of any description—afterward. Did her mamma remember that?

And, only to weary her with one instance more: Could she recall the time when Master Augustus turned to that distinguished foreigner, M. Pâté de Périgord, who was dining with them previous to taking Kate to see the performance of "ze inimitable Sharl Mattien" in the "Crit-ic," with Brougham, Burton, Walcot, and Lizzie Weston, at the Metropolitan, and asked him, "Have you got a large salary?" and upon the distinguished foreigner answering, in his pretty, broken way, with a disguised surprise, that he had "not ze salaire at all," the enfant terrible bent a severe gaze upon him, and demanded, "How can you afford to take my sister to Burton's, then?" And, in general, was it among possible remembrances that, on New-Year's days, the formidable infant stood sucking innumerable consecutive oranges at the foot of the front-steps, and shaking with juicy hands the lavender kids of the gentlemen who came to pay their compliments; or, tiring of that amusement, ascended to the parlor, borrowed the visitors' hats, asked them where they got them, what they paid for them, and, with the same succulent hands, brushed the nap the wrong way?

In fine, was it on the record how that Augustus never ceased to behave himself in the most heart-rending and peace-dispelling, odious manner, at all times and places, universal and particular? Was it, or was it not? That was all!

At this moment the angel spoken of showed his wings. A harbinger voice in the entry cried, "Porgies! Here-er yer fresh porgies! Here they go-o-oh!" The door opened, and the terrible child came in. His head, which just reached to the door-knob, was covered with a thicket of corn-silky curls; and having parted from the comb on bad terms before breakfast, had not made up with it since. His cheeks were plump as mellow Spitzenbergs, and quite as red, with overmuch shouting of his imaginary wares. These—to wit, the porgies—consisted of a selection from the valuable annuals and vases which ought to have occupied the drawing-room centre-table, and were borne in the hollow bottom of an embroidered foot-stool, turned upside down, its flbss and worsted suffering undesirable attrition with the carpet; and the whole establishment, thus improvised, was fastened to his waist by an elegant groseille silken cord and tassel from his mother's morning-dress, which cost at the least twelve shillings at Peyser's. His eyes were a mischievous twinkling hazel; young as he was, there was an air of old waggishness about him, a sense of the ludicrous, which promised the true man of humor when a few more years in this mixed world should have added pathos to his fun. But, at present, he was only the dear, naughty little rogue—one of those children that you are forever wanting to whip at one end and kiss at the other.

Kate had worked the foot-stool which this lad was desecrating. With a fateful sternness and an agony of mind which did not express itself in words, for these had proved useless long ago, she put down the under-sleeve she was crocheting, and marching up to her brother, began disengaging the cord and tassel from his waist.

"Take care, Kate," said the child, with a shake of his head; "I'm a horse. You're afraid of horses, you know, and this one is a very bad one. He kicks, and bites, and runs away, and does every thing that's bad. Oh, he's an awful horse! Porgies! here-er yer fresh porgies! here they go-o-oh!"

And he burst away from the young girl to career around the room faster than Kate's offended dignity choose to follow him.

"My son, take off that cord and sit down for a moment. I want to talk to you." This was said very calmly by the mother of Augustus.

"Yes, mamma, I will. I'm a good horse to people that treat me kindly and don't make me shy; so I'll just take my harness off and listen. May I stand up, mamma, while you're talking? horses never sit down, you know."

"Yes, my dear, come and stand up by my side and let me take your hand." Augustus obeyed, with a very good grace. Kate resumed her crocheting in silence, and the mother said to the child:

"My son, do you love me—very much indeed?"

"Yes, mamma, I love you—six bushels."

"Why do you love me, Augustus?"

"Because you're good."

"Don't you want to be loved, my dear little son?"

"Yes, I want people to love me, if they won't call me a monkey, and an owl, and good-for-nothing, and say I ought to be whipped, and sent to bed, and have my hair brushed, and every thing mean." (This with a glance at Miss Jones, who did not appear to hear it.)

"Don't you think I love you, Augustus?"

"Yes, you do, mamma."

"Why do I love you, Augustus?"

"Because I'm naughty."

"Wouldn't you like to be loved because you were good?"

"Wouldn't I die if I were good?"

"Why, what do you mean, Augustus?"

"Wouldn't I have to be an angel, and with the angels stand, a crown upon my forehead, a harp within my hand? That's what I mean; that's what little Jimmy Stilton did, and he was good, Kate said. He wanted to be an angel, he did. I don't, because he died; and he didn't know what knuckle-down was! And he thought that top-time came before kite-time! And if he's got a harp I don't believe he can play it, for he couldn't do any thing with a jews-harp, and a harp's an awful lot harder, isn't it, mamma?"

"Don't say 'an awful lot,' dear; say 'a great deal.' Oh, how sorry I am to think my little boy wouldn't like to be an angel! You can be an angel and live, too, Augustus; you can be an angel and stay to make us all very happy."

"I know it; you're an angel, mamma. Give me a great big kiss!"

"There, dear! there are two instead of one for you! But let me talk to you a little more; did you never read the pretty books you get at school, about being good?"

"Yes, mamma, and that's just it! Don't all the good children in books die? Don't Nathan Dickerman sit on a chair in his picture, with something very bad the matter with his back, and don't he die when he's only ten years old? And don't little Mary Lathrop die when she's eight? and didn't she turn around when her brother slapped her and say, 'Hit me on the other cheek, dear?' I'd ha' deared him! I wish I'd been there; I'd ha' lammed him, I would!"

"But don't my little son remember that all the naughty children in books get terribly punished for it—say, my little Augustus?"

"Oh yes, they die, too! they go out in boats on Sunday, and get tipped up; and in the pictures you can't see any thing but their hands sticking above the water, and nobody comes to pull them out. Or they go up into trees to hook birds' nests, and the limb always breaks, and then they get it! Oh, cracky! don't they? Every body dies, in books—good boys die, and naughty boys die!"

"What are you going to do, then, Augustus, if the good boys and naughty boys both die?"

"I—I—I—" Here Augustus stopped and scratched his head in deep meditation. Finally he brightened up with the discovery of a capital idea. "I guess," said Augustus, "that I won't be very naughty, nor very good; I'll be half-an-half! and then I'll keep alive for ever and never!"

"Oh, Augustus! Very well! half-and-half is better than very naughty—and I'm afraid that my little boy is that too, sometimes."

"Yes, I am; I'm very naughty to-day; for I've been playing porgies with the books, and the vases, and the foot-stool, and your cord. But I won't do it any more. And I'm very naughty to Kate, too, to-day; but I always am naughty to her, because she's so naughty to me—and, besides, I do hate that Spindle-shanks!"

"Augustus! I shall punish you if you call your sister names!"

"I ain't a-callin' her names—she isn't Spindle-shanks."

"Who do you mean, then, Augustus?"

"I mean that old thing, Mr. Lilykid, who is all the time coming to see Kate, and drinking papa's Champagne, and dancing polkas with Kate, and taking her to the opera, and calling me 'sonny'! Just as I was coming up stairs with the porgies Johnson let him in, and asked me would I tell Kate that a gentleman was in the parlor—and he's been here ever since, cooling his heels while I was up here talking—that's what Johnson calls it when he has to wait. What does 'cooling his heels' mean, mamma?"

"Good Heavens!" ejaculated Kate—"and you never told me of it, you wicked, wicked boy! If you don't whip him for this, mother, I shall think you mean to let him rush headlong to destruction!"

So saying, she jerked the bell-pull, as if it were Master Augustus's ear, and communicated with some faintly tintinnabulating conscience in the basement of his system, instead of merely sounding an alarm to Johnson in the kitchen, who straightway knocked at the door.

"Go down immediately to the parlor, Johnson," said Miss Jones, in a tone whose sternness was just enough smothered to fall short of the guest below, "and tell Mr. Lilykid that, by a mistake, I was only informed just now of his being here, and will see him directly. And remember, Johnson, never, on any occasion when you have a message for me, to give it to Master Augustus, but bring it yourself."

"Directly" is an idea of such wonderful elasticity that, in the seventh sphere of the spiritual world, where Mrs. Hatch informs us that we shall be clothed with ideas in lieu of matter, it will probably answer to the India rubber of this present gross life, and be manufactured into all sorts of ethereal overshoes, belting, shoulder-straps, water-proof coats, and stretchable arrangements whatsoever, by some Horace Day of that stage of existence. "Directly," with the soldier and sailor, means as long as it takes to turn on their heels; with the waiter at the eating-house where I lunch, it means as soon as the fat man in the next box has ceased to be hungry, thirsty, and morning-paper-ivorous; with young ladies in general, it signifies any conceivable time, from half an hour and rising, in which a lovely mauve barége robe may be put on, its skirt, under-skirt, and over-skirt shaken down, so as to lie airily over those magnificent thirty-spring skirts, with tapes woven in and adjustable bustles, created by the wondrous Mrs. Peddie, of Bowery, just below Bleecker Street. This was that "directly" meant with Miss Kate Jones in particular.

With a sweet smile upon her pretty mouth—which was not the result of saying "Papa, propriety, poultry, prunes, prisms," but of a still better recipe—the banishment of all thoughts concerning that dreadful Augustus—she descended to the parlor, and met Mr. Lilykid with a voice from the "Young Lady's Behavior-Book" and a bow from the third figure of the Lancers.

Mr. Lilykid being a gentleman who ran entirely to the small and well-polished toes of good society, either had no heels to cool or ignored them completely, reciprocating the greeting as if he had only come in within the last three minutes.

"Did any one ever see such a contretemps?" warbled Kate, with a light-hearted laugh. "Here you have been kept waiting, so rudely, I don't know how long—it must be ten minutes, I dare say."

"Oh, h-a-a-adly! ha-a-adly!" murmured Mr. Lilykid, in gallant deprecation. "What's that pretty thing the poet says?—'How softly falls the foot of Time that only treads on flowahs!' And to expect Miss Jones—oh, that is to tread on damask woses—otto of woses! Weally, I feel as if I were not only on an ottoman, but an otto-man myself, now that you ah heah! Ha! he! he! he!"

"You are very kind, I'm sure, as well as very witty! You must have thought you were going to be fastened to your ottoman for a thousand years, like the King in the Palace of Sleepers; but it's all that darling little rogue of a brother of mine! Johnson very improperly confided his message to him, and he went off to play, as children will, and forgot all about it. What do you find to amuse yourself with now, in town? It's so dreadfully dull, and every body's leaving for the Springs, or Newport, or the Grand Tour. We're going out next week—we would have gone this, but papa always likes to go with us, and he wanted to stay for the Bremen steamer. What do you find to do?"

(Mr. Lilykid will excuse me for translating his bon ton-ese into English hereafter, as its drawl is painful to vulgar ears.)

"My dear Miss Jones, a man devoted to good society always has enough to do! I sometimes see friends of mine feeling quite miserably—blasé, in fact—and I always say to them, 'Eustis,' or 'Ainsley,' or 'Bellemountain,' as the case may be, 'really, how can you? Do you know your duty to your set? Do you reflect that you'll be called on to be an ornament to it next winter—to exert yourself for its benefit—to make yourself agreeable in every way? And yet you are idle! I declare it's a shame!' For there are so many things a man devoted to good society can do to keep himself in practice, you know. Dear me! I could not excuse myself to my conscience if I were idle!"

"You say I know, but I don't know. Tell me, for I feel a sincere interest in knowing. I really supposed that all that gentlemen found to occupy themselves with, after the winter was over and before the summer season began, was to lie on a sofa and color their meerschaums!"

"Aw, really! I confess to the meerschaum; but then, that's only my relaxation. I never permit myself to take it up unless my mind has been on the stretch for some time, and wants unbending, you know. Business first, pleasure afterward; and I have so much to keep me busy every day that I don't think much of mere selfish gratification—till evening, at least."

"But you don't go down town, like poor papa, into that dreadful Wall Street?"

"Ha-a-a-adly! When I say business, I don't mean stocks, and rents, and dividends, and all that—my lawyer attends to those things for me. Left an orphan at a very early age, with a large property, consisting almost entirely of real estate widely scattered through the rural districts, I don't know what I should have done, young as I was, and careless of my own interests—as I still am—if it hadn't been for my having a capable business man, who was faithfully attached to our family, and who comes between me and all my tenants and others who want to talk about money. My business is something quite different, I assure you. You see, Miss Jones, from my youngest days I have been devoted to good society. I live for it. I may say it is my meat and my drink to do my duty to good society. And at this season, when every body else is voting it dull and lounging about, I say to myself, 'Lorenzo Lilykid, no lounging for you, my boy! What are you going to do to-day for good society?' That's when I rise, you know. Well, you see, something always presents itself. Take to-day, for instance. I reflect, while I am taking my morning coffee, that there's serious danger of my billiards getting down. I'm startled by remembering that the last time I played was with little Tom Tibbits—fortnight next Friday—only pocket-game—excuse me for being technical—know it's very shoppy—gave him thirty points—beat him easily—no sort of practice in that. If I lose my game, there's one duty to good society gone—dead smash! So I walk down to Phelan's, take the cue, and play a carom game, even, with Frank Toler—splendid cue, he!—and just beat him by three points! There's one duty to good society fulfilled—feel happier, stronger—conscious of not giving way to loose habits. That lasted half an hour; and when it was over I began to reflect again. A man devoted to good society must reflect—can't rush headlong, you know—it seems quite unprincipled for a man with duties, and we all have those, of course."

"Of course!" assented Kate, deferentially, awe-struck by the moral grandeur of the individual.

"When I reflect, I call to mind that next winter I shall be expected—if I am spared—to perform various other duties to good society. The Chasseurs will, perhaps, be as necessary to a man devoted to its interests as the Lancers have been hitherto. Shall I be ignorant of them? Shall I be the one to bring confusion into my set by going to the right when I ought to go to the left and bowing when I ought to chaisez? No! I know my duty better. I whistle the Chasseurs and go through the figures by myself for an hour. I know them well. I can take my place when duty calls. That brings me to lunch—devilish chop and mushrooms, at the St. Germain. There I have an opportunity to study the manners of the best men. Major Totbury, of the Seventh, sits at the next table, taking fricandeau of veal and sherry, followed by quail sauté aux truffes; 'pon honor, most accomplished luncheon in New York: eats by science; might be a lesson to any body. I learn from him—he doesn't know it; but I honor him, and shall remember his order next time I lunch there."

"Oh, you satirical man!" said Kate, elevating her pretty eyebrows.

"Oh, not at all! I entreat you, don't think so! If a man devoted to good society lunches, he owes it as a duty to good society to lunch well. Declare I respect him for it. Very well, lunch finished, what next? Reflect again. Lunch suggests suppers—suppers in general, by a natural train of associations, bring up suppers in particular—evening-party suppers; and then, with the greatest remorse, I find, oh, such a horrible piece of last winter's reminiscence staring me in the face! What do you think I was so wretched to do to Miss Arabella Dubblezeppher at the Snuggittes' Fancy Dress Ball, in January."

Miss Jones blushed an apocalypse of all the many remaining proprieties which good society had not subdued to their right proportion. Young gentlemen did so many ardent things beyond squeezing the partners of the bosoms a trifle too tight in the Deux Pas—when the Champagne was not prudently toned by pious education and a bottle of cooling Chablis or Sauterne in the dressing-room! "Kissed Miss Arabella Dubblezeppher" was in her mind, and her mind—untutored soul that she was—being so near her tongue, therefore did Miss Jones blush.

"Really, I can't form the slightest idea."

"You were not there—to my great desolation having received Mrs. Tambour's cards first, as I remember—and, therefore, Miss Dubblezeppher was the Houri, at least of Snuggittes' Fancy Dress Paradise. And I—me voici l'étourdi!—spilt a whole table-spoonful of melted chocolate ice on her wings when I was helping her!"

"Oh," said Kate, visibly relieved, and thinking of the dozen or so rich silks hanging in her wardrobe, fraught with similar remembrances in various colors differing from the original, which never more would flutter to the wooing of Dods-worth's pipes. "Oh! is that all?"

"All, my dear Miss Jones? It is enough, and far too much. Since I first devoted myself to good society I never but once before committed a piece of similar maladroitness. How did Miss Arabella receive it? Ah! admirably. In the Dark Ages, in a castle on the Rhine, for example, had I been guilty of such a crime against a lady of rank I should have forfeited my life—been immediately run through with a sword by one of the gentlemen present—and, perhaps, should have died feeling that I was but a just sacrifice to the indignation of what then was good society. But Miss Arabella only looked at me with the sweetest smile of the evening (again because Miss Jones was not there), and in answer to my humble apologies, said, 'Oh, I beg you won't think of it, Mr. Lilykid; it is not of the slightest consequence.' I could not stop my ears, however, to the fact that immediately after she turned to the lady next her, Miss Millefleurs, and made use, in an undertone, of that very disagreeable word from the French, 'Bête!' Very well, to-day, as I said, that came painfully to my memory; and, 'pon honor, I vowed it should never take place again, or I would doom myself to voluntary exile from the society to which I am devoted."

"Oh, Mr. Lilykid! don't talk so dreadfully! You are the very life of our circle!"

"Mille ringraziamenti, donna bellissima! I hope that exile will not be necessary. Don't laugh at me now, really, I beseech you, if I tell you what was my employment for the next hour after that regret awoke in my mind. I happened to remember the means I took when first, at a very early age, I resolved to devote myself to our good society, and trembled to think of doing all the gaucheries which I saw committed by other gentlemen upon ladies' dresses with glasses of Champagne and plates of cream and salad and cups of coffee. I returned to my quiet lodgings. I locked myself into the privacy of my apartments. I took all the chairs and placed them in a row with intervals of a foot or two between. Then, with a saucer full of water in each hand, I practiced vaulting over them one after another until I succeeded in accomplishing it without spilling a drop. This morning my success was admirable; at the end of an hour I was able to take one, two, or five at a spring without losing a single globule from the saucers. It is arduous, I know; it requires resolution, patience, perseverance, but a man devoted to good society must, in conscience, have all these. I shall do it daily for some time, and I shall be abundantly repaid, my dear Miss Jones, if next winter I see the fruits of my labor in not offending against society as I did at Mrs. Snuggitte's."

"How few gentlemen ever think of us ladies and our comfort as you do, Mr. Lilykid! Let me return you my thanks on behalf of our whole sex! Do you know that at that very party at Mrs. Tambour's which you spoke of, I had such a love of a rose-colored brocade, with point lace Bertha à l'Imperatrice, utterly ruined by a plate full of oysters spilled right into my lap? And such a curious coincidence! I made the very same remark as Miss Dubblezeppher to the lady next me! Oh, that lovely brocade! it was too bad!"

"And I never saw you in it! It would have ravished me! You are so beautiful in rose color—pardon me! Rose color is so beautiful on you! Have another one next winter, and dub me with your bouquetière its guardian chevalier. I'll hover around it! It shall attract me as the flower does the bee! I shall watch over it as the angel guards the moss-rose till it blossoms! And, Jove! I'll call out the man that desecrates it with a particle of any thing to eat or drink!"

"Ah, faithful knight! you deserve worthier occupation for your bravery and your vigilance than one poor maiden's party dress."

"Not at all. The old knights, we hear, devoted themselves to the redress of fair ladies—I will devote myself to the dress of one; he, he, he, he! only a difference of two letters in favor of brevity. And if the true Queen Rose shall smile upon her chevalier from above the false rose, which shows her beauty better, the happy man will then only feel that he has a worthier commission, and will dare to look up and ask to be dubbed again her knight!" As he said this, Mr. Lilykid bowed reverently to the lady, whom he had been gradually drawing nearer as he waxed eloquent, and, taking her fair soft hand in his straw-colored Jouvin, pressed its rosy finger-tips to his mustache.

Irresistible sweet tingling that shot through Kate's young form from those electric points! What rare, delicate politeness! what an original grace has such a demonstration as this to the heart of a young American maiden, though the women of the Continent take it as such a matter of fact, receiving it as the most formal compliment fifty times a day! This Mr. Lilykid was such an unusually charming man!

Mr. Lilykid drew nearer: he still held the hand with which he had been so rapturous in his own; it fluttered like a little white mouse who is very much frightened, and Mr. Lilykid pressed it tighter to keep it calm. Mr. Lilykid laid his glove upon his watch-pocket, and exhibited symptoms of getting down upon one knee—which light-infantry movement, thank Jove and the Brooks Brothers, is much facilitated by the present roomy cut of pantaloons. The trembling extended from Kate's hand to her whole little frame; she blushed again, and the rosy sky of her face disputed possession with the down-dropped twilight of her eyes; she heard the clock and her own heart tick audibly:

"Come right along; they're in here, and he'll be so glad to see you. Come along, papa!"

Heavens! It was that horrid Augustus right at the door. Mr. Lilykid's symptoms took a turn; he released the little hand; he returned to a position which did not bring in play the peculiar advantages of the peg-top. And just in time; for the door opened, and lo! a stout, good-humored man, with an abundance of whiskers, and a jolly, play-ferocious style of countenance, like a Lambro converted to the domestic virtues, loomed up through the opening, preceded by the enfant terrible tugging at his right little finger.

"Come right along, papa. They'll be so glad to see you. They're both in here. Come right along!"

"Mr. Lilykid, how d'ye do, Sir? Hope I see you well. Pleasant weather we're having?"

"Aw! yes, de-cidedly! How de-do, Mr. Jones. We were just speaking of you a moment ago; quite opportune—he, he, he!"

Mr. Jones, according to his cheerful domestic custom, kissed Kate affectionately, not having seen her since breakfast, perhaps not at breakfast, as he went down town early, stripped off his immense Raglan—like the sun coming out of a cloud, or a gigantic orange peeling itself for the purpose of feeling nice and easy—gave it to Augustus, who staggered out into the entry in entire eclipse under it, and hung it up on the highest peg he could reach, and then sat down in the most good-natured manner to be the gentleman of whom John Crapeau says:

"Deux, c'est la compagnie—trois, c'est une foule."

If I should record the conversation it would not assist the progress of this story. How could it assist the progress of any thing to bring together three people, two of whom suppose Panama to be a manufactory for large durable hats, and the remaining one of whom tells said two that Panama has gone up to 117, as if it were a piece of information calculated to excite the liveliest emotions of pleasure; but left them ignorant whether Panama had floated to that degree of latitude, or now numbered so many souls of population, or what—especially what? How could it assist the progress of any thing to bring together two people from one world and one from another, sympathizing with and contiguous to each other about as nearly as the Earth and Le Verrier's last-discovered planet, unless, perhaps, they wished information; and who wants that, in good society?

So that the only progress which was assisted was Mr. Lilykid to the front door. With another bow—this time from the fifth figure of the Lancers, where the partners meet, the music lulls, and the hands linger—Miss Jones stood in the parlor entrance, and said "Good-afternoon." Mr. Lilykid had the parlor door between himself and the intruder from the broker's world. Once out of eclipse from that gross body, he became ardent again. A second time he pressed the little trembling hand to his lips, and murmured,

"You asked what I could do to keep New York from seeming dull, and yet you will be here for nearly a week longer! My morning was spent in duty; my afternoon has been—oh such a reward! Al rivedersi!"

And, accompanied by Kate, the broker ascended to the blissful domestic regions where his wife was telling Scripture stories to little Augustus, who sat, listening intently, in her lap. The history of Joseph, the good boy who let himself be put in the closet rather than do any thing naughty, was interrupted by Kate's enthusiasm on the subject of that delightful man, Mr. Lilykid—much to the little brother's disgust, who wanted to know whether the sacred character kicked, and how long he staid before they opened the door; and finally ended by muttering, with his thumb in his mouth,

"I wish Spindle-shanks could be locked up where Joseph was. You're always plaguing me. It's mean—that's what it is!"

"I wonder," said Mr. Jones, in an absent-minded manner, "who this Mr. Lilykid is."

"He's a most charming man!" answered Kate.

"He's a big monkey!" said the pleasant child. And the ringing of the dinner-bell prevented any arrival at a compromise between these slightly differing opinions.

LOVEL THE WIDOWER.

BY W. M. THACKERAY.

CHAPTER I.

THE BACHELOR OF BEAK STREET.

WHO shall be the hero of this tale? Not I who write it. I am but the Chorus of the Play. I make remarks on the conduct of the characters: I narrate their simple story. There is love and marriage in it: there is grief and disappointment: the scene is in the parlor, and the region beneath the parlor. No: it may be the parlor and kitchen, in this instance, are on the same level. There is no high life, unless, to be sure, you call a baronet's widow a lady in high life; and some ladies may be, while some certainly are not. I don't think there's a villain in the whole performance. There is an abominable selfish old woman, certainly; an old highway robber; an old sponger on other people's kindness; an old haunter of Bath and Cheltenham boarding-houses (about which how can I know any thing, never having been in a boarding-house at Bath or Cheltenham in my life?); an old swindler of tradesmen, tyrant of servants, bully of the poor—who, to be sure, might do duty for a villain, but she considers herself as virtuous a woman as ever was born. The heroine is not faultless (ah! that will be a great relief to some folks, for many writers' good women are, you know, so very insipid). The principal personage you may very likely think to be no better than a muff. But is many a respectable man of our acquaintance much better? and do muffs know that they are what they are, or, knowing it, are they unhappy? Do girls decline to marry one if he is rich? Do we refuse to dine with one? I listened to one at Church last Sunday, with all the women crying and sobbing; and, oh dear me! how finely he preached! Don't we give him great credit for wisdom and eloquence in the House of Commons? Don't we give him important commands in the army? Can you, or can you not, point out one who has been made a peer? Doesn't your wife call one in the moment any of the children are ill? Don't we read his dear poems, or even novels? Yes; perhaps even this one is read and written by—Well? Quid rides? Do you mean that I am painting a portrait which hangs before me every morning in the looking-glass when I am shaving? Après? Do you suppose that I suppose that I have not infirmities like my neighbors? Am I weak? It is notorious to all my friends there is a certain dish I can't resist; no, not if I have already eaten twice too much at dinner. So, dear Sir, or Madam, have you your weakness—your irresistible dish of temptation (or if you don't know it, your friends do)? No, dear friend, the chances are that you and I are not people of the highest intellect, of the largest fortune, of the most ancient family, of the most consummate virtue, of the most faultless beauty in face and figure. We are no heroes nor angels; neither are we fiends from abodes unmentionable, black assassins, treacherous Iagos, familiar with stabbing and poison—murder our amusement, daggers our playthings, arsenic our daily bread, lies our conversation, and forgery our common handwriting. No, we are not monsters of crime, or angels walking the earth—at least I know one of us who isn't, as can be shown any day at home if the knife won't cut or the mutton comes up raw. But we are not altogether brutal and unkind, and a few folks like us. Our poetry is not as good as Alfred Tennyson's, but we can turn a couplet for Miss Fanny's album: our jokes are not always first-rate, but Mary and her mother smile very kindly when papa tells his story or makes his pun. We have many weaknesses, but we are not ruffians of crime. No more was my friend Lovel. On the contrary, he was as harmless and kindly a fellow as ever lived when I first knew him. At present, with his changed position, he is, perhaps, rather fine (and certainly I am not asked to his best dinner-parties, as I used to be, where you hardly see a commoner—but stay! I am advancing matters). At the time when this story begins, I say, Lovel had his faults—which of us has not? He had buried his wife, having notoriously been henpecked by her. How many men and brethren are like him! He had a good fortune—I wish I had as much—though I dare say many people are ten times as rich. He was a good-looking fellow enough; though that depends, ladies, upon whether you like a fair man or a dark one. He had a country house, but it was only at Putney. In fact, he was in business in the city, and being a hospitable man, and having three or four spare bedrooms, some of his friends were always welcome at Shrublands, especially after Mrs. Lovel's death, who liked me pretty well at the period of her early marriage with my friend, but got to dislike me at last and to show me the cold shoulder. That is a joint I never could like (though I have known fellows who persist in dining off it year after year, who cling hold of it, and refuse to be separated from it). I say, when Lovel's wife began to show me that she was tired of my company, I made myself scarce: used to pretend to be engaged when Fred faintly asked me to Shrublands; to accept his meek apologies, proposals to dine en garçon at Greenwich, the club, and so forth; and never visit upon him my wrath at his wife's indifference—for, after all, he had been my friend at many a pinch: he never stinted at Hart's or Lovegrove's, and always made a point of having the wine I liked, never mind what the price was. As for his wife, there was, assuredly, no love lost between us—I thought her a lean, scraggy, lackadaisical, egotistical, consequential, insipid creature: and as for his mother-in-law, who staid at Fred's as long and as often as her daughter would endure her, has any one who ever knew that notorious old Lady Baker at Bath, at Cheltenham, at Brighton—wherever trumps and frumps were found together; wherever scandal was cackled, wherever fly-blown reputations were assembled, and dowagers with damaged titles trod over each other for the pas—who, I say, ever had a good word for that old woman? What party was not bored where she appeared? What tradesman was not done with whom she dealt? I wish with all my heart I was about to narrate a story with a good mother-in-law for a character; but then you know, my dear madam, all good women in novels are insipid. This woman certainly was not. She was not only not insipid, but exceedingly bad-tasted. She had a foul, loud tongue, a stupid head, a bad temper, an immense pride and arrogance, an extravagant son, and very little money. Can I say much more of a woman than this? Aha! my good Lady Baker! I was a mauvais sujet, was I?—I was leading Fred into smoking, drinking, and low bachelor habits, was I? I, his old friend, who have borrowed money from him any time these twenty years, was not fit company for you and your precious daughter? Indeed! I paid the money I borrowed from him like a man; but did you ever pay him, I should like to know? When Mrs. Lovel was in the first column of the Times, then Fred and I used to go off to Greenwich and Blackwall, as I said; then his kind old heart was allowed to feel for his friend; then we could have the other bottle of claret without the appearance of Bedford and the coffee, which in Mrs. L.'s time used to be sent in to us before we could ring for a second bottle, although she and Lady Baker had had three glasses each out of the first. Three full glasses each, I give you my word! No, madam, it was your turn to bully me once—now it is mine, and I use it. No, you old Catamaran, though you pretend you never read novels, some of your confounded good-natured friends will let you know of this one. Here you are, do you hear? Here you shall be shown up. And so I intend to show up other women and other men who have offended me. Is one to be subject to slights and scorn, and not have revenge? Kindnesses are easily forgotten; but injuries!—what worthy man does not keep those in mind?

Before entering upon the present narrative, may I take leave to inform a candid public, that though it is all true, there is not a word of truth in it; that though Lovel is alive and prosperous, and you very likely have met him, yet I defy you to point him out; that his wife (for he is Lovel the Widower no more) is not the lady you imagine her to be, when you say (as you will persist in doing), "Oh, that character is intended for Mrs. Thingamy, or was notoriously drawn from Lady So-and-so." No. You are utterly mistaken. Why, even the advertising-puffers have almost given up that stale stratagem of announcing "REVELATIONS FROM HIGH LIFE."—The beau monde will be startled at recognizing the portraits of some of its brilliant leaders in Miss Wiggins's forthcoming Roman de Société." Or, "We suspect a certain ducal house will be puzzled to guess how the pitiless author of May Fair Mysteries has become acquainted with (and exposed with a fearless hand) certain family secrets which were thought only to be known to a few of the very highest members of the aristocracy." No, I say; these silly baits to catch an unsuspecting public shall not be our arts. If you choose to occupy yourself with trying to ascertain if a certain cap fits one among ever so many thousand heads, you may possibly pop it on the right one: but the cap-maker will perish before he tells you; unless, of course, he has some private pique to avenge, or malice to wreak, upon some individual who can't by any possibility hit again; then, indeed, he will come boldly forward and seize upon his victim—(a bishop, say, or a woman without coarse, quarrelsome male relatives will be best)—and clap on him, or her, such a cap, with such ears, that all the world shall laugh at the poor wretch, shuddering, and blushing beet-root red, and whimpering deserved tears of rage and vexation at being made the common butt of society. Besides, I dine at Lovel's still; his company and cuisine are among the best in London. If they suspected I was taking them off, he and his wife would leave off inviting me. Would any man of a generous disposition lose such a valued friend for a joke, or be so foolish as to show him up in a story? All persons with a decent knowledge of the world will at once banish the thought, as not merely base but absurd. I am invited to his house one day next week: vous concevez I can't mention the very day, for then he would find me out—and of course there would be no more cards for his old friend. He would not like appearing, as it must be owned he does in this memoir, as a man of not very strong mind. He believes himself to be a most determined, resolute person. He is quick in speech, wears a fierce beard, speaks with asperity to his servants (who liken him to a—to that before-named sable or ermine contrivance in which ladies insert their hands in winter), and takes his wife to task so smartly that I believe she believes he believes he is the master of the house. "Elizabeth, my love, he must mean A, or B, or D," I fancy I hear Lovel say; and she says, "Yes; oh! it is certainly D—his very image!" "D to a T," says Lovel (who is a neat wit). She may know that I mean to depict her husband in the above unpretending lines: but she will never let me know of her knowledge except by a little extra courtesy; except (may I make this pleasing exception?) by a few more invitations; except by a look of those unfathomable eyes (gracious goodness! to think she wore spectacles ever so long, and put a lid over them as it were!), into which when you gaze sometimes, you may gaze so deep, and deep, and deep, that I defy you to plumb half-way down into their mystery.

When I was a young man, I had lodgings in Beak Street, Regent Street (I no more have lived in Beak Street than in Belgrave Square: but I choose to say so, and no gentleman will be so rude as to contradict another)—I had lodgings, I say, in Beak Street, Regent Street. Mrs. Prior was the landlady's name. She had seen better days—landladies frequently have. Her husband—he could not be called the landlord, for Mrs. P. was manager of the place—had been, in happier times, captain or lieutenant in the militia; then of Diss, in Norfolk, of no profession; then of Norwich Castle, a prisoner for debt; then of Southampton Buildings, London, law-writer; then of the Bom-Retiro Cacadores, in the service of H. M. the Queen of Portugal, lieutenant and paymaster; then of Melina Place, St. George's Fields, etc.—I forbear to give the particulars of an existence which a legal biographer has traced step by step, and which has more than once been the subject of judicial investigation by certain commissioners in Lincoln's-inn Fields. Well Prior, at this time, swimming out of a hundred shipwrecks, had clambered on to a lighter, as it were, and was clerk to a coal-merchant by the river side. "You conceive, Sir," he would say, "my employment is only temporary—the fortune of war, the fortune of war!" He smattered words in not a few foreign languages. His person was profusely scented with tobacco. Bearded individuals, padding the muddy hoof in the neighboring Regent Street, would call sometimes of an evening, and ask for "the Captain." He was known at many neighboring billiard-tables, and, I imagine, not respected. You will not see enough of Captain Prior to be very weary of him and his coarse swagger, to be disgusted by his repeated requests for small money-loans, or to deplore his loss, which you will please to suppose has happened before the curtain of our present drama draws up. I think two people in the world were sorry for him: his wife, who still loved the memory of the handsome young man who had wooed and won her; his daughter Elizabeth, whom for the last few months of his life, and up to his fatal illness, he every evening conducted to what he called her "Academy." You are right. Elizabeth is the principal character in this story. When I knew her, a thin, freckled girl of fifteen, with a lean frock, and hair of a reddish hue, she used to borrow my books, and play on the First Floor's piano, when he was from home—Slumley his name was. He was editor of the Swell, a newspaper then published; author of a great number of popular songs, a friend of several music-selling houses; and it was by Mr. Slumley's interest that Elizabeth was received as a pupil at what the family called "the Academy."

Captain Prior then used to conduct his girl to the Academy, but she often had to conduct him home again. Having to wait about the premises for two, or three, or five hours sometimes while Elizabeth was doing her lessons, he would naturally desire to shelter himself from the cold at some neighboring house of entertainment. Every Friday a prize of a golden medal, nay, I believe, sometimes of twenty-five silver medals, was awarded to Miss Bellenden and other young ladies for their good conduct and assiduity at this academy. Miss Bellenden gave her gold medal to her mother, only keeping five shillings for herself, with which the poor child bought gloves, shoes, and her humble articles of millinery.

Once or twice the Captain succeeded in intercepting that piece of gold, and I dare say treated some of his whiskered friends—the clinking trampers of the Quadrant pavement. He was a free-handed fellow when he had any body's money in his pocket. It was owing to differences regarding the settlement of accounts that he quarreled with the coal-merchant, his very last employer. Bessy, after yielding once or twice to his importunity, and trying to believe his solemn promises of repayment, had strength of mind to refuse her father the pound which he would have taken. Her five shillings—her poor little slender pocket-money, the representative of her charities and kindnesses to the little brothers and sisters, of her little toilet ornaments, nay, necessities; of those well-mended gloves, of those oft-darned stockings, of those poor boots, which had to walk many a weary mile after midnight; of those little knicknacks, in the shape of brooch or bracelet, with which the poor child adorned her homely robe or sleeve—her poor five shillings, out of which Mary sometimes found a pair of shoes, or Tommy a flannel jacket, and little Bill a coach and horse—this wretched sum, this mite, which Bessy administered among so many poor—I very much fear her father sometimes confiscated. I charged the child with the fact, and she could not deny me. I vowed a tremendous vow, that, if ever I heard of her giving Prior money again, I would quit the lodgings, and never give those children lolly-pop, nor peg-top, nor sixpence; nor the pungent marmalade, nor the biting gingerbread-nut, nor the theatre-characters, nor the paint-box to illuminate the same; nor the discarded clothes, which became smaller clothes upon the persons of little Tommy and little Bill, for whom Mrs. Prior, and Bessy, and the little maid, cut, clipped, altered, ironed, darned, mangled, with the greatest ingenuity. I say, considering what had passed between me and the Priors—considering those money transactions, and those clothes, and my kindness to the children—it was rather hard that my jam-pots were poached, and my brandy-bottles leaked. And then to frighten her brother with the story of the inexorable creditor—oh, Mrs. Prior!—oh, fie, Mrs. P.!

So Bessy went to her school in a shabby shawl, a faded bonnet, and a poor little lean dress flounced with the mud and dust of all weathers, whereas there were some other young ladies, fellow-pupils of hers, who laid out their gold medals to much greater advantage. Miss Delamere, with her eighteen shillings a week (calling them "silver medals," was only my wit, you see), had twenty new bonnets, silk and satin dresses for all seasons, feathers in abundance, swansdown muffs and tippets, lovely pocket-handkerchiefs and trinkets, and many and many a half-crown mould of jelly, bottle of sherry, blanket, or what not, for a poor fellow-pupil in distress; and as for Miss Montanville, who had exactly the same sal—well, who had a scholarship of exactly the same value, viz. about fifty pounds yearly—she kept an elegant little cottage in the Regent's Park, a brougham with a horse all over brass harness, and a groom with a prodigious gold lace hat-band, who was treated with frightful contumely at the neighboring cab-stand: an aunt or a mother, I don't know which (I hope it was only an aunt), always comfortably dressed, and who looked after Montanville: and she herself had bracclets, brooches, and velvet pelisses of the very richest description. But then Miss Montanville was a good economist. She was never known to help a poor friend in distress, or give a fainting brother and sister a crust or a glass of wine. She allowed ten shillings a week to her father, whose name was Boskinson, said to be clerk to a chapel in Paddington; but she would never see him—no, not when he was in hospital, where he was so ill; and though she certainly lent Miss Wilder thirteen pounds, she had Wilder arrested upon her promissory note for twenty-four, and sold up every stick of Wilder's furniture, so that the whole Academy cried shame! Well, an accident occurred to Miss Montanville, for which those may be sorry who choose. On the evening of the 26th of December, Eighteen hundred and something, when the conductors of the Academy were giving their grand annual Christmas Pant—I should say examination of the Academy pupils before their numerous friends—Montanville, who happened to be present, not in her brougham this time, but in an aerial chariot of splendor drawn by doves, fell off a rainbow, and through the roof of the Revolving Shrine of the Amaranthine Queen, thereby very nearly damaging Bellenden, who was occupying the shrine, attired in a light-blue spangled dress, waving a wand, and uttering some idiotic verses composed for her by the Professor of Literature attached to the Academy. As for Montanville, let her go shrieking down that trap-door, break her leg, be taken home, and never more be character of ours. She never could speak. Her voice was as hoarse as a fish-woman's. Can that immense stout old box-keeper at the — theatre, who limps up to ladies on the first tier, and offers that horrible foot-stool, which every body stumbles over, and makes a clumsy courtesy, and looks so knowing and hard, as if she recognized an acquaintance in the splendid lady who enters the box—can that old female be the once brilliant Emily Montanville? I am told there are no lady box-keepers in the English theatres. This, I submit, is a proof of my consummate care and artifice in rescuing from a prurient curiosity the individual personages from whom the characters of the present story are taken. Montanville is not a box-opener. She may, under another name, keep a trinket-shop in the Burlington Arcade, for what you know: but this secret no torture shall induce me to divulge. Life has its rises and its downfalls, and you have had yours, you hobbling old creature, Montanville, indeed! Go thy ways! Here is a shilling for thee. (Thank you, Sir.) Take away that confounded foot-stool, and never let us see thee more!

Now the fairy Amarantha was like a certain dear young lady of whom we have read in early youth. Up to twelve o'clock, attired in sparkling raiment, she leads the dance with the prince (Gradini, known as Grady in his days of banishment at the T. R. Dublin). At supper, she takes her place by the prince's royal father (who is alive now, and still reigns occasionally, so that we will not mention his revered name). She makes believe to drink from the gilded paste-board, and to eat of the mighty pudding. She smiles as the good old irascible monarch knocks the prime minister and the cooks about: she blazes in splendor: she beams with a thousand jewels, in comparison with which the Koh-i-noor is a wretched lustreless little pebble: she disappears in a chariot, such as a Lord Mayor never rode in:—and at midnight, who is that young woman tripping homeward through the wet streets in a battered bonnet, a cotton shawl, and a lean frock fringed with the dreary winter flounces?

Our Cinderella is up early in the morning: she does no little portion of the house-work: she dresses her sisters and brothers: she prepares papa's breakfast. On days when she has not to go to morning lessons at her academy she helps with the dinner. Heaven help us! She has often brought mine when I have dined at home, and owns to having made that famous mutton-broth when I had a cold. Foreigners come to the house—professional gentlemen—to see Slumley on the first floor; exiled captains of Spain and Portugal, companions of the warrior her father. It is surprising how she has learned their accents, and has picked up French and Italian, too. And she played the piano in Mr. Slumley's room sometimes, as I have said; but refrained from that presently, and from visiting him altogether. I suspect he was not a man of principle. His paper used to make direful attacks upon individual reputations; and you would find theatre and opera people most curiously praised and assailed in the Swell. I recollect meeting him, several years after, in the lobby of the opera, in a very noisy frame of mind, when he heard a certain lady's carriage called, and cried out with exceeding strong language, which need not be accurately reported, "Look at that woman! Confound her! I made her, Sir! Got her an engagement when the family was starving, Sir! Did you see her, Sir? She wouldn't even look at me!" Nor indeed was Mr. S. at that moment a very agreeable object to behold.

Then I remembered that there had been some quarrel with this man, when we lodged in Beak Street together. If difficulty there was, it was solved ambulando. He quitted the lodgings, leaving an excellent and costly piano as security for a heavy bill which he owed to Mrs. Prior, and the instrument was presently fetched away by the music-sellers, its owners. But regarding Mr. S.'s valuable biography, let us speak very gently. You see it is "an insult to literature" to say that there are disreputable and dishonest persons who write in newspapers.

Nothing, dear friend, escapes your penetration: if a joke is made in your company you are down upon it instantly, and your smile rewards the wag who amuses you: so you knew at once, while I was talking of Elizabeth and her academy, that a theatre was meant, where the poor child danced for a guinea, or five-and-twenty shillings per week. Nay, she must have had not a little skill and merit to advance to the quarter of a hundred; for she was not pretty at this time, only a rough, tawny-haired filly of a girl, with great eyes. Dolphin, the manager, did not think much of her, and she passed before him in his regiment of Sea-nymphs, or Bayadères, or Fairies, or Mazurka maidens (with their fluttering lances and little scarlet slyboots!), scarcely more noticed than private Jones standing under arms in his company when his Royal Highness the Field-marshal gallops by. There were no dramatic triumphs for Miss Bellenden; no bouquets were flung at her feet; no cunning Mephistopheles—the emissary of some philandering Faustus outside—corrupted her duenna, or brought her caskets of diamonds. Had there been any such admirer for Bellenden, Dolphin would not only not have been shocked, but he would very likely have raised her salary. As it was, though himself, I fear, a person of loose morals, he respected better things. "That Bellenden's a good honest gurl," he said to the present writer; "works hard; gives her money to her family; father a shy old cove. Very good family, I hear they are!" and he passes on to some other of the innumerable subjects which engage a manager.

Now, why should a poor lodging-house keeper make such a mighty secret of having a daughter earning an honest guinea by dancing at a theatre? Why persist in calling the theatre an academy? Why did Mrs. Prior speak of it as such, to me who knew what the truth was, and to whom Elizabeth herself made no mystery of her calling?

There are actions and events in its life over which decent Poverty often chooses to cast a veil that is not unbecoming wear. We can all, if we are minded, peer through this poor flimsy screen: often there is no shame behind it—only empty platters, poor scraps, and other threadbare evidence of want and cold. And who is called on to show his rags to the public, and cry out his hunger in the street? At this time (her character has developed itself not so amiably since) Mrs. Prior was outwardly respectable; and yet, as I have said, my groceries were consumed with remarkable rapidity; my wine and brandy bottles were all leaky, until they were excluded from air under a patent lock; my Morell raspberry jam, of which I was passionately fond, if exposed on the table for a few hours, was always eaten by the cat, or that wonderful little wretch of a maid-of-all-work, so active, yet so patient, so kind, so dirty, so obliging. Was it the maid who took those groceries? I have seen the Gazza Ladra, and know that poor little maids are sometimes wrongfully accused; and besides, in my particular case, I own I don't care who the culprit was. At the year's end, a single man is not much poorer for this house-tax which he pays. One Sunday evening, being confined with a cold, and partaking of that mutton broth which Elizabeth made so well, and which she brought me, I entreated her to bring from the cupboard, of which I gave her the key, a certain brandy-bottle. She saw my face when I looked at her; there was no mistaking its agony. There was scarce any brandy left; it had all leaked away; and it was Sunday, and no good brandy was to be bought that evening.

Elizabeth, I say, saw my grief. She put down the bottle, and she cried: she tried to prevent herself from doing so at first, but she fairly burst into tears.

"My dear—dear child," says I, seizing her hand, "you don't suppose I fancy you—"

"No—no!" she says, drawing the large hand over her eyes. "No—no! but I saw it when you and Mr. Warrington last 'ad some. Oh! do have a patting lock!"

"A patent lock, my dear?" I remarked. "How odd that you, who have learned to pronounce Italian and French words so well, should make such strange slips in English! Your mother speaks well enough."

"She was born a lady. She was not sent to be a milliner's girl, as I was, and then among those noisy girls at that—oh! that place!" cries Bessy, in a sort of desperation, clenching her hand.

Here the bells of St. Beak's began to ring quite cheerily for evening service. I heard "Elizabeth!" cried out from the lower regions by Mrs. Prior's cracked voice. And the maiden went her way to Church, which she and her mother never missed of a Sunday; and I dare say I slept just as well without the brandy-and-water.

Slumley being gone, Mrs. Prior came to me rather wistfully one day, and wanted to know whether I would object to Madame Bentivoglio, the opera-singer, having the first floor? This was too much, indeed! How was my work to go on with that woman practicing all day and roaring underneath me? But after sending away so good a customer, I could not refuse to lend the Priors a little more money; and Prior insisted upon treating me to a new stamp, and making out a new and handsome bill for an amount nearly twice as great as the last: which he had no doubt under heaven, and which he pledged his honor as an officer and a gentleman that he would meet. Let me see: That was how many years ago? Thirteen, fourteen, twenty? Never mind. My fair Elizabeth, I think if you saw your poor old father's signature now, you would pay it. I came upon it lately in an old box I haven't opened these fifteen years, along with some letters written—never mind by whom—and an old glove that I used to set an absurd value by; and that emerald-green tabinet waistcoat which kind old Mrs. Macmanus gave me, and which I wore at the L—d L—t—nt's ball, Ph-n-x Park, Dublin, once, when I danced with her there! Lord!—Lord! It would no more meet round my waist now than round Daniel Lambert's. How we outgrow things!

But as I never presented this united bill of £43 odd (the first portion of £23, etc., was advanced by me in order to pay an execution out of the house)—as I never expected to have it paid any more than I did to be Lord Mayor of London—I say it was a little hard that Mrs. Prior should write off to her brother (she writes a capital letter), blessing Providence that had given him a noble income, promising him the benefit of her prayers, in order that he should long live to enjoy his large salary, and informing him that an obdurate creditor, who shall be nameless (meaning me), who had Captain Prior in his power (as if being in possession of that dingy scrawl, I should have known what to do with it), who held Mr. Prior's acceptance for £43 14s. 4d. due on the 3d July (my bill), would infallibly bring their family to ruin, unless a part of the money was paid up. When I went up to my old college, and called on Sargent, at Boniface Lodge, he treated me as civilly as if I had been an undergraduate; scarcely spoke to me in hall, where, of course, I dined at the Fellows' table; and only asked me to one of Mrs. Sargent's confounded tea-parties during the whole time of my stay. Now it was by this man's entreaty that I went to lodge at Prior's; he talked to me after dinner one day, he hummed, he ha'd, he blushed, he prated in his pompous way, about an unfortunate sister in London—fatal early marriage—husband, Captain Prior, Knight of the Swan with two Necks of Portugal, most distinguished officer, but imprudent speculator—advantageous lodgings in the centre of London, quiet, though near the Clubs—if I was ill (I am a confirmed invalid), Mrs. Prior, his sister, would nurse me like a mother. So, in a word, I went to Prior's: I took the rooms: I was attracted by some children: Amelia Jane (that little dirty maid before mentioned) dragging a go-cart, containing a little dirty pair; another marching by them, carrying a fourth well-nigh as big as himself. These little folks, having threaded the mighty flood of Regent Street, debouched into the quiet creek of Beak Street, just as I happened to follow them. And the door at which the small caravan halted—the very door I was in search of—was opened by Elizabeth, then only just emerging from childhood, with tawny hair falling into her solemn eyes.

The aspect of these little people, which would have deterred many, happened to attract me. I am a lonely man. I may have been ill-treated by some one once, but that is neither here nor there. If I had had children of my own, I think I should have been good to them. I thought Prior a dreadful vulgar wretch, and his wife a scheming, greedy little woman. But the children amused me; and I took the rooms, liking to hear overhead in the morning the patter of their little feet. The person I mean has several; husband, judge in the West Indies. Allons! now you know how I came to live at Mrs. Prior's.

Though I am now a steady, a confirmed old bachelor (I shall call myself Mr. Batchelor, if you please, in this story; and there is some one far—far away who knows why I will NEVER take another title), I was a gay young fellow enough once. I was not above the pleasures of youth: in fact, I learned quadrilles on purpose to dance with her that long vacation when I went to read with my young friend Lord Viscount Poldoody at Dub—pshaw! Be still, thou foolish heart! Perhaps I misspent my time as an undergraduate. Perhaps I read too many novels, occupied myself too much with "elegant literature" (that used to be our phrase), and spoke too often at the Union, where I had a considerable reputation. But those fine words got me no college prizes: I missed my fellowship: was rather in disgrace with my relations afterward, but had a small independence of my own, which I eked out by taking a few pupils for little goes and the common degree. At length, a relation dying, and leaving me a further small income, I left the university, and came to reside in London.

Now in my third year at college there came to St. Boniface a young gentleman, who was one of the few gentleman-pensioners of our society. His popularity speedily was great. A kindly and simple youth, he would have been liked, I dare say, even though he had been no richer than the rest of us; but this is certain, that flattery, worldliness, mammon-worship, are vices as well known to young as to old boys; and a rich lad at school or college has his followers, tuft-hunters, led-captains, little courts, just as much as any elderly millionaire of Pall-Mall, who gazes round his club to see whom he shall take home to dinner, while humble trencher-men wait anxiously, thinking—Ah! will he take me this time? or will he ask that abominable sneak and toady Henchman again? Well—well! this is an old story about parasites and flatterers. My dear good Sir, I am not for a moment going to say that you ever were one: and I dare say it was very base and mean of us to like a man chiefly on account of his money. “I know”—Tom Lovel used to say—“I know fellows come to my rooms because I have a large allowance, and plenty of my poor old governor’s wine, and give good dinners: I am not deceived; but, at least, it is pleasanter to come to me and have good dinners, and good wine, than to go to Jack Highson’s dreary tea and turnout, or to Ned Roper’s abominable Oxbridge port.” And so I admit at once that Lovel’s parties were more agreeable than most men’s in the college. Perhaps the goodness of the fare, by pleasing the guests, made them more pleasant. A dinner in hall, and a pewter-plate is all very well, and I can say grace before it with all my heart; but a dinner with fish from London, game, and two or three nice little entrées, is better—and there was no better cook in the university than ours at St. Boniface, and ah, me! there were appetites then, and digestions which rendered the good dinner doubly good.

Between me and young Lovel a friendship sprang up, which, I trust, even the publication of this story will not diminish. There is a period, immediately after the taking of his bachelor’s degree, when many a university man finds himself embarrassed. The tradesmen rather rudely press for a settlement of their accounts. Those prints we ordered calidi juventû; those shirt-studs and pins which the jewelers would persist in thrusting into our artless bosoms; those fine coats we would insist on having for our books, as well as ourselves; all these have to be paid for by the graduate. And my father, who was then alive, refusing to meet these demands, under the—I own—just plea, that my allowance had been ample, and that my half-sisters ought not to be mulcted of their slender portions in consequence of my extravagance, I should have been subject to very serious inconvenience—nay, possibly, to personal incarceration, had not Lovel, at the risk of rustication, rushed up to London to his mother (who then had especial reasons for being very gracious to her son), obtained a supply of money from her, and brought it to me at Mr. Shackell’s horrible hotel, where I was lodged. He had tears in his kind eyes; he grasped my hand a hundred and hundred times as he flung the notes into my lap; and the recording tutor (Sargent was only tutor then) who was going to bring him up before the Master for breach of discipline, dashed away a drop from his own lid, when, with a moving eloquence, I told what had happened, and blotted out the transaction with some particular old 1811 port, of which we freely partook in his private rooms that evening. By laborious installments, I had the happiness to pay Lovel back. I took pupils, as I said; I engaged in literary pursuits: I became connected with a literary periodical, and I am ashamed to say, I imposed myself upon the public as a good classical scholar. I was not thought the less learned, when my relative dying, I found myself in possession of a small independency; and my Translations from the Greek, my Poems by Beta, and my articles in the paper of which I was part proprietor for several years, have had their little success in their day.

Indeed at Oxbridge, if I did not obtain university honors, at least I showed literary tastes. I got the prize essay one year at Boniface, and plead guilty to having written essays, poems, and a tragedy. My college friends had a joke at my expense (a very small joke serves to amuse those port-wine-bibbing fogies, and keeps them laughing for ever so long a time)—they are welcome, I say, to make merry at my charges—in respect of a certain bargain which I made on coming to London, and in which, had I been Moses Primrose purchasing green spectacles, I could scarcely have been more taken in. My Jenkinson was an old college acquaintance, whom I was idiot enough to imagine a respectable man: the fellow had a very smooth tongue, and sleek, sanctified exterior. He was rather a popular preacher, and used to cry a good deal in the pulpit. He, and a queer wine-merchant and bill-discounter, Sherrick by name, had somehow got possession of that neat little literary paper, the Museum, which, perhaps, you remember; and this eligible literary property my friend Honeyman, with his wheedling tongue, induced me to purchase. I bear no malice: the fellow is in India now, where I trust he pays his butcher and baker. He was in dreadful straits for money when he sold me the Museum. He began crying when I told him some short time afterward that he was a swindler, and from behind his pocket-handkerchief sobbed a prayer that I should one day think better of him; whereas my remarks to the same effect produced an exactly contrary impression upon his accomplice, Sherrick, who burst out laughing in my face, and said, “The more fool you.” Mr. Sherrick was right. He was a fool, without mistake, who had any money-dealing with him; and poor Honeyman was right, too; I don’t think so badly of him as I did. A fellow so hardly pinched for money could not resist the temptation of extracting it from such a greenhorn. I dare say I gave myself airs as editor of that confounded Museum, and proposed to educate the public taste, to diffuse morality and sound literature throughout the nation, and to pocket a liberal salary in return for my services. I dare say I printed my own sonnets, my own tragedy, my own verses (to a Being who shall be nameless, but whose conduct has caused a faithful heart to bleed not a little). I dare say I wrote satirical articles, in which I piqued myself upon the fineness of my wit, and criticisms, got up for the nonce, out of encyclopedias and biographical dictionaries; so that I would be actually astounded at my own knowledge. I dare say I made a gaby of myself to the world: pray, my good friend, hast thou never done likewise? If thou hast never been a fool, be sure thou wilt never be a wise man.

I think it was my brilliant confrère on the first floor (he had pecuniary transactions with Sherrick, and visited two or three of her Majesty's metropolitan prisons at that gentleman's suit) who first showed me how grievously I had been cheated in the newspaper matter. Slumley wrote for a paper printed at our office. The same boy often brought proofs to both of us—a little bit of a puny bright-eyed chap, who looked scarce twelve years old when he was sixteen; who in wit was a man when in stature he was a child—like many other children of the poor.

This little Dick Bedford used to sit many hours asleep on my landing-place or Slumley's, while we were preparing our invaluable compositions within our respective apartments. S. was a good-natured reprobate, and gave the child of his meat and his drink. I used to like to help the little man from my breakfast, and see him enjoy the meal. As he sate, with his bag on his knees, his head sunk in sleep, his little high-lows scarce reaching the floor, Dick made a touching little picture. The whole house was fond of him. The tipsy Captain nodded him a welcome as he swaggered down stairs, stock and coat and waistcoat in hand, to his worship's toilet in the back kitchen. The children and Dick were good friends; and Elizabeth patronized him, and talked with him now and again, in her grave way. You know Clancy, the composer? know him better, perhaps, under his name of Friedrich Donner? Donner used to write music to Slumley's words, or vice versa; and would come now and again to Beak Street, where he and his poet would try their joint work at the piano. At the sound of that music little Dick's eyes used to kindle. "Oh, it's prime!" said the young enthusiast. And I will say, that good-natured miscreant of a Slumley not only gave the child pence, but tickets for the play, concerts, and so forth. Dick had a neat little suit of clothes at home; his mother made him a very nice little waistcoat out of my undergraduate's gown; and he and she, a decent woman, when in their best raiment, looked respectable enough for any theatre-pit in England.

Among other places of public amusement which he attended, Mr. Dick frequented the academy where Miss Bellenden danced, and whence poor Elizabeth Prior issued forth after midnight in her shabby frock. And once the Captain, Elizabeth's father and protector, being unable to walk very accurately, and noisy and incoherent in his speech, so that the attention of Messieurs of the police was directed toward him, Dick came up, placed Elizabeth and her father in a cab, paid the fare with his own money, and brought the whole party home in triumph, himself sitting on the box of the vehicle. I chanced to be coming home myself (from one of Mrs. Wateringham's elegant tea soirées, in Dorset Square), and reached my door just at the arrival of Dick and his caravan. "Here, cabby!" says Dick, handing out the fare, and looking with his brightest eyes. It is pleasanter to look at that beaming little face, than at the Captain yonder, reeling into his house supported by his daughter. Dick cried, Elizabeth told me, when, a week afterward, she wanted to pay him back his shilling; and she said he was a strange child, that he was.

I revert to my friend Lovel. I was coaching Lovel for his degree (which, between ourselves, I think he never would have attained), when he suddenly announced to me, from Weymouth, where he was passing the vacation, his intention to quit the university and to travel abroad. "Events have happened, dear friend," he wrote, "which will make my mother's home miserable to me (I little knew when I went to town about your business, what caused her wonderful complaisance to me). She would have broken my heart, Charles (my Christian name is Charles), but its wounds have found a consoler!"

Now, in this little chapter, there are some little mysteries propounded, upon which, were I not above any such artifice, I might easily leave the reader to ponder for a month.

1. Why did Mrs. Prior, at the lodgings, persist in calling the theatre at which her daughter danced the Academy?

2. What were the special reasons why Mrs. Lovel should be very gracious with her son, and give him £150 as soon as he asked for the money?

3. Why was Fred Lovel's heart nearly broken? and 4. Who was his consoler?

I answer these at once, and without the slightest attempt at delay or circumlocution. 1. Mrs. Prior, who had repeatedly received money from her brother, John Erasmus Sargent, D.D., Master of St. Boniface College, knew perfectly well that if the Master (whom she already pestered out of his life) heard that she had sent a niece of his on the stage, he would never give her another shilling.

2. The reason why Emma, widow of the late Adolphus Loeffel, of Whitechapel Road, sugar-baker, was so particularly gracious to her son, Adolphus Frederic Lovel, Esq., of St. Boniface College, Oxbridge, and principal partner in the house of Loeffel aforesaid, an infant, was that she, Emma, was about to contract a second marriage with the Rev. Samuel Bonnington.

3. Fred Lovel's heart was so very much broken by this intelligence that he gave himself airs of Hamlet, dressed in black, wore his long fair hair over his eyes, and exhibited a hundred signs of grief and desperation, until—

4. Louisa (widow of the late Sir Popham Baker, of Bakerstown, Co. Kilkenny, Baronet) induced Mr. Lovel to take a trip on the Rhine with her and Cecilia, fourth and only unmarried daughter of the aforesaid Sir Popham Baker, deceased.

I AM REFERRED TO CECILIA.

My opinion of Cecilia I have candidly given in a previous page. I adhere to that opinion. I shall not repeat it. The subject is disagreeable to me, as the woman herself was in life. What Fred found in her to admire I can not tell: lucky for us all that tastes, men, women, vary. You will never see her alive in this history. That is her picture, painted by the late Mr. Gandish.

She stands fingering that harp with which she has often driven me half mad with her Tara's Halls and her Poor Marianne. She used to Bully Fred so, and be so rude to her guests, that in order to pacify her, he would meanly say, "Do, my love, let us have a little music!" and thrumpty, thrumpty, off would go her gloves, and Tara's Halls would begin. "The harp that once" indeed! the accursed catgut scarce knew any other music, and "once" was a hundred times at least in my hearing. Then came the period when I was treated to the cold joint which I have mentioned; and, not liking it, I gave up going to Shrublands.

So, too, did my Lady Baker, but not of her own free-will, mind you. She did not quit the premises because her reception was too cold, but because the house was made a great deal too hot for her. I remember Fred coming to me in high spirits, and describing to me, with no little humor, a great battle between Cecilia and Lady Baker, and her ladyship's defeat and flight. She fled, however, only as far as Putney village, where she formed again, as it were, and fortified herself in a lodging. Next day she made a desperate and feeble attack, presenting herself at Shrublands lodge-gate, and threatening that she and sorrow would sit down before it; and that all the world should know how a daughter treated her mother. But the gate was locked, and Barnet, the gardener, appeared behind it, saying, "Since you are come, my lady, perhaps you will pay my missis the four-and-twenty shillings you borrowed of her." And he grinned at her through the bars until she fled before him, cowering. Lovel paid the little forgotten account; the best four-and-twenty shillings he had ever laid out, he said.

Eight years passed away; during the last four of which I scarce saw my old friend, except at clubs and taverns, where we met privily, and renewed, not old warmth and hilarity, but old kindness. One winter he took his family abroad; Cecilia's health was delicate, Lovel told me, and the doctor had advised that she should spend a winter in the south. He did not stay with them: he had pressing affairs at home; he had embarked in many businesses besides the paternal sugar-bakery; was concerned in companies, a director of a joint-stock bank, a man in whose fire were many irons. A faithful governess was with the children; a faithful man and maid were in attendance on the invalid; and Lovel, adorning his wife, as he certainly did, yet supported her absence with great equanimity.

In the spring I was not a little scared to read among the deaths in the newspaper: "At Naples, of scarlet fever, on the 25th ult., Cecilia, wife of Frederic Lovel, Esq., and daughter of the late Sir Popham Baker, Bart." I knew what my friend's grief would be. He had hurried abroad at the news of her illness; he did not reach Naples in time to receive the last words of his poor Cecilia.

Some months after the catastrophe I had a note from Shrublands. Lovel wrote quite in the old affectionate tone. He begged his dear old friend to go to him, and console him in his solitude. Would I come to dinner that evening?

Of course I went off to him straightway. I found him in deep sables in the drawing-room with his children, and I confess I was not astonished to see my Lady Baker once more in that room.

"You seem surprised to see me here, Mr. Batchelor!" says her ladyship, with that grace and good-breeding which she generally exhibited; for if she accepted benefits, she took care to insult those from whom she received them.

"Indeed, no," said I, looking at Lovel, who piteously hung down his head. He had his little Cecy at his knee; he was sitting under the portrait of the defunct musician, whose harp, now muffled in leather, stood dimly in the corner of the room.

"I am here not at my own wish, but from a feeling of duty toward that—departed—angel!" says Lady Baker, pointing to the picture.

"I am sure when mamma was here you were always quarreling," says little Popham, with a scowl.

"This is the way those innocent children have been taught to regard me," cries grandmamma.

"Silence, Pop!" says papa, "and don't be a rude boy."

"Isn't Pop a rude boy?" echoes Cecy.

"Silence, Pop," continues papa, "or you must go up to Miss Prior."

MOTHER OF PEARL.

I.

I MET her in India, when, during an eccentric course of travel, I visited the land of palankeens and hookahs. She was a slender, pale, spiritual-looking girl. Her figure swayed to and fro when she walked, like some delicate plant brushed by a very gentle wind. Her face betokened a rare susceptibility of nervous organization. Large, dark, gray eyes, spanned by slender arches of black eye-brows; irregular and mobile features. A mouth large and singularly expressive, and conveying vague hints of a sensual nature whenever she smiled. The paleness of her skin could hardly be called paleness; it was rather a beautiful transparency of texture, through the whiteness of which one beheld the under-glow of life, as one sees the fire of a lamp hazily revealed through the white ground-glass shade that envelops it. Her motions were full of a strange and subtle grace. It positively sent a thrill of an indefinable nature through me to watch her moving across a room. It was perhaps a pleasurable sensation at beholding her perform so ordinary an act in so unusual a manner. Every wanderer in the fields has been struck with delight on beholding a tuft of thistle-down floating calmly through the still atmosphere of a summer's day. She possessed in the most perfect degree this aerial serenity of motion. With all the attributes of body she seemed to move as if disembodied. It was a singular and paradoxical combination of the Real and Ideal, and therein I think lay the charm.

Then her voice. It was like no voice that I ever heard before. It was low and sweet—but how many hundreds of voices have I heard that were as low and just as sweet! The charm lay in something else. Each word was uttered with a sort of dove-like “coo”—pray do not laugh at the image, for I am striving to express what after all is perhaps inexpressible. However, I mean to say that the harsh gutturals and hissing dentals of our English tongue were enveloped by her in a species of vocal plûmage, so that they flew from her lips—not like pebbles or snakes, as they do from mine and yours, but like humming-birds, soft and round and imbued with a strange fascination of sound.

We fell in love, married, and Minnie agreed to share my travel for a year, after which we were to repair to my native place in Maine, and settle down into a calm loving country life.

It was during this year that our little daughter Pearl was born. The way in which she came to be named Pearl was this:

We were cruising in the Bay of Condatchy, on the west coast of Ceylon, in a small vessel which I had hired for a month's trip to go where I listed. I had always a singular desire to make myself acquainted with the details of the pearl fishery, and I thought this would be a good opportunity; so with my wife and servants and little nameless child—she was only three months old—on whom, however, we showered daily a thousand unwritable love-titles, I set sail for the grounds of a celebrated pearl fishery.

It was a great although an idle pleasure to sit in one of the small coasting boats in that cloudless and serene climate, floating on an unruffled sea, and watch the tawny natives, naked, with the exception of a small strip of cotton cloth wound around their loins, plunge into the marvelously clear waters, and after having shot down far beyond sight, as if they had been lead instead of flesh and blood, suddenly break above the surface after what seemed an age of immersion, holding in their hands a basket filled with long, uncouthly-shaped bivalves, any of which might contain a treasure great as that which Cleopatra wasted in her goblet. The oysters being flung into the boat, a brief breathing spell was taken, and then once more the dark-skinned diver darted down like some agile fish to recommence his search. For the pearl-oyster is by no means to be found in the prodigal profusion in which his less aristocratic brethren, the Mill Ponds and Blue Points and Chinkopins, exist. He is rare and exclusive, and does not bestow himself liberally. He, like all high-born castes, is not prolific.

Sometimes a fearful moment of excitement would overtake us. While two or three of the pearl-divers were under water, the calm glassy surface of the sea would be cleft by what seemed the thin blade of a sharp knife, cutting through the water with a slow, even, deadly motion.

This we knew to be the dorsal fin of the man-eating shark. Nothing can give any idea of the horrible symbolism of that back fin. To a person utterly unacquainted with the habits of the monster, the silent, stealthy, resistless way in which that membraneous blade divided the water, would inevitably suggest a cruelty swift, unappeasable, relentless. This may seem exaggerated to any one who has not seen the spectacle I speak of. Every sea-faring man will admit its truth. When this ominous apparition became visible all on board the fishing boats were instantly in a state of excitement. The water was beaten with oars until it foamed. The natives shouted aloud with the most unearthly yell; missiles of all kinds were flung at this Seeva of the ocean, and a relentless attack was kept up on him until the poor fellows groping below showed their mahogany faces above the surface. We were so fortunate as not to have been the spectators of any tragedy, but we knew from hearsay that it often happened that the shark—a fish, by-the-way, possessed of a rare intelligence—quietly bided his time, until the moment the diver broke water, when there would be a lightning-like rush, a flash of the white belly as the brute turned on his side to snap, a faint cry of agony from the victim, and then the mahogany face would sink convulsed never to rise again, while a great crimson clot of blood would hang suspended in the calm ocean, the red memorial of a sudden and awful fatality.

One breathless day we were floating in our little boat at the pearl fishery watching the diving. “We” means my wife, myself, and our little daughter, who was nestled in the arms of her “ayah,” or colored nurse. It was one of those tropical mornings the glory of which is indescribable. The sea was so transparent that the boat in which we lay, shielded from the sun by awnings, seemed to hang suspended in air. The tufts of pink and white coral that studded the bed of the ocean beneath were as distinct as if they were growing at our feet. We seemed to be gazing upon a beautiful parterre of variegated candy tuft. The shores fringed with palms and patches of a gigantic species of cactus, which was then in bloom, were as still and serene as if they had been painted on glass. Indeed the whole landscape looked like a beautiful scene beheld through a glorified stereoscope. Eminently real as far as detail went, but fixed and motionless as death. Nothing broke the silence save the occasional plunge of the divers into the water, or the noise of the large oysters falling into the bottom of the boats. In the distance, on a small narrow point of land, a strange crowd of human beings was visible. Oriental pearl merchants, Fakeers selling amulets, Brahmans in their dirty white robes, all attracted to the spot by the prospect of gain (as fish collect round a handful of bait flung into a pond), bargaining, cheating, and strangely mingling religion and lucre. My wife and I lay back on the cushions that lined the after-part of our little skiff, languidly gazing on the sea and the sky by turns. Suddenly our attention was aroused by a great shout, which was followed by a volley of shrill cries from the pearl-fishing boats. On turning in that direction the greatest excitement was visible among the different crews. Hands were pointed. White teeth glittered in the sun, and every dusky form was gesticulating violently. Then two of three negroes seized some long poles and commenced beating the water violently. Others flung gourds and calabashes, and odd pieces of wood and stones in the direction of a particular spot that lay between the nearest fishing-boat and ourselves. The only thing visible in this spot was a black, sharp blade, thin as the blade of a pen-knife, that appeared slowly and evenly cutting through the still water. No surgical instrument ever glided through human flesh with a more silent, cruel calm. It needed not the cry of "Shark! shark!" to tell us what it was. In a moment we had a vivid picture of that unseen monster, with his small, watchful eyes, and his huge mouth with its double row of fangs, presented before our mental vision. There were three divers under water at this moment, while directly above them hung suspended this remorseless incarnation of Death. My wife clasped my hand convulsively, and became deathly pale. I stretched out the other hand instinctively, and grasped a revolver which lay beside me. I was in the act of cocking it when a shriek of unutterable agony from the ayah burst on our ears. I turned my head quick as a flash of lightning, and beheld her, with empty arms, hanging over the gunwale of the boat, while down in the calm sea I saw a tiny little face swathed in white sinking—sinking—sinking!

What are words to paint such a crisis? What pen, however vigorous, could depict the pallid, convulsed face of my wife, my own agonized countenance, the awful despair that settled on the dark face of the ayah as we three beheld the love of our lives serenely receding from us forever in that impassible transparent ocean? My pistol fell from my grasp. I, who rejoiced in a vigor of manhood such as few attain, was struck dumb and helpless. My brain whirled in its dome. Every outward object vanished from my sight, and all I saw was a vast translucent sea and one sweet face, rosy as a sea-shell, shining in its depths—shining with a vague smile that seemed to bid me a mute farewell as it floated away to death! I was roused from a trance of anguish by the flitting of a dark form through the clear water, cleaving its way swiftly toward that darling little shape that grew dimmer and dimmer every second as it settled in the sea. We all saw it, and the same thought struck us all. That terrible, deadly back fin was the key of our sudden terror. The shark! A simultaneous shriek burst from our lips. I tried to jump overboard, but was withheld by some one—little use had I done so, for I could not swim a stroke. The dark shape glided on like a flash of light. It reached our treasure—in an instant all we loved on earth was blotted from our sight! My heart stood still. My breath ceased; life trembled on my lips. The next moment a dusky head shot out of the water close to our boat—a dusky head whose parted lips gasped for breath, but whose eyes shone with the brightness of a superhuman joy. The second after two tawny hands held a dripping white mass above water, and the dark head shouted to the boatmen. Another second, and the brave pearl-diver had clambered in, and laid my little daughter at her mother's feet. This was the shark! This the man-eater! This hero in sun-burned hide, who, with his quick aquatic sight, had seen our dear one sinking through the sea, and had brought her up to us again, pale and dripping, but still alive!

What tears and what laughter fell on us three by turns as we named our gem rescued from the ocean "Little Pearl!"

II.

I had been about a year settled at my pleasant homestead in Maine when the great misfortune of my life fell upon me.

My existence was almost exceptional in its happiness. Independent in circumstances, master of a beautiful place, the natural charms of which were carefully seconded by art; married to a woman whose refined and cultivated mind seemed to be in perfect rapport with my own; and the father of the loveliest little maiden that ever tottered upon tiny feet, what more could I wish for? In the summer time we varied the pleasant monotony of our rustic life by flying visits to Newport and Nahant. In the winter a month or six weeks spent in New York, party-going and theatre-going, forfeited us with the rapid life of a metropolis, but gave us food for conversation for months to come. The intervals were well filled up with farming, reading, and the social intercourse into which we naturally fell with the old residents around us.

I said a moment ago that I was perfectly happy at this time. I was wrong. I was happy, but not perfectly happy. A vague grief overshadowed me. My wife's health gave me, at times, great concern. Charming and spirituelle as she was on the majority of occasions, there were times when she seemed a prey to a brooding melancholy. She would sit for hours in the twilight in what appeared to be a state of mental apathy, and at such times it was almost impossible to rouse her into even a moderate state of conversational activity. When I addressed her she would languidly turn her eyes on me, droop the eyelids over the eyeballs, and gaze at me with a strange expression that—I knew not why—sent a shudder through my limbs. It was in vain that I questioned her to ascertain if she suffered. She was perfectly well, she said, but weary. I consulted my old friend and neighbor, Doctor Melony, but, after a careful study of her constitution, he proclaimed her, after his own fashion, to be "sound as a bell, Sir! sound as a bell!"

To me, however, there was a funereal tone in this "bell." If it did not toll of death, it at least proclaimed disaster. I can not say why those dismal forebodings should have possessed me. Let who will explain the many presentiments of good and bad fortune which waylay men in the road of Life, as the witches used to waylay the traveler of old, and rise up in his path prognosticating, and, it may be, cursing.

At times, though, Minnie, as if to cheat speculation, displayed a gayety and cheerfulness beyond all expectation. She would propose little excursions to noted places in our neighborhood, rustic "sprees," as it were, and no eyes in the party would be brighter, or no laugh more ringing than hers. Yet these bright spots were but checkers on a life of gloom. Days passed in moodiness and silence. Nights of restless tossing on the couch. And ever and anon that strange furtive look following me as I went to and fro!

As the year slowly sailed through the green banks of summer into the flaming scenery of the fall, I resolved to make some attempt to dissipate this melancholy under which my wife so obviously labored.

"Minnie," I said to her, one day, "I feel rather dull. Let us go to New York for a few weeks."

"What for?" she answered, turning her face round slowly until her eyes rested on mine—eyes still filled with that inexplicable expression! "What for? To amuse ourselves? My dear Gerald, how can New York amuse you? We live in a hotel, each room of which is a stereotyped copy of the other. We get the same bill of fare—with a fresh date—every day for dinner. We go to parties that are a repetition of the parties we went to last year. The same thin-legged young man leads 'the German,' and one could almost imagine that the stewed terrapin which you get for supper had been kept over since the previous winter. There is no novelty—no nothing."

"There is a novelty, my dear," I said, although I could not help smiling at her languid dissection of a New York season. "You love the stage, and a new and, as I am told, a great actress, has appeared there. I, for my part, want to see her."

"Who is she? But, before you answer, I know perfectly well what a great American dramatic novelty is. She has been gifted by nature with fine eyes, a good figure, and a voice which has a tolerable scale of notes. Some one, or something, puts it into her head that she was born into this world for the special purpose of interpreting Shakspeare. She begins by reciting to her friends in a little village, and, owing to their encouragement, determines to take lessons from some broken-down actor, who ekes out an insufficient salary by giving lessons in elocution. Under his tuition—as she would under the instruction of any professor of that abominable art known as 'elocution'—she learns how to display her voice at the expense of the sense of the author. She thinks of nothing but rising and falling inflections, swimming entrances and graceful exits. Her idea of great emotion is hysterics, and her acme of by-play is to roll her eyes at the audience. You listen in vain for a natural intonation of the voice. You look in vain on the painted—over-painted—face for a single reflex of the emotions depicted by the dramatist. Emotions that, I am sure, when he was registering them on paper, flitted over his countenance, and thrilled his whole being as the auroral lights shimmer over the heavens, and send a vibration through all nature! My dear husband, I am tired of your great American actress. Please go and buy me half a dozen dolls."

I laughed. She was in her cynical mood, and none could be more sarcastic than she. But I was determined to gain my point.

"But," I resumed, "the actress I am anxious to see is the very reverse of the too-truthful picture you have painted. I want to see Matilda Heron."

"And who is Matilda Heron?"

"Well, I can't very well answer your question definitely, Minnie; but this I know, that she has come from somewhere out West, and fallen like a bomb-shell in New York. The metaphor is not too pronounced. Her appearance has been an explosion. Now you, blasé critic of actresses, here is a chance for a sensation! Will you go?"

"Of course I will, dear Gerald. But if I am disappointed, call on the gods to help you. I will punish you, if you mislead me, in some awful manner. I'll—write a play, or—go on the stage myself."

"Minnie," said I, kissing her smooth white forehead, "if you go on the stage you will make a most miserable failure. A good critic never yet made a good actor, and, vice versa, an actor, good or bad, never yet was a good critic."

III.

We went to New York. Matilda Heron was then playing her first engagement at Wallack's Theatre. The day after I arrived I secured a couple of orchestra seats, and before the curtain rose Minnie and I were installed in our places—I full of anticipation, she, as all prejudging critics are, determined to be terribly severe if she got a chance.

We were both of us too well bred, too well brought up, too well educated, and too cosmopolitan to experience any qualms about the morality of the play. We had read it in the French under the title of La Dame aux Camélias, and it was now produced in dramatic form under the title of "Camille."

If my wife did not get a chance for criticism, she at least got a sensation. Shall I be vulgar, and say that Miss Heron's first entrance "knocked her?" It was so wonderfully unconventional. The woman dared to come in upon that painted scene as if it really was the home apartment it was represented to be! She did not slide in with her face to the audience and wait for the mockery that is called "a reception." She walked in easily, naturally, unwitting of any outside eyes. The petulant manner in which she took off her shawl; the commonplace conversational tone in which she spoke to her servant, were revelations to Minnie and myself. Here was a daring reality. Here was a woman who, sacrificing for the moment all conventional prejudices, dared to play the Lorette as the Lorette herself plays her dramatic life, with all her whims, her passion, her fearlessness of consequences, her occasional vulgarities, her impertinence, her tenderness and self-sacrifice!

It was not that we did not see faults. Occasionally Miss Heron's accent was bad, and had a savor of Celtic origin. But what mattered accent, or what mattered elocution, when we felt ourselves in the presence of an inspired woman!

Did it ever strike a critic, who, when Hamlet is played, or Lady Macbeth, insists that the voice of the actor or actress must be melodious, to inquire of himself whether Hamlet in his lifetime was distinguished for a splendid vocal organ, or that Lady Macbeth was celebrated for the deep melody of her accents? Don't we require rather too much of the tootle-tootling of the voice in our dramatic artists? A pretty effect to which the vocal outbursts of nature are entirely sacrificed? But this is a story and not a dissertation on the drama. Suffice to say that, in common with my wife, I hate what is called elocution.

Miss Heron's "Camille" electrified both Minnie and myself. My wife was particularly bouleversée. The artist we were beholding had not in a very marked manner any of those physical advantages which Minnie had predicated in her onslaught on the dramatic stars. It is true that Miss Heron's figure was commanding, and there was a certain powerful light in her eyes that startled and thrilled; but there was none of the beauty of the "favorite actress." The conquest that she achieved was purely intellectual and magnetic.

Of course we were present at the next performance. It was "Medea." We then beheld the great actress under a new phase. In "Camille" she died for love; in "Medea" she killed for love. I never saw a human being so rocked by emotion as was my wife during the progress of this tragedy. Her countenance was a mirror of every incident and passion. She swayed to and fro under those gusts of indignant love that the actress sent forth from time to time, and which swept the house like a storm. When the curtain fell she sat trembling in the box—vibrating still with those thunders of passion that the swift lightnings of genius had awakened. She seemed almost in a dream, as I took her to the carriage, and during the drive to our hotel she was moody and silent. It was in vain that I tried to get her to converse about the play. That the actress was great she acknowledged in the briefest possible sentence. Then she leaned back and seemed to fall into a reverie from which nothing would arouse her.

I ordered supper into our sitting-room, and made Minnie drink a couple of glasses of Champagne in the hope that it would rouse her into some state of mental activity. All my efforts, however, were without avail. She was silent and strange, and occasionally shivered as if penetrated with a sudden chill. Shortly after she pleaded weariness and retired for the night, leaving me puzzled more than ever by the strangeness of her case.

An hour or two afterward when I went to bed I found Minnie apparently asleep. Never had she seemed more beautiful. Her lips were like a bursting rose-bud about to blow under the influence of a perfumed wind, just parted as they were by the gentle breath that came and went. The long dark lashes that swept over her cheek gave a pensive charm to her countenance which was heightened by a rich stray of nutty hair that swept loosely across her bosom, tossed in the restlessness of slumber. I printed a light kiss upon her forehead, and with an unuttered prayer for her welfare lay down to rest.

I know not how long I had been asleep when I was awakened from a profound slumber by one of those indescribable sensations of mortal peril, which seem to sweep over the soul, and with as it were the thrill of its passage call louder than a trumpet, Awake! arouse! your life hangs by a hair! That this strange physical warning is in all cases the result of a magnetic phenomenon I have not the slightest doubt. To prove it, steal softly, ever so softly, to the bedside of a sleeper, and although no noise betrays your presence, the slumberer will almost invariably awaken, aroused by a magnetic perception of your proximity. How much more powerfully must the stealthy approach of one who harbors sinister designs affect the slumbering victim! An antagonistic magnetism hovers near; the whole of the subtle currents that course through the electrical machine known as Man are shocked with a powerful repulsion, and the sentinel mind whose guard has just been relieved, and which is slumbering in its quarters, suddenly hears the rappe beaten and leaps to arms.

In the midst of my deep sleep I sprang with a sudden bound upright in bed, with every faculty at its post. By one of those unaccountable mysteries of our being, I realized, before my eyes could be by any possibility alive to external objects, the presence of a great Horror. Simultaneously with this conviction, or following it so quickly as to be almost twin with it, I beheld the vivid flash of a knife, and felt an acute pain in my shoulder. The next instant all was plain, as if the scene, instead of passing in a half-illuminated bedroom, had occurred in the full sunlight of the Orient. My wife was standing by my bedside, her hands firmly pinioned in mine, while on the white coverlet lay a sharp table-knife red with the blood which was pouring from a deep wound in my shoulder. I had escaped death by a miracle. Another instant and the long blade would have been driven through my heart.

I never was so perfectly self-possessed as on that terrible occasion. I forced Minnie to sit on the bed, while I looked calmly into her face. She returned my gaze with a sort of serene defiance.

"Minnie," I said, "I loved you dearly. Why did you do this?"

"I was weary of you," she answered, in a cold even voice—a voice so level that it seemed to be spoken on ruled lines, "that is my reason."

Great Heavens! I was not prepared for this sanguinary calm. I had looked for perhaps some indication of somnambulism; I had vaguely hoped even for the incoherence or vehemence of speech which would have betokened a sudden insanity—any thing, every thing but this awful avowal of a deliberate design to murder a man who loved her better than the life she sought! Still I clung to hope. I could not believe that this gentle, refined creature could deliberately quit my side at midnight, possess herself of the very knife which had been used at the table, across which I lavished a thousand fond attentions, and remorselessly endeavor to stab me to the heart. It must be the act of one insane or laboring under some momentary hallucination. I determined to test her farther. I adopted a tone of vehement reproach, hoping if insanity was smouldering in her brain to fan the embers to such a flame as would leave no doubt on my mind. I preferred that she should be mad than to feel that she hated me.

"Woman!" I thundered fiercely, "you must have the mind of a fiend to repay my love in this manner. Beware of my vengeance. Your punishment shall be terrible!"

"Punish me," she answered; and oh, how serene and distant her voice sounded!—"punish me how and when you will. It will not matter much." The tones were calm, assured, and fearless. The manner perfectly coherent. A terrible suspicion shot across my mind.

"Have I a rival?" I asked; "is it a guilty love that has prompted you to plan my death? If so, I am sorry you did not kill me."

"I do not know any other man whom I love. I can not tell why it is that I do not love you. You are very kind and considerate, but your presence wearies me. I sometimes see vaguely, as in a dream, my ideal of a husband, but he has no existence save in my soul, and I suppose I will never meet him."

"Minnie, you are mad!" I cried, despairingly.

"Am I?" she answered, with a faint, sad smile slowly overspreading her pale face like the dawn breaking imperceptibly over a cold gray lake. "Well, you can think so if you will. It is all one to me."

I never beheld such apathy—such stoical indifference. Had she exhibited fierce rage, disappointment at her failure, a mad thirst for my life-blood, I would have preferred it to this awful stagnation of sensibility—their frozen stillness of the heart. I felt all my nature harden suddenly toward her. It seemed to myself as if my face became fixed and stern as a bronze head.

VOL. XX.—No. 117.—C c

"You are an inexplicable monster," I said, in tones that startled myself, they were so cold and metallic; "and I shall not endeavor to decipher you. I will use every endeavor to ascertain, however, whether it is some species of insanity that has thus afflicted you, or whether you are ruled by the most vicious soul that ever inhabited a human body. You shall return to my house to-morrow, when I will place you under the charge of Doctor Melony. You will live in the strictest seclusion. I need not tell you that, after what has happened, you must henceforth be a stranger to your daughter. Hands crimsoned with her father's blood are not those that I would see caressing her."

"Very well. It is all one to me where I am, or how I live."

"Go to bed."

She went, calmly as a well-taught child, coolly turning over the pillow on which was sprinkled the blood from the wound in my shoulder, so as to present the under-side for her beautiful, guilty head to repose on; gently removed the murderous knife, which was still lying on the coverlet, and placed it on a little table by the side of the bed, and then without a word calmly composed herself to sleep.

It was inexplicable. I stanchd my wound and sat down to think.

What was the meaning of it all? I had in my life been over many lunatic asylums, and had, as one of the various items in my course of study, read much on the phenomena of insanity, which had always been exceedingly interesting to me for this reason; I thought that it may happen that only through the aberrated intellect was it that we could approach the secrets of the normal mind. The castle, fortified and garrisoned at every angle and loophole, guards its interior mysteries; it is only when the fortress crumbles that we can force our way inside, and detect the secret of its masonry, its form, and the theory of its construction.

But in all my researches I had never met with any symptoms of a diseased mind similar to these my wife exhibited. There was a uniform coherence that completely puzzled me. Her answers to my questions were complete and determinate—that is, they left no room for what is called "cross-examination." No man ever spent such a night of utter despair as I did watching in that dimly-lit chamber until dawn, while she, my would-be murderess, lay plunged in so profound and calm a slumber that she might have been a wearied angel rather than a self-possessed demon. The mystery of her guilt was maddening; and I sat hour after hour in my easy-chair, seeking in vain for a clew, until the dawn, spectral and gray, arose over the city. Then I packed up all our luggage, and wandered restlessly over the house until the usual hour for arising had struck.

On proceeding to my room I found my wife just completing her toilet. To my consternation and horror she flung herself into my arms as I entered.

"Oh, Gerald!" she cried, "I have been so frightened. What has brought all this blood on the pillow and the sheets? Where have you been? When I awoke and missed you, and discovered these stains, I knew not what to think. Are you hurt? What is the matter?"

I stared at her. There was not a trace of conscious guilt in her countenance. It was the most consummate acting. Its very perfection made me the more relentless.

"There is no necessity for this hypocrisy," I said; "it will not alter my resolve. We depart for home to-day. Our luggage is packed, the bills are all paid. Speak to me, I pray you, as little as possible."

"What is it? Am I dreaming? Oh! Gerald, my darling, what have I done, or what has come over you?" She almost shrieked these queries.

"You know as well as I do, you fair-faced monster. You tried to murder me last night, when I was asleep. There's your mark on my shoulder. A loving signature, is it not?"

I bared my shoulder as I spoke, and exposed the wound. She gazed wildly in my face for a moment, then tottered and fell. I lifted her up and placed her on the bed. She did not faint, and had strength enough left to ask me to leave her alone for a few moments. I quitted her with a glance of contempt, and went down stairs to make arrangements for our journey. After an absence of about an hour I returned to our apartments. I found her sitting placidly in an easy-chair, looking out of the window. She scarcely noticed my entrance, and, O God! the same old distant look was on her face!

"We start at three o'clock. Are you ready?" I said to her.

"Yes. I need no preparation." Evenly, calmly uttered, without even turning her head to look at me.

"You have recovered your memory, it seems," I sneered. "You wasted your histrionic talents this morning."

"Did I?" She smiled with the most perfect serenity, arranged herself more easily in her chair, and leaned back as if in a reverie. I was enraged beyond endurance, and left the room abruptly.

That evening saw us on our way home. Throughout the journey she maintained the same apathetic air. We scarcely exchanged a word. The instant we reached our house I assigned her her apartments, forbidding her strictly to move from them, and dispatched a messenger for Doctor Melony. Minnie, on her part, took possession of her prison without a word. She did not even ask to see our darling little Pearl, who was a thousand times more beautiful and engaging than ever.

Melony arrived, and I laid the awful facts before him. The poor man was terribly shocked.

"Depend on it, it's opium," he said. "Let me see her."

An hour afterward he came to me.

"It's not opium, and it's not insanity," he said; "it must be somnambulism. I find symptoms, however, that puzzle me beyond all calculation. That she is not in her normal condition of mind is evident; but I can not discover the cause of this unnatural excitement. She is coherent, logical, but perfectly apathetic to all outward influences. At first I was certain that she was a victim of opium. Now I feel convinced that I was entirely wrong. It must be somnambulism. I will remain a few weeks in the house, and trust me to discover this mystery. Meanwhile she must be carefully watched."

Melony was as good as his word. He watched her incessantly, and reported to me her condition. The poor man was dreadfully puzzled. The strictest surveillance failed to elicit the slightest evidence of her taking any stimulants, although she remained almost all the time in the apathetic state which was so terrible to behold. The Doctor endeavored to arouse her by reproaches for her attempt on my life. She, in return, only smiled, and replied that it was a matter in which she had no further interest. Not a trace of any somnambulistic habit could be discovered. I was thoroughly wretched. I secluded myself from all society but that of Melony; and had it not been for him and my darling little Pearl I am certain that I would have gone mad. The most of my days I spent wandering in the great woods which lay in the neighborhood of my farm, and my evenings I endeavored to divert with reading, or a chat with the good Doctor. Yet, talk of what we would, the conversation would always return to the same melancholy topic. It was a maze of sorrow in which we invariably, no matter in what direction we wandered, brought up at the same spot.

IV.

The Doctor and myself were sitting one evening, late, in my library, talking gloomily enough over my domestic tragedy. He was endeavoring to persuade me to look more brightly on the future; to dismiss, as far as possible, from my mind the accursed horror that dwelt in my home, and to remember that I had still a dear object left on which to centre my affections. This allusion to little Pearl, in such a mood as I was then in, only served to heighten my agony. I began immediately to revolve the chances that, were my wife's disease really insanity, would it not be perpetuated in my dear child? Melony, of course, pooh-poohed the idea; but with the obstinacy of grief I clung to it. Suddenly a pause took place in the argument, and the dreary sounds that fill the air in the last nights of autumn swept around the house. The wind soughed through the tree-tops, which were now almost bare, as if moaning at being deprived of its leafy play-mates. Inexplicable noises passed to and fro without the windows. Dead leaves rustled along the piazza like the rustle of the garments of ghosts. Chilly draughts came from unseen crevices, blowing on back and cheek till one felt as if some invisible lips were close behind, pouring malignant breaths on face and shoulder. Suddenly the pause in our conversation was intruded on by a noise that we knew came neither from air or dry leaf. We heard sounding through the night the muffled tread of footsteps. I knew that, saving ourselves, the household had long since retired to bed. By a simultaneous action we both sprang to our feet, and rushed to a door which opened into a long corridor leading to the nursery, and which communicated, by a series of rambling passages, with the main body of the house. As we flung back the door a light appeared at the farther end, advancing slowly toward us. It was borne by a tall, white figure. It was my wife! Calm and stately, and with her wonderful serene step, she approached. My heart was frozen when I saw spots of blood on her hands and night-robe. I gave a wild cry, and rushed past her. In another instant I was in baby's room. The night-light was burning dimly; the colored nurse was sleeping calmly in her bed; while, in a little cot in another part of the room, I saw— Ah! how tell it?—I can not! Well, little Pearl was murdered—murdered! My darling lay—

It was I now who was insane. I rushed out of the room back into the corridor to slay the fiend who had done this horrible deed. I had no mercy for her then. I would have killed her a thousand times over. Great God! She was leaning against the wall conversing as calmly with the Doctor as if nothing had happened; smoothing her hair with her reddened fingers, nonchalant as if at an evening party. I ran at her to crush her. Melony leaped between us.

"Stop," he cried. "The secret is out;" and as he spoke he held up a little silver box containing what seemed to be a greenish paste: "it is Hasheesh, and she is confessing!"

Her statement was the most awful thing I ever listened to. It was as deliberate as a lawyer's brief. She had contracted this habit in the East, she said, long before I knew her, and could not break it off. It wound her nature in chains of steel; by degrees it grew upon her, until it became her very life. Her existence lay as it were in a nut-shell, but that shell was to her a universe. One night, she continued, when she was under the influence of the drug, she went with me to see a play in which the wife abhors her husband and murders her children. It was "Medea." From that instant Murder became glorified in her sight, through the medium of the spell-working drug. Her soul became rapt in the contemplation of the spilling of blood. I was to have been her first victim, Pearl her second. She ended by saying, with an ineffable smile, that the delight of the taking away of life was beyond imagination.

I suppose I must have fainted; for when I awoke from what seemed oblivion I found myself in bed with Doctor Melony by my side. He laid his finger on his lip, and whispered to me that I had been very ill, and must not talk. But I could not restrain myself.

"Where is she?" I muttered.

"Where she ought to be," he answered; and then I caught faintly the words "Private mad-house."

Oh, Hasheesh! demon of a new Paradise, spiritual whirlwind, I know you now! You blackened my life, you robbed me of all I held dear; but you have since consoled me. You thought, wicked enchanter, that you had destroyed my peace forever. But I have won, through you yourself, the bliss you once blotted out. Vanish past! Hence present! Out upon actuality! Hand in hand, I walk with the conqueror of time, and space, and suffering. Bend all who hear me to his worship!

UNITED STATES.

CONGRESS has been in session for nearly a month, but the House of Representatives having been unable to elect a Speaker, no business of importance has been transacted. A ballot has been taken nearly every day, the remainder of the time having been mainly occupied by speeches on slavery and general political topics, based ostensibly upon the resolution of Mr. Clark, that no member "who had recommended or indorsed" Mr. Helper's book, entitled The Impending Crisis at the South, "is fit to be Speaker of this House." The Republicans have taken little active part in the debate, leaving the speaking almost entirely to their opponents.—After the first ballot for Speaker, Mr. Grow having withdrawn his name as a candidate, the entire Republican vote was concentrated upon Mr. Sherman. On the third ballot Mr. Sherman (Rep.) received 110 votes, Mr. Bocock (Dem.) 88, Mr. Gilmer (Am.) 20, and 18 Scattering; 231 votes being cast, and 116 being required for election, Mr. Sherman lacked 6 votes of the requisite number. Subsequent ballotings had the same general result, though the aggregate number of votes varied slightly, owing to the occasional absence of a few members; yet whenever a member of either side wished to leave, he found some one of the opposite party to pair off with him. The almost uniform result of the ballots was that Mr. Sherman lacked 4 votes necessary to a majority. On the 16th of December 14 of the Republicans voted for Mr. Gilmer, raising his vote to 36. This was done by arrangement, with the apparent design of testing the willingness of the Democrats to unite upon the American candidate. Upon the next ballot Mr. Gilmer's vote falling below his former number, he withdrew, nominating Mr. Boteler, of Virginia, who received 25 votes; Mr. Sherman having 111, and Mr. Bocock 83, with 9 scattering. On the 19th Mr. Bocock withdrew, thanking his friends for their support, and the Democratic vote was scattered among various candidates. On the next ballot Mr. Boteler received 39 votes, and on the succeeding one 88. On the 29th he withdrew, nominating Mr. Millson, of Virginia, who received 96 votes, the largest number as yet given for any candidate opposed to Mr. Sherman. Subsequently a number of members were brought forward as likely to concentrate the votes of those opposed to the Republican nominee. The most prominent of these was Mr. Scott, of California, who, on the 29th, received 83 votes, Mr. Sherman having 102, while 106 were necessary to a choice. The latest vote taken before the close of our Record for this month was on the 6th of January, when 112 being necessary for a choice, Mr. Sherman received 109, the remainder being scattering—Mr. McClelland, who received the largest number, having but 37.—During these proceedings, suggestions were made at various times for the election of a temporary Speaker, in order that provision might be made for the payment of Post-office contractors, and other urgent business should be transacted; but none of these propositions were acceded to.

In the Senate Mr. Trumbull's motion to include the attack upon the arsenal at Liberty, Missouri, among the subjects of inquiry under the resolution of Mr. Mason was lost, by a vote of 32 to 22; the resolution of Mr. Mason was then passed unanimously. The Committee was appointed, consisting of Messrs. Mason, Davis, Fitch, Collamer, and Doolittle.—The following are the most important bills which have been brought before the Senate: By Mr. Slidell, to appropriate money to facilitate the acquisition of Cuba; by Mr. Johnson, a Homestead Bill; by Mr. Harlan, for inquiring into the propriety of authorizing the people of Utah and New Mexico to elect Territorial officers; by Mr. Lane, to reimburse Oregon for the expenses of her Indian wars; by Mr. Gwin, a Pacific Railroad Bill; by Mr. Clay, to abolish fishing bounties; by Mr. Davis, to organize the Territory of Arizona; by Mr. Rice, providing a temporary government for Dacotah.

There being no prospect of an immediate organization of the House, the President transmitted his Message to Congress on the 27th of December. The Message, with the accompanying Reports from the Heads of the Departments, furnishes a résumé of the general condition of the Government.

The Harper's Ferry affair, the President says, derives its chief importance from the apprehension excited in the public mind that it was but the symptom of a feeling that might break out into more dangerous outrages, and terminate in an open war by the North to abolish slavery in the South; he entertains no such apprehension, but believes that this event, by causing the people to pause and reflect upon the possible peril of our institutions, will be the means of allaying the existing excitement, and preventing future outbreaks of a similar character.—He congratulates the country upon the final settlement, by the Supreme Court, of the question of Slavery in the Territories. "The right," he says, "has been established of every citizen to take his property of any kind, including slaves, into the common Territories, belonging equally to all States of the Confederacy, and to have it protected there under the Federal Constitution. Neither Congress, nor a Territorial Legislature, nor any human power, has any authority to annul or impair this vested right."—All lawful means have been, and will be, employed to execute the laws against the African Slave-trade. He has not been able to discover that any slaves have been imported into the United States except the cargo of the Wanderer, numbering between 300 and 400. The constitutionality and expediency of the laws against the trade is maintained. "Re-open the trade," he says, "and it would be difficult to determine whether the effect would be more deleterious on the interests of the master or on those of the native-born slave. Of the evils to the master, the one most to be dreaded would be the introduction of wild, heathen, and ignorant barbarians among the sober, orderly, and quiet slaves, whose ancestors have been on the soil for several generations. This might tend to barbarize, demoralize, and exasperate the whole mass, and produce the most deplorable consequences." The effect upon the slave would be to diminish his value, and render it more profitable to overwork him than to treat him with care, since the losses could be cheaply supplied by new importations. The effect upon Africa would be to give the trade such an extension as would stimulate the tribes to continual predatory incursions against each other for the sake of procuring victims to supply the American market; and thus all hopes of African civilization would be at an end.—The wisdom of our course in respect to China is insisted upon, and the course of our minister thoroughly approved, while the Chinese are stated to have acted with good faith and in a friendly spirit.—The successful issue of the Paraguay Expedition is noted; and it is affirmed that the prompt appearance of so large a force in such distant waters, and the admirable conduct of the officers and men, have had a happy effect in favor of our country.—Our relations with Spain are still unsatisfactory; no measures have been taken to liquidate demands which have been acknowledged to be just by the Spanish Government. The recommendation is repeated for an appropriation to pay claimants in the Amistad case; and it is urged that measures be taken for the acquisition, by fair purchase, of the island of Cuba.—The President hopes that he may soon be able to announce that the difficulties with Great Britain arising from the Clayton and Bulwer treaty have been settled.—The facts in the San Juan dispute are detailed, and the successful result of the mission of General Scott is noted.—Our unsatisfactory relations with Mexico, and the present deplorable state of that country, are detailed at length; and the impossibility of obtaining redress for wrongs and security for the future by ordinary methods is strongly insisted upon. The authority of the Constitutional Government, which is acknowledged in the ports and upon the sea-coast, does not extend over the interior, where most of the outrages against us have been committed. To reach the offenders we must penetrate to the interior, through the territory occupied by the Constitutional Government, the President, therefore, urges that Congress should pass a law authorizing him to employ a military force to enter Mexico, sufficient to obtain indemnity for the past and security for the future. He urges that we should interfere in Mexican affairs on the further ground, that without foreign interference that country will be given up to anarchy and ruin; and if we do not interfere European Powers probably will. He also recommends the establishment of temporary military posts in Sonora and Chihuahua; and asks for the passage of a law authorizing him to employ a naval force to protect our citizens in their transit across the Panama, Nicaragua, and Tehuantepec isthmus routes.—Referring to the embarrassments which would have been felt in calling an extra session of Congress at the close of the last regular session, arising from the fact that on the 4th of March, when the terms of members of the last Congress expired, while at that time their successors had not been chosen in nearly half of the States, the President recommends the passage of a law appointing some day previous to the 4th of March in each year of odd number, for the election of Representatives in all the States.—The construction of a Pacific Railroad is strongly urged; but the President thinks that it should not be done directly by the Government, but that aid should be given to private companies who shall undertake the work.—Referring to the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the President thinks it doubtful whether we can pass through the present and succeeding year without an Increase of Revenue. Should such an increase be required, he recommends that it be raised by an augmentation of tariff.—The local interests of the District of Columbia are urged upon the “just liberality” of Congress.

The Report of the Secretary of the Treasury presents on elaborate exposé of the financial condition of the Government. The balance in the Treasury at the commencement of the present fiscal year (July 1, 1859), was $4,339,276; the ordinary revenue for the same time is put down at $60,297,565; and the sum to be borrowed on Treasury notes and stock, $10,747,700; making the total revenue of the year $75,384,541. The expenditures are, for service of Government, $56,338,366; for interest on public debt, $4,664,366. The account for the year will then be as follows:

Total Revenue.....	$75,384,541
Total Expenditures.....	61,002,732
Balance on hand, July 1, 1860....	$14,381,809

For the year from July 1, 1860, to July 1, 1861, the estimates of the Secretary are as follows:

RECEIPTS.
Balance on hand, July 1, 1860.....	$14,381,809
Receipts from Customs.....	60,000,000
Receipts from Public Lands.....	4,000,000
Receipts from other Sources.....	2,225,000
Total Revenue.....	$80,606,809

EXPENDITURES.
Permanent Appropriations.....	$3,173,582
Unexpended Balances.....	12,262,452
New Appropriations.....	46,278,894
Total Expenditure.....	$66,714,928
Balance on hand, July 1, 1861....	$13,891,880

The above estimates of receipts and probable expenditures, the Secretary states, are made after careful consideration; and he says that “it will be seen that there will be no necessity to provide additional means for the Treasury, provided the receipts should be equal to the estimates, and the appropriations do not exceed the amounts estimated for by the department.” These estimates, however, do not include the sums of $4,296,009 required by the Postmaster-General to meet the deficiency of last year, and $5,526,324 for the estimated deficiency of the present year, and $539,350 asked by the Secretary of the Interior to carry out Indian treaties approved by Congress. These items alone, if allowed, will reduce the balance in the Treasury on the 1st of July, 1861, from $13,891,879 to $3,539,196. Nor is provision made for the payment of any part of the public debt. It will be noted that the President, reasoning from the same data as the Secretary of the Treasury, anticipates a deficiency in the revenues of the present and ensuing years.

The Report of the Secretary of War says that while the authorized strength of the army is 18,165 men, there were in July last but 17,498, of whom only 11,000 were available for service in the field. This small force is required to man 130 garrisons, posts, and camps, scattered over an area of three millions of square miles. It has therefore been impossible for it to give perfect protection to our whole frontier. Indian depredations have been committed on our Southern and Mexican border, which have been unchastised for want of men. The war with the Camanches and Kiowas is still unfinished; but measures have been taken to subdue these tribes, and to protect the routes from Missouri and Arkansas to New Mexico. For frontier defense it is recommended that a mounted corps be enlisted for a period of six months, to consist of young men of the frontier, skillful riders and dexterous marksmen. This system would soon supply the frontiers with a large number of settlers, fully capable of defending themselves against the savages. The formation of a retired list for the army is urged. Experiments are favorable to the use of camels upon our Western plains. The Military Academy is commended to the cordial support of Congress. The gradual introduction of the best forms of breech-loading arms into our army is recommended. Measures are urged for defending our sea-ports, especially that of New York, against danger from attack by routes not commanded by the channel forts. The state of affairs in Utah is such that there is no necessity for the presence of troops in that Territory. The Indians do not molest the Mormons; and the general opinion is that the outrages committed upon emigrants are the work of the Mormons, sanctioned by the authority of their hierarchy. The army in Utah is inactive, and stands in the attitude of a menacing force toward a conquered and sullen people. In the Territory, the Secretary believes that the preservation of right and justice, through the means of any jurisprudence known and recognized by the people of the United States, is impossible. It is governed by a system which is in total disregard of the laws and Constitution of the land—the laws of the Mormon Church and the will of the hierarchy. Beyond a mere outward show of acquiescence in the Federal authority the inhabitants are as irresponsible to it as is any foreign nation.

The Report of the Secretary of the Navy presents an account of the efforts for the suppression of the African slave-trade. Eight steamers have been detailed for this purpose; four to cruise on the coast of Guinea, and as many on the coast of Cuba; another is to cruise between New Orleans, Mobile, Pensacola, and Key West.—Under the present Administration twenty steam-vessels have been added to the navy. A still further augmentation of steamers is recommended.

The Secretary of the Interior furnishes a great mass of statistics in relation to the operations of the Land Office and the State of Indian affairs. During the five quarters, ending September 30, 1859, 18,618,183 acres of public lands have been disposed of, yielding $2,107,476; 3,617,440 acres were located with bounty land-warrants; 1,712,040 acres were approved to the several States under swamp grants; and 6,318,203 acres have been assigned to the States for railroad purposes. During this period 13,817,221 acres were surveyed and prepared for market, and 16,783,553 acres were proclaimed and offered for public sale. The whole amount surveyed, but not offered for sale is 56,970,941 acres, and the estimated quantity which had been offered for sale, and now remaining subject to entry, is 80,000,000 acres. The receipts from the sale of public lands are less than was anticipated. This is said to be mainly the result of the general anticipation that a law would be passed donating lands to actual settlers. The Secretary argues at length against the passage of such a law.—With the Indian tribes our relations are described as having been, on the whole, satisfactory. Outrages have indeed been committed by the savages, but they are less frequent than might have been anticipated; and many of the most horrible massacres attributed to them have been really perpetrated by whites disguised as Indians. The whole number of Indians within our territories is estimated at about 350,000. A few tribes are increasing in numbers; but the greater portion are rapidly diminishing.—The whole number of Pensioners of all classes is 11,585, and the amount required for the payment of pensions is $1,034,914. There are now but 165 Revolutionary pensioners, 89 having died during the year.—The number of Patents issued during the three-quarters of the year, was 3334; and 5167 applications for new patents were received.

Four more of the Harper's Ferry insurgents, Green, Copeland, Cook, and Coppie, were executed on the 16th of December. Stephens, the remaining one, will be tried by the State, not by the United States Court.—The Postmaster-General has sanctioned the decision of the Attorney-General of Virginia respecting the circulation of incendiary documents.

Of Foreign Affairs, we merely note that the European Congress was to meet about the last of January.

Literary Notices.

The Life of John Collins Warren, M.D., by EDWARD WARREN, M.D. (Published by Ticknor and Fields.) The subject of this biography, whose name inspires a traditional interest in every American heart, was the nephew of General Joseph Warren, who fell in the battle of Bunker Hill. His father was the most eminent surgeon of his day in Massachusetts, and to the zeal and intelligence of the son the cause of medical science in New England is indebted for a powerful impulse, the effects of which promise to be equally lasting and beneficial.

Dr. John C. Warren was born in Boston, August 1, 1778, fitted for college at the Public Latin School, which he left for Harvard College in 1793, where he was graduated in regular course at the end of four years. In about twelve months after leaving college he commenced the study of medicine with his father; and in the summer of 1799 embarked for London, with a view to availing himself of the advantages afforded in that city for professional study. An anecdote which is related of him at this time shows that the hereditary passion for liberty was not yet tempered with the discretion which, even at early age, became one of his leading characteristics. On going one evening to the west end of the town he fell in with a mob which had been raised on account of a scarcity of bread. He began to talk with some of the insurgents in regard to their objects and plans, when a charge was made upon them by a body of dragoons. The Warren blood was up in an instant, and he rallied with the mob in making a defense against the military. The police soon came up; and, irritated by the attacks, Warren got on the edge of the sidewalk, and began to harangue the crowd on their grievances and wrongs. They were greatly delighted by the sympathy of a person in a gentleman's dress, and testified their approval by vociferous cheers. He was becoming more and more involved in the affair, when one of the spectators spoke to him, drew him aside, and represented to him the danger of taking part with a mob, who were not likely to obtain relief from their sufferings by acts of violence. He followed the counsels of his friendly adviser, who proved to be an officer in the army, with no connection with the police; and was thus fortunately rescued from getting into serious difficulty. This was the first, and doubtless the last, time in which he manifested any disposition to interfere with the exercise of established authority.

After completing an extensive course of study of hospital practice in London, Edinburgh, and Paris, he returned to Boston, at the close of the year 1802, and at once engaged in practice in connection with his father, whose health had been somewhat impaired by an attack of paralysis. He rapidly rose to distinction in his profession; his services were in great request as a practical operator; he contributed largely to the medical literature of the day, besides taking an active part in political and military affairs. In 1815 he succeeded his father as Professor of Anatomy and Surgery in Harvard College, and was generally acknowledged to hold the highest rank among the surgeons of New England. In 1837 he revisited Europe, where he devoted himself to investigating the progress of surgery and medical science with all the ardor of youth. Having achieved the most distinguished professional eminence—being acknowledged as one of the highest living surgical authorities—he made a third visit to Europe in 1851, at the advanced age of seventy-three. He still devoted his time to his accustomed pursuits: visiting the hospitals assiduously, intent on examining every new discovery; and receiving the most honorable courtesies from the eminent surgeons of London and Paris. On his return to Boston, although in a great measure relaxing the strenuous devotion to his professional pursuits, he still retained the habit of performing capital operations, devoted much time to researches in favorite branches of natural history, and greatly interested his scientific associates by his lucid expositions of new discoveries. His death took place, after a short illness, on the 4th of May, 1856, at the age of seventy-eight.

Dr. Warren, though not endowed with the highest attributes of genius, possessed a large share of the qualities which form the essential conditions of scientific eminence. If he was destitute of creative imagination he had remarkable clearness of insight, the power of accurate observation, and a keen, patient, and discriminating judgment. He was certainly not a profound thinker on abstract subjects; his mind did not teem with the original conceptions of the poet; nor had he the force and versatility of expression, or the gift of brilliant illustration, which are necessary to the success of literary composition; but he was inspired with a conscientious love of truth, an instinctive aversion to pretense and deception, and an unwearied zeal in the pursuit of knowledge. The progress of age never chilled his ardor in the researches of science. To the last he was both learner and teacher, and followed up every new discovery with the insatiable curiosity of a first love. No man kept himself better informed in regard to the achievements of professional science in Europe; no man was more earnest or successful in transporting every valuable improvement to his own country.

The method adopted by the author of these volumes is, in some respects, peculiar, comprising copious autobiographical notes and journals, together with a separate narrative of the principal events in the life of the subject, arranged in the order of topics, without adhering to regular chronological sequence.

The personal reminiscences of Dr. Warren are of a singularly interesting character, embracing lively sketches of several of the most distinguished English and French surgeons of the first half of the present century, and graphic descriptions of society in London and Paris during different portions of that period. The work, though full of instruction to the professional reader, is by no means of exclusive or limited interest, but challenges general attention as a worthy tribute to a man of elevated purposes, rare accomplishments, and commanding professional distinction.

Self-Help; with Illustrations of Character and Conduct, by SAMUEL SMILES. (Published by Harper and Brothers.) The purpose of this volume is to illustrate the conditions of success in life, by referring to the examples of eminent men who have risen from obscurity to places of usefulness and honor in the various departments of society. It is marked by an elevated tone of ethics, a profound sympathy with the struggles of the less favored classes, and the variety and impressiveness of the incidents which are employed to elucidate the subject of discussion. Among the topics to which the attention of the reader is directed are the importance of self-help, individual and national; the leaders of industry; workers in arts; business habits; the use and abuse of money; the true gentleman, and others. In the chapter on business habits, the author enumerates several curious instances of the combination of mental ability and literary pursuits with the successful conduct of affairs—showing the fallacy of Hazlitt's assertion that the man of business is merely a person in a go-cart, yoked to a trade or profession, "with no ideas but those of custom and interest on the narrowest scale." On the contrary, Shakspeare was an energetic actor in the affairs of the world. He was the prosperous manager of a theatre, and perhaps prided himself more upon his practical qualities in that capacity than on the composition of his plays. According to Pope, the principal object of Shakspeare in cultivating literature was to secure an honest independence. He succeeded so well in the accomplishment of this purpose that, at a comparatively early age, he had realized a sufficient competency to enable him to retire to his native town of Stratford-upon-Avon. Chaucer was in early life a soldier, and afterward a commissioner of customs and inspector of woods and crown lands. Spenser was secretary to the Lord Deputy of Ireland, and is said to have been shrewd and sagacious in the management of affairs. Milton was secretary to the Council of State during the Commonwealth, and gave abundant evidence of his energy and usefulness in that office. Sir Isaac Newton was a most efficient Master of the Mint. Wordsworth was a distributor of stamps; and Sir Walter Scott a clerk to the Court of Session—both uniting a genius for poetry with punctual and practical habits as men of business. Ricardo was no less distinguished as a sagacious banker than a lucid expounder of the principles of political economy. Grote, the most profound historian of Greece, is also a London banker. John Stuart Mill, not surpassed by any living thinker in profoundness of speculation, lately retired from the examiner's department in the East India Company, with the admiration of his colleagues for the rare ability with which he had conducted the business of the department. With regard to the pursuit of knowledge under difficulties, the author adds several instances to the well-known examples in which eminence in letters has been obtained amidst apparently insuperable obstacles to success. Alexander Murray, the distinguished linguist, learned to write by scribbling his letters on an old wool-card with the end of a burned heather stem. Professor Moor, when a young man, being too poor to purchase Newton's "Principia," borrowed the book, and copied the whole of it with his own hand. William Cobbett made himself master of English grammar when he was a private soldier on the pay of sixpence a day. The edge of his berth, or that of his guard-bed, was his seat to study in; a bit of board lying on his lap was his writing-table; and the evening light of the fire his substitute for candle or oil. Even advanced age, in many interesting cases, has not proved fatal to literary success. Sir Henry Spelman was between fifty and sixty when he began the study of science. Franklin was fifty before he fully engaged in the researches in natural philosophy which have made his name immortal. Boccaccio was thirty-five when he entered upon his literary career; and Alfieri was forty-six when he commenced the study of Greek. Dr. Arnold learned German at forty, for the sake of reading Niebuhr in the original. James Watt, at about the same age, while working at his trade of an instrument-maker in Glasgow, made himself acquainted with the French, German, and Italian, in order to peruse the valuable works in those languages on mechanical philosophy. Handel was forty-eight before he published any of his great works. Nor are the examples of rare occurrence in which apparently natural defects, in early life, have been overcome by a subsequent devotion to knowledge. Sir Isaac Newton, when at school, stood at the bottom of the lowermost form but one. Barrow, the great English divine and mathematician, when a boy at the Charter-house School, was notorious for his idleness and indifference to study. Adam Clarke, in his boyhood, was proclaimed by his father to be a grievous dunce. Even Dean Swift made a disastrous failure at the university. Sheridan was presented by his mother to a tutor as an incorrigible dunce. Walter Scott was a dull boy at his lessons, and while a student at the Edinburgh University received his sentence from Professor Dalzell, the celebrated Greek scholar, that "Dunce he was, and dunce he would remain." Chatterton was returned on his mother's hands as "a fool, of whom nothing could be made." Wellington never gave any indications of talent until he was brought into the field of practical effort, and was described by his strong-minded mother, who thought him little better than an idiot, as fit only to be "food for powder." The influence of this volume is adapted to be eminently salutary to the youthful reader. It inculcates energy in the dispatch of business, order in the arrangement of affairs, perseverance in the pursuit of excellence, and probity in all human relations. It stimulates to the attainment of noble objects by worthy means.

Christian Believing and Living. Sermons by F. D. HUNTINGTON, D.D. (Published by Crosby, Nichols, and Co.) Most of these sermons are of a practical and devotional character, and are remarkable for their earnestness of feeling, their vigorous appeals to the conscience and heart, and their brilliant and glowing rhetoric. A portion of the volume is devoted to doctrinal discussions, though not in the spirit of controversy. The position of the author as preacher to Harvard University, which has been long considered as the seat of Unitarian theology, gives a peculiar interest and importance to the avowal of his faith in the doctrine of the Trinity. He defends this ancient belief of the Christian Church on the ground of the universality of its reception, its accordance with the teachings of Scripture, and its necessity to a scientific theological development, and to the vitality of religious experience. In the illustration of the practical duties of the Christian life, Dr. Huntington takes a wide range of thought, presents the great principles of moral action in an impressive point of view, and enforces his statements by appeals that are no less urgent and affectionate in spirit than pointed and eloquent in expression. Although his volume occupies the ground that has been maintained in the pulpit for ages, he presents the old familiar ideas in a form which to the majority of readers will possess the attraction of novelty.

Poems, by HENRY TIMROD. (Published by Ticknor and Fields.) In this modest volume we find the indications of true poetical genius, with very considerable skill in the details of versification. The author is singularly free from the disposition to imitate a favorite model, and writes from the genuine impulses of his own mind. He evinces an active and delicate imagination, a refined vein of sentiment, and often not a little subtlety of thought. Many of the poems find their theme in the affections, and betray a pathetic tenderness, without effeminacy or the ostentation of feeling. Mr. Timrod's name now comes before us for the first time, but he has given assurance in this volume that he will not remain a stranger in the walks of American poetry.
